Folks, Facts and Opinion

New investments of capital from the United States in foreign bonds of nations, provinces, municipalities and corporations in the last year amounted to $1,189,256,500.

Low-browed Neanderthal men have been traced in the Sahara by the Logan Sahara expedition of Beloit college, Wis. At a single spot in the vast emptiness of the desert the explorers found imbedded underground fifteen stone implements of the Chellean culture, coeval with the mammoth. This is the only discovery of paleolithic remains ever made in the Sahara.

"Can nobody stop the use of these absurd terms, fundamentalism and modernism?" inquires the Outlook. "They do not represent the two sides in this dispute in the very least; for the fundamentalists are contending for things that are not fundamental and the modernists are not modern. This use of labels is one of the most effective ways of chloroforming the mind. They are only quick ways of settling a dispute without the trouble of thinking. And, in any case, they are most unseemly on Protestant lips; for the term 'modernist' is an invention of the Roman church for describing the efforts of some of her own most distinguished sons to escape from the shackles of Roman scholastic theology. The reason for the use of the term is plain enough—it wounds by implying a sneer. For the information of the Outlook we may reply to the original question by saying that nobody can stop them. The use of those terms has become a habit, a cant, a psychosis, an intellectual rut. It is easier to use an epithet than to think.

Mr. Clarence Darrow was born lucky. It is said that the National Crusaders have established headquarters at Clearwater, Fla. A nation-wide crusade, to sweep evolution and modernism from the shores of the United States, has been launched by Mr. George F. Washburn, multi-millionaire, and close friend of the late Mr. Bryan. Mr. Washburn announced he had donated $100,000 as an initial contribution, that he would give $100,000 more and dedicate his fortune to prevent our nation from becoming pagan. Among other things the Crusaders have announced seven speakers will take the field and that a challenge had been sent to Mr. Darrow to meet any of them in joint debate anywhere in Florida, offering Mr. Darrow $500 each for a series of debates to be held in Florida. This is an unexpected streak of fortune for Mr. Darrow. Whatever the merits of the controversy, he will win the money.

As a testimony of appreciation, the Y. P. S. C. E. is undertaking to raise a fund of $100,000, the interest of which is to be used for the benefit of Rev. and Mrs. Francis E. Clark during their lives, and after their death it will be kept as a permanent fund for the benefit of the organization.

One of the most hopeful signs on the horizon of American life is the progress towards harmonious race relations in the southern states. The survey of the work of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation for 1925 may be secured in the form of a brief pamphlet by addressing the commission at 409 Palmer building, Atlanta, Ga. It shows how the southern whites are rising up to put an end to lynching, are opening up a scientific study of the subject of segregation, are interchanging committees between whites and blacks in education and on the whole are setting themselves in conference and cooperation with the negro people to achieve a Christian solution of the race problem.

FROM out the lowliest cotter's humblest home,
With less than meagre poverty's poor purse;
No schooling worth the name—yea, maybe worse;—
Could any good from such small sources come?
Ah, opens thus our history's grandest tome;
Broken the seals—shines forth his noble soul,
Showing a life which saved the nation whole,
And crowned its structure like a glistening dome.
Quickener of millions! Who thy secret shares?
Bearer of burdens! Whence thy mystic power?
Redemptive manhood! Tell us now thy name!
My secret waits for him who nobly dares.
My strength is shared by him who meets the hour.
Bearing a nation's cross, I fell on fame.

Sudden departure from the here a lifetime it is said caused the death of Thomas Parr, at the age of 1635, of Thomas Parr, at the age of 163 years. And the simple life, of whole grain bread, milk, and fruit, helped him to attain the phenomenal age to which he lived. He may have reached the 200 mark—who knows—if he had not gone to London to visit the king, the tenth monarch who had ruled England during his lifetime. Charles I, in mistaken kindness, feared the old fellow until he died.

My country, 'tis of thee the commitment on jails of the American Prison Association reports that the federal government with no jails of its own and with approximately 60,000 prisoners on its hands each year has been farming these prisoners—including thousands of unconvicted men and women simply awaiting trial—to city, county and state jails, many of which the committee reports "unfit for human habitation." It cites jails in which prisoners are "herded like hogs in a stockyard," and others "crowded to the point of suffocation." Bad sanitation, indiscriminate mixing of prisoners, enforced idleness, lack of a federal control over government prisoners housed in city, state or county jails and the practice of paying a per diem rate for feeding prisoners so that the come of the sheriff, the support of the family and the education of his children depend upon the amount that he can save out of the allowance for feeding prisoners are some of the evils described in the report.

Scientific investigation of the motion picture business is promised in the proposed program of the fourth national motion picture conference to be held at the Congress Hotel, Chicago, Feb. 10-12. Speakers contributed by the University of Chicago are President Max Mason, Dr. Thomas Vernon Smith, Dr. L. J. Thurstone, Prof. George H. Mead, Dr. Ellsworth Faris and Miss S. P. Breckinridge. Doctors Charles W. Gilkey, Herman Adler, Canon Wm. S. Chase and Charles Scanlon will represent the picture pit. Misses Jessie Binford, Maude Aldrich, Dora Wells, Alice Miller, Z. Youmans and Mrs. Robbins Gilman are specialists in dealing with educational problems affecting young people. Prof. E. A. Ross of Wisconsin University is a recognized master in sociology. A debate is scheduled between Congressman Swope of Pennsylvania and Upshaw of Georgia. It is hoped also to have speakers representing the motion picture industry. Mayor Kittleson of Madison, Wis., Major A. S. Hamilton of Ontario and Mr. Nelson L. Greene of Chicago will discuss methods of regulation. It is open to everybody.

League of Nations day comes once a year in Denmark and that day children in every school study and talk and hear about the league. For two years now, the little country of Denmark has been educating its school children to know what this society of nations is, and why their country is a member.

Extraterritoriality, concerning which there has been much discussion lately in connection with the disturbances in China, so far as the principle affects China is defined by H. B. Morse as that principle by which "the foreign resident in China is subject to no provision of the law of China either as to his person or to his property (except that in the tenure of land the lex loci must apply.) but at all times and in all places is entitled to the protection of his own national law administered by his own national officials." The nations enjoying extraterritorial rights in China at the present time are Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Netherlands, Norway, Peru, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, United States.

Among the signs of a Roman Catholic revival is the report that American young men studying for the Roman Catholic priesthood now number almost 14,000, an increase of 1500 within the past two years. They are studying in 170 seminaries, of which Baltimore has the largest number, and New York the next largest. Of these 6178 are studying to be regular, that is, to belong to some of the orders, and 7800 to be seculars, or directly under their bishops or archbishops. Schools which prepare young men for seminaries show a steady increase in number of students, and here again the majority are preparing for the secular priesthood. The number in these preparatory schools is exactly 9000. Seminary faculties show marked increase, the gain being 316 within two years. The religious order faculties have decreased in numbers, while the diocesan seminaries have increased their faculties.

On Dec. 26 there sailed from San Francisco on board the S. S. "President Cleveland" a group of young people interested in seeing the missionary work of the church throughout the world. This was the sixth party traveling under the direction of the world friendship travel service of the Missionary Education Movement, which is endeavoring to bring the Christian people of America into closer contact with the world wide work of the church and to foster better international goodwill by personal contact. The party is under the leadership of Dr. John Cobb Worley, travel secretary of the movement and consists of sixteen people from various denominations. This organization is vitally connected with all the denominations in America and seeks to promote a more intelligent interest in the world-wide work of the church. Detailed information concerning the various tours may be had by addressing 443 Chamber of Commerce Bldg., Los Angeles, Calif.

For many years Mt. Holyoke college has awarded the "perfect girl" in that institution. This year the award went to Fumiko Mitani who comes from far away Kyoto in Japan. This Japanese girl then is judged by her classmates to be the perfect girl in a whole college of American girls.

Tell it to the people. No less an authority on evangelical orthodoxy than the Southwestern Evangel, organ of the Southwestern Baptist theological seminary pleads for an end to esoteric secretiveness in dealing with problems of biblical criticism. Hear it: "It is generally supposed that the popular mind has no place for biblical criticism. We take it for granted that all problematic matters connected with the Bible are, and of right ought to be, kept from the masses. In consequence, little effort is made through our regular channels of denominational publicity to acquaint the people with these biblical problems and their solution. But the simple matter of fact is, the people are learning of these matters, and most often from sources not conducive to confirmation of faith. Through newspapers, popular magazines, and other non-Christian forms of publication, questions of biblical criticism are thrust upon the public. It is becoming increasingly a mistake for a pastor to ignore the demand upon his ministry which this situation creates."

A successful program of dealing with the liquor problem, according to one of the most influential religious papers must include a "determined and earnest and well directed effort to do at least these things: To suppress the manufacture and transportation and importation of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes; to destroy the system of graft which has crept into the ranks of the enforcement officers of the federal government; to inspire local communities to help enforce the prohibition law; to destroy the saloons which are still unlawfully operating in many of our American cities; to demonstrate why the old liquor regime with all of its attendant evils must not be returned in this country; to bring the public up to the standards already enacted into law by a majority vote of the legislative bodies of this country, namely, the eighteenth amendment to the constitution; to educate the public, both those who believe in prohibition and those who are opposed to it, regarding the far-reaching influence of the bootlegging industry upon the entire life of the nation, undermining as it does constitutional authority and the personal safety and security of property of all of our citizens; to honestly study the actual situation regarding prohibition as it exists today, securing data from impartial sources, in order that the public may have the benefit of all the facts; to educate the public as a whole regarding the effects of the use of liquor, bringing to bear upon this subject substantially the same arguments which were originally employed in securing the passage of the eighteenth amendment."

There is serious worry among Jews over the question of the acceptance of Jesus as a recognized Jewish teacher. Rabbi Samuel Schulman is quoted in the Jewish Daily Bulletin as having said this: "We are on the parting of ways. If Reform Rabbis are to continue to urge the acceptance of Jesus as a teacher, with all that this implies, there will be a break in the Reform Jewish party of this country. I have always held that Jews and Christians can work together for social justice and for universal peace and for every good object, without committing themselves to a merger of Judaism and Christianity. Above all, I deny that the fundamental religious and moral teachings of Jesus are in complete harmony with the utterance of the prophets and the traditions of Judaism."

Bolshevik Russia seems wealthy and hilarious to a staff correspondent of the London Spectator. He writes: "This year's bumper harvest has created a new atmosphere of hope. The behavior of the Moscow crowd during the Revolution anniversary holidays reflected a better state of things. The people have money in their pockets. In 1922 the total gold value of money in circulation was about six million pounds, while today it is 120 million. There is over fourteen million pounds' worth of silver alone. Indeed, you see more silver in circulation here than in any of the continental war countries. Prices, except for food, are two or three times higher than in London, but in Moscow especially all the people seem to have money to spend. Wages in the capital are within 10 or 15 per cent of what they were before the war."

The Baptist World Alliance, acting through its executive committee, is asking the churches in all countries to regard the first Sunday in February each year as "Baptist World Alliance Sunday." The suggestion is that on that Sunday our world-wide brotherhood and its work shall be remembered in praise and prayer at the public services in all our sanctuaries. No suggestion of a collection is involved, but it is hoped there may be special sermons wherever possible.

What has become of the "crime wave due to prohibition?" The bureau of the census has just reported that on Jan. 1, 1910, there were in this country 111,499 prisoners, whereas on Jan. 1, 1923, the number had declined to 109,619. The total number of reported prisoners was 99.7 per 100,000 general population in 1923, as against 121.2 per 100,000 in 1910, a decrease of 17.7 per cent. It is estimated that the commitments for the entire year 1923 were 25.5 per cent fewer in number than for the year 1910. When population is taken into consideration the reduction is 37.7 per cent.

At the request of South American churches three special church leaders of wide experience in various fields of religious and social activity in the United States are to be sent this year to South America under the auspices of the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, 25 Madison avenue, New York City, to assist South American evangelical churches in furthering movements now taking place in the twelve republics of that continent. One will be a specialist in public health, sanitation and in social service. The second will be especially trained to advise churches and schools in planning their curriculum of religious education. The third will be an especially qualified evangelist to assist the national churches in directing a continent wide evangelistic campaign.

Serious discussion is going on in Roman Catholic circles of the advisability of reopening the Vatican Council which, at its last meeting more than half a century ago, proclaimed the infallibility of the pope. The Commonweal, forward looking organ of Catholicism, thinks such an assembling of "the general congregation" is advisable because the church has grown fast and far; because the present generation of bishops is superior to the earlier ones in learning; because "the developments in the outside world have necessitated a new race of men, men of action, to guide the church"; because there is need for further consideration of "De Ecclesia, the church, its whole position, its component parts and their relations, its own relation to the world, to civil states for instance"; because the doctrine of the "Mater Mediatrice" needs further study; because the large questions of the rights of the church over the family and education and the Catholic view of the law of nations call for reconsideration. It would seem therefore that such a council, if reckoned faithfully with the facts might render a real service to religion.

Local Independence and Denominational Cooperation

BAPTISTS of the most diverse theological views hold in common the theory of the independence and self-government of the local church. They agree in principle that there must be no imposition of authority upon a local church by any other ecclesiastical organization. This principle is more than granted; it is urged by them in common with uncompromising emphasis as a fundamental principle of the Baptist movement. They vie with one another in professing loyalty to it, and declare with united voice that church autonomy must be preserved unimpaired and inviolate.

Under a pure self-government such as the principle so conceived involves, every local church has the inherent and unquestionable right to effect an association of its members within itself, to form its own constitution, to prescribe its own standard of doctrine and practice, to determine for itself the character, titles and personnel of its officers, to formulate its own program of activities, to choose for itself the methods and measure of its cooperation with other religious groups, and to do all of these things under no constraint of any sort except its own sense of loyalty to Christ.

So highly do Baptists regard this principle that they contend for it as a distinctive feature not shared by other great denominations. They go farther. In controversies between groups within the denomination itself one group often charges another, in most cases without warrant, with potential or actual lording it over the local church. A staple objection to the pending proposal to amend the by-laws of the Northern Baptist Convention to provide for the definition of a Baptist church is that such amendment will invade the inviolable right of the local church to constitute, define and identify itself as a Baptist church. No adequate answer has been found to that objection. Adherents of the Baptist Bible Union, speaking in the name of the sacred liberty of the local church, arraign the Northern Baptist Convention for the alleged exercise of central control over the local churches; while opponents of the Bible Union say that the most extreme attempt made by any denominational agency in this generation to impose creedal and ecclesiastical control over the local church is that of the Bible Union itself. Every group stands for local autonomy as an argument against some measure unacceptable to it proposed by another group. All alike are loyal to the ideal of a free church as inherent in the genius of Baptist polity.

How does practice correspond with this ideal? Baptists of all theological types demand as condition of accredited standing that a local church submit its doctrine and order to the approval of other churches through a council or an association. They demand alike as a condition for a denominationally accredited ministry that the pastor of a local church submit his doctrinal views and other qualifications to other ministers or churches. In some localities permanent councils or committees on ordination are maintained. Some have prescribed standards of qualification for the ministry, others require the acceptance of a common creedal statement. All of these measures place obvious limitations upon the freedom of the local church.

Among churches strong enough to carry on independently all of the work they care to undertake, such limitations may be disregarded. But if a church is weak enough to require financial help the required standard is enforced as a condition of such help and the church is compelled to choose between freedom with failure and success with submission. Or if stronger churches desire to engage in a common enterprise, they must submit to such common terms of faith and action as will enable them to do so. Thus, among Baptists as among other denominations, the principle of local independence is counterbalanced by that of denominational cooperation. The problem is to find an adjustment that will combine the maximum of efficiency with the fullest measure of liberty.

A frank recognition of this practical fact ought to free the several parties from stultifying and irritating sophistry in debating differences. Any one of them raising an outcry of overlordship against another is resorting to specious pleading for the purpose of exciting prejudice among the uninformed. Such an outcry may be used in good faith by honest men. There may be no conscious purpose to deceive. But the outcry is deceptive nevertheless. It is in itself a piece of demagoguery to which Christian men do not resort except when their minds are clouded by controversy or by lack of understanding. Any proposal for the common ordering of Baptist fellowship, whether in doctrine or in program, is legitimate. Protest against such proposal that it involves too great a sacrifice of local freedom is also legitimate. And the question whether any proposal maintains the true balance between collective efficiency and local freedom is one to be considered in a temperate and fraternal spirit without rancor and misconstruction.

A responsibility for maintaining that balance rests upon the local churches themselves. Every such church is under obligation to do what it can do to establish between itself and all other churches concerned with it in any cooperative enterprise, the conditions of good understanding and harmony. It may not lightly disregard the beliefs and practices which they are known to hold as vital. It is not justified in departing from those beliefs and practices except by reasons that will justify it also in withdrawing from their common cooperative fellowship. If it does so depart it justifies them in refusing further cooperation with it. Although its intention may be sincerely fraternal, the consequence of its action is to place other churches in a position in which, although they are also animated with sincere good-will, they cannot consistently continue to cooperate with such church.

Thus, for example, Baptists hold as matter of conscience the baptism of believers only and by immersion only. Historically and by common practice throughout the world this is a recognized character mark of the denomination. Any church which practices the baptism of others than believers or otherwise than by immersion directly challenges thereby the common conscience of the denomination, strains denominational fellowship, precipitates dissension, invites the danger of rupture and imposes upon the denomination a problem of readjustment. That problem is how to prevent a rupture of denominational cooperation without invading the essential independence of the local churches.

Volume Seven

IF nature runs in cycles of seven then with this issue THE BAPTIST enters upon its first cycle. The sixth volume was completed last week. At no time in the brief history of the paper have there been more fine evidences of good-will than there are today. By closely adhering to its policy of service and quality THE BAPTIST has sought to earn the good-will of its patrons. It is a well-known fact that good-will cannot be bought, wheedled, or forced. It must be merited. With this principle in mind we who are charged with the responsibility of conducting the affairs of a journal owned by the denomination and designed to serve the evangelistic, missionary, educational and philanthropic interests of the Northern Baptist Convention, have constantly endeavored to produce a paper that would be worthy of the great name it bears. Therefore we have consistently labored to interpret clearly the historic position of the Baptists as to covenant, faith and fellowship. No group of Baptists has dictated the policy of the paper or inspired its utterances. No society or board has ever by word or gesture given a hint that the paper ought to be managed as a trade journal for their particular corporation. In council with the committee on THE BAPTIST the editorial policy of the paper was wrought out and to that policy we have been faithful. THE BAPTIST stands for the denomination along the democratic and evangelical lines which have marked its unity and progress in the past without being bound up to any one set of fixed formula which attempts to explain either spiritual democracy or vital evangelicism.

In producing a denominational paper of quality the problem of paying its own way without financial assistance outside of the income received from subscriptions and advertisements is of course a serious one. If the paper is cheapened in stock, in print and in contents in an attempt to make it live within its own income, the income quickly drops off by the refusal of many subscribers and advertisers to support the paper with their patronage. If the paper is kept up to a high standard of quality in physical makeup and literary contributions, the expense of maintaining such a journal is always in excess of the natural income. This is true of all religious newspapers. Hence all of them have to be assisted financially from some source in addition to what they receive from subscriptions and paid advertisements. Some have an endowment, some conduct a successful book-selling business, some have their own presses and carry on profitable job printing, some have wealthy friends who send a check for the deficits and some have a denominational appropriation. The limited field in which denominational journalism works puts the religious papers outside the patronage of national advertising and confines them to a moderate circulation. If it is suggested that the subscription price should cover the cost of producing the paper, the problem is still unsolved, because the present price of the average denominational journal is all the people will pay. We see no way out of these necessary limitations but the way of the college with its productive endowments or the way of the missionary society with its annual contributions. Considering the work done, the field covered and the high class of contributions, each week found in its columns, THE BAPTIST today is operating on as modest a budget as any other religious paper in the same class.

With the opening of volume seven, the reader will see at a glance that we have enriched the artistic quality of the paper by giving to certain department headings a distinction that makes them stand out at the top of the pages with a pleasing effect. To the office editor our thanks are due for this improvement in the general appearance of THE BAPTIST as well as for the excellent form of the paper each week. Many letters are coming to the office commending the valuable news features which are more and more claiming our limited space. The assistant editor is worthy of the commendations thus received because it is his hand that forms the multitudinous news items that appear in THE BAPTIST. No editor ever had a better corps of associates in the work of producing a religious journal. Every one of us believes in the work we are doing. It is a labor of love and a service of joy. Our keenest satisfaction comes from the knowledge that THE BAPTIST is filling an important place in the unified work of the denomination. Our grateful appreciation is hereby extended to all our brothers and sisters who make our work lighter by their thoughtful impulse that finds expression in cooperation and good-will.

The World in Transit

By THE ASSISTANT EDITOR

ROME IS WELCOME TO ALL CHICKENS SHE HATCHES

The Word and Way editorializes with clear discrimination concerning the differences among Romanists, Protestants and Baptists, saying among many other good things: "Pouring and sprinkling for baptism, infant baptism, baptismal salvation, episcopacy, and sacramentalism are of Roman Catholic origin, and all of them have been imported from Rome." . . . "Let our evangelical denominations cut loose from all that is Romish in faith and practice and they will have filled the chasm which has so long yawned between them and Baptists." It sounds comforting, but is the deduction certain? Is it demonstrable that if those denominations should discard all that is akin to Rome they would stand where Baptists do? Would the Baptists be willing to go with them to such revolutionary lengths? Would all Baptists be willing to relinquish for instance the Romish ideas of church succession, of the imposition of episcopal hands as a condition of valid ordination, of ecclesiastical authority to baptize, of some external and visible infallibility as a necessary guide to Christian faith and life? Why would it not be good counsel for all of us to go all of the way from Rome to Christ?

RELIGION STANDS OR FALLS BY THE LIFE IT ACHIEVES

Religions may be classified by the method and goal they propose for the quest for the best life. For any religion the test of its validity is its value as a way of living. No religion which fails by this test can be saved by traditional sanctities. Christianity invites comparison by this test with all other religions. It claims to have assembled within itself all of the elements of vital worth in all other religions, to have given them coherence and rationality, to have set a transcendent goal for the best life, to have indicated the true method both individual and social for the achievement of the best life and, beyond all, to have contributed the spiritual power requisite to carry the quest for the best life to successful achievement. "I am the way and truth and life," said Jesus; "I came that they may have life and may have it abundantly"—like the springtime luxuriance of a surpassingly fertile land. This, in Jesus' own words of self-interpretation, is the fundamental redemptive fact. A faith that follows him wherever he invites it, exerts itself to the accompaniment of his power, and reproduces his life in the believer.

WHERE IS THE BAPTIST BASE OF AUTHORITY?

The Baptist Record of Mississippi honors THE BAPTIST by an occasional courteous reference. Among the latest of such references is the following: "THE BAPTIST of Chicago in its leading editorial recently spoke of the drift to Romanism on the part of many Protestants. To our minds that is a perfectly natural result of the Roman Catholic church holding stoutly to the idea of authority embodied in the church, and the abandonment of the authority of the Bible by many in Protestant churches. If there is no authority outside ourselves to which we must bow our wills, then there is no religion. The idea of authority is essential to religion. Rationalism is the negation of authority." It would be hard to find a flaw in that statement, even if one wished to find it. But if the center of supreme authority for Romanism is the church and of Protestantism is the Bible, if Protestants when they abandon the Bible as a center naturally drift back to Rome, and if Baptists as they are fond of saying, are neither Romanists nor Protestants, where is the "authority outside of ourselves" to which they may consistently bow? Would it seem impertinent to nominate Jesus Christ himself in the light of all that we may know in any way and from any source about him?

MARTIN DURKIN IS CAPTURED, NOW LET THE GUSH BEGIN

Martin Durkin, charged with various crimes including murder, after some months spent in the role of a fugitive from justice, has been arrested and is now in jail awaiting trial. At once he has become the hero of sentimental publicity in the newspapers. Stories of his daring and skill in evading the police are played up with his pictures in interesting situations and poses. He has become "Marty." Girls weep for him. Schoolboys pant with indignation and hero worship while they condemn the officers for not giving him a fair chance to use his gun. Showmen are speculating on the possibilities in the case for a thrilling scenario. Profits to the papers depend upon the height to which they can urge the emotional excitement. Criminolatry has become an established religion in the United States. (Note—Two days after the foregoing sentences were written and before the copy went to the printer, the daily papers suddenly faced about and began to denounce the sensational exploitation of criminal cases. At this writing their stand is favorable to sanity, good government and the enforcement of law. Such a conversion is commendable and timely. May it be permanent.)

PLEASED TO MAKE THE ACQUAINTANCE OF FACTS

Dr. John Snape and THE BAPTIST are not wholly satisfactory to the Searchlight. Dr. Snape is able to take care of himself, but THE BAPTIST would invite verification of the statement that it is "the mouthpiece of Chicago University." In neither form, spirit nor manners is that statement true. Ask any representative of the university. Ask any pastor in Chicago who is in harmony with the organized work of the denomination. Ask any honorable man who knows. THE BAPTIST is nobody's private or personal organ, consequently everything about it is matter of open record that anybody who cares for the facts can read. It exists to interpret the historical Baptist movement in the world, to conserve the integrity of that movement, and in harmony with that movement to promote the work of the Northern Baptist Convention. Any other representation of this paper is misrepresentation.

WHERE RIGHTEOUS ZEAL OBFUSCATES JUDGMENT

The debate over militarism has provided the Nation with a poser. Referring to the action of the executive committee of the Federal Council of Churches, at its recent meeting in Detroit, in voting to continue its approval of the system of supplying chaplains to the army, after it had most commendably denounced war as the "supreme enemy of mankind" and its continuance "the suicide of civilization," the Nation asks why not supply chaplains "to the brothel and to the saloon, since these are only lesser evils and not the 'supreme enemy of mankind'?" Well, the question is valid; likewise the answer ought to be obvious. The government does not own and operate the saloon and the brothel, as it does the army. Patrons of those institutions can quit them and turn to the church when they please, as they cannot in the army. Finally, no matter how bad war may be, the army is the best form of public service that has yet been devised for certain exigencies, and men depend upon it to save their country from disaster. The chaplaincy is the best method the country knows for keeping the best in men alive while engaged in military service. Criticism is legitimate from anybody who knows a better way to serve them.

The Leadership of Lincoln

He had the conviction of a divine commission; the devotion to a great cause that led him to put aside personal advantage.

BY ROBERT GORDON

"IF," says Albert Edward Wiggam, "if you do not keep the people looking at the men of high intelligence and political capacity, the righteousness that exalteth a nation will vanish and its seed beg for bread." The author of "The New Decalogue of Science" makes many untenable statements but that warning is well warranted. The man who directs attention to a great life renders indispensable service.

I consider him a real friend who first called my attention to the excellent recent volumes by Doctor Barton. They might be entitled, "The Truth about Abraham Lincoln." He tells of a publisher who, wishing a word of commendation, sent to the White House an extravagantly eulogistic life of Lincoln. The morocco-bound volume was returned with Lincoln's reply written on the fly-leaf under the author's name—"The premium liar of history." Doctor Barton spent years in patient investigation. He explodes many myths. For instance, it is made clear Lincoln's ancestors were not "poor whites." They were poor and they were white but they were honest people, honored and active members of the anti-slavery Baptist church, and respected by their neighbors.

In a character so massive and many-sided, one can find material to support almost any thesis. At last year's birthday celebrations, seven addresses were noted which in turn interpreted Lincoln as a prohibitionist, a big-army man, a progressive, an isolationist, a success, a second Dawes, and a warning not to change the constitution. It is strange not more has been made of his leadership. There is nothing fanciful about that. Preeminently he was the leader of his people.

Decisions that Made History

It is true he said circumstances made him. Nevertheless, his decisions made history. He spoke of himself as being driftwood on the river but that was in his care-free youth. Bearing the responsibilities of office, he stood on the quarterdeck and guided the ship of state through tempestuous seas. Others, for long time, had temporized, compromised, and evaded the inevitable issue. At last one had appeared who knew what must be done. Not easily was his conclusion reached. But when, after years of brooding, the vision came, he held the prow toward his guiding star despite the worst of wind or wave. Before delivering his house-divided-against-itself speech, he read it to a group of friends. All but one condemned it. Sure his argument was irrefragably right, he went ahead and lifted men to his position.

In that memorable farewell to old neighbors, he spoke of the task before him as "greater than that which ever rested upon Washington." The occasion was piled high with difficulty. South Carolina had seceded immediately after his election. Within six weeks Mississippi, Florida, Alabama, Georgia and Louisiana had followed. Just four weeks before his inauguration the Confederacy had been organized. The South threatened war. The North was alarmed, if not panic-stricken. From Boston came a petition signed by 22,000 citizens asking congress to make any concession necessary to avoid bloodshed. Great editors urged that the "erring sisters" be allowed to "depart in peace." Lincoln maintained an ominous silence. It was charged he had no policy. When the hour came they learned better. Two conclusions he had reached: there must be no extension of slavery and there must be no secession. The nation could not go on half slave and half free, and a democracy must learn that what citizens cannot get by an election they cannot take by war.

His policies were denounced. "Copperheads" plotted his overthrow. Even abolitionists found occasion for bitter censure. At the polls, he was rebuked. In congress he was all but deserted. The senate revolted against its ultimatum. That night to a friend Lincoln said, "I have been more distressed by this than by any event in my life." This broken-hearted man heard their complaints and answered scarce a word. Under the eternal stars, he reached the determination to keep his course and "let his opponents howl." Senator Browning wrote in his diary another significant line: "He said with a good deal of emphasis, 'I am master.'"

The Real Objective

But the test of leadership is in the loyalties of followers. Lincoln always had friends. Of course he had foes. The personal abuse he suffered seems incredible. He was caricatured as a buffoon and dismissed as the "Illinois Ape." In times demanding a statesman, they said they had been given a rail-splitter and an anecdotalist. But even when he was farthest from inspiring general confidence, men recognized "a something about him that commanded respect. At his nomination the Chicago Tribune reported, "the earth had heard no such tumult since the walls of Jericho fell down." Under flying flags and with beating drums, in response to his appeal volunteers marched singing, "We are coming, Father Abraham, three hundred thousand strong."

What was the secret of his way? It was not in social rank or financial standing. He came from the log cabin and even after marriage, the total expense for himself and wife was four dollars a week for room and board. The straw hat he then wore cost just twenty-five cents and was worth no more. His influence was not augmented by titles, martial or academic. He laughed at the blood he lost in the Black Hawk war, "drawn by mosquitoes." On the congressional biographical blank, he answered "education defective." The fact that he belonged to the plain people was attractive. His career was an epitome of American history. His grandfather was killed by the Indians. His father was a pioneer. He himself came from the South Fork of Nolan Creek and was a backwoodsman. His physical strength and stature helped. He could out-wrestle all comers and lift easily four hundred pounds. Once he lifted six hundred pounds. It is a disadvantage to be undersized. Lincoln seldom met one to whom he had to look up. When once a taller man was brought to the White House, the president was nonplussed. After getting his breath, Lincoln inquired, "Friend, would you mind telling me how you know when your feet get cold?"

He was endowed with great intellectual powers. A logical mind, lucid vocabulary and persuasive speech won support that would not otherwise have been his. But beyond all that was a character that men could trust. As a youth he won the title of "honest Abe." None ever doubted his right to that. Fifteen years were required to pay a debt of honor but he paid it. Exceeding kindness made many friends. As a boy, at risk, he rescued a deserted dog that whined for help. At the White House standing orders were given that no one interceding for the life of a soldier should be allowed to leave until the president had reviewed the case. His patience held Kentucky to the North and won support from border states when such help was sorely needed.

Some somber souls were offended by his love for Artemus Ward and Petroleum V. Nasby. But a sense of humor not only relieved the strain in his own soul; it also helped him to radiate good cheer everywhere and the common laugh bound thousands to him in closer bonds of friendship. His magnanimity was amazing and magnetic. On occasion he could speak words that raised blisters. But he could truthfully say, "I have cultivated patience." Recall the insolence of McClennan. Lincoln had waited for an hour. Finally the general came home. But, disregarding the porter's information, he walked past the room where the president sat and went to bed. Yet Lincoln declared his readiness to hold McClennan's horse if only he would win battles. No man ever treated Lincoln more rudely than Stanton did. Yet he was given a place in the cabinet. Salmon P. Chase, who sought to supplant the president, was given the highest appointment within Lincoln's power and so lifted to the dignity of chief justice of the United States.

What gave Lincoln his leadership? I answer his magnanimity, good humor, kindness, honesty, physical prowess, and intellectual powers; but all that is not sufficient explanation. These qualities were rooted in a personality about which there was "a something" that set him apart from and above other men. More impressive than all the eloquence of winged words was the depth of silence which men felt in him. A mystery was there unfathomed even by closest friends. I am persuaded that that "something" was more than genius. It was rooted in reverence. It suggested dependence upon the Unseen and Eternal. When he told the cabinet of his contract with God, opposition melted away. Lincoln was ambitious. But more significant far was that sense of duty, that conviction of a divine commission, that devotion to a great cause which led him again and again to put aside personal advantage for his country's good. Here was the answer to the nation's prayer, "a man to match our mountains."

Believing himself to be divinely guided, he led the nation through its severest crisis, preserved the Union, freed the slave, and wrought a change in the very spirit of the people. Today the proudest boast many can make is that they or their fathers followed Lincoln's leadership. About the time of our entrance into the world war there was a preparedness parade in Chicago. Doctor Barton tells us that on his way to the reviewing stand in front of the Art Institute he met an old man with an oilcloth cap and cape "the same that I wore in 1860, sir, when I marched for Abe Lincoln." Then in an interval between the noise of passing bands, recalling the rapturous huzzahs of other days, he lifted his cracked old voice in one of the songs they used to sing in Lincoln's honor. Hear him now:

"Ain't I glad I jined the Wide-Awakes,
Jined the Wide-Awakes, jined the Wide-Awakes,
Ain't I glad I jined the Wide-Awakes,
Down in Illinois!"

Blessed indeed are they who happen to be wide-awake enough to recognize God-given leaders while yet there is time to follow and to fight.

A Prayer

BY HARRY H. UPTON

*G*OD, our Father, who has called us into fellowship with thee,
And has giv'n us rightful freedom wherewith
Christ doth make men free;
Hear us as we join our voices, in a song of joyful praise,
Giving thanks for gracious guidance o'er life's pathway all our days.

In our seasons of communion with the Father and the Son,
As in fellowship together, may we be in spirit one;
Not by statement signed or spoken, ask we that our faith be shown;
Make our lives thine own epistles, by our brethren read and known.

Guard our lips and may our actions more than words show firm belief,
While our hands are ever busy bringing needy souls relief;
Grant the Master's loving spirit may be in our hearts always.

Till earth's little time of service fades into eternal day.

*As the Master bore thy message to the wand'ring sons of men, Leading from life's lone far country, straying souls back home again;
So would we, thy love proclaiming, follow in the path he trod.
Seeking still and guiding others to the outstretched arms of God.*

*God, our Father, who has called us, thou hast work for us to do,
Give us ears to hear thy message, make our love deep, strong and true;
Fields already white to harvest, all about us, Lord, we see,
Lead us by thy spirit, Master, and we pledge to follow thee.*

Christian Education on the Mission Field

BY R. L. HOWARD, FORMERLY PRESIDENT OF JUDSON COLLEGE, RANGOON, BURMA

"THE church in the wildwood" and "the little red schoolhouse on the hill" seem to be inseparable. They are found side by side wherever you go in America. In India, the Far East and Africa one finds many a building serving as a church on Sundays and as a school building on week days. As the church grows and develops, there may be a fine building for religious services only, but often there is simply the old arrangement expanded. Even the magnificent plant of the Sgaw Karen mission, Bassein, Burma, includes the Ko Tha Byu hall for student assemblies and for church services.

In America where the state assumes responsibility for universal compulsory education we do not often remember that the "Light of the world" is really the power that created that educational system. In mission lands, on the other hand, where the state may help but where, with the exception of Japan and the Philippine islands, it does not assume responsibility for general education, a vital connection between the coming of Christ into the lives of the people and the springing up of schools manifests itself. Clearly a casual link exists between the love of the Master and the desire to break the bonds of ignorance. Every station missionary knows of the pleas for a school which inevitably follow the winning of a few converts in any village. It is no urging of powers without but rather this force within that has led to the great growth in mission schools.

There have been, of course, the missionaries leading in the establishment of schools, but it is all too often little realized to what extent the missionary is simply meeting the pressure of the field. Appeals like this are naturally almost irresistible. For of what value is it to undertake the stupendous task of translating the Scriptures unless those who accept Christ can read for themselves his Word? How can the meaning of that Word be made clear unless there are raised up nationals who can vivify the gospel in the thought terms of their own people? And more, how can the church which the missionary has gone out to establish ever assume the responsibility for the evangelization of its community unless there are trained for the post of leadership those whose lives have not been twisted and distorted by years in "outer darkness"?

This is just a bit of the urge back of the educational work on the mission fields, a phase of that task which had an intense interest for every one present at the recent conference on foreign mission policies. The conference in Newton Centre in 1917 declared that "we are now coming to see that, in certain fields especially, it is essential that we lay yet greater emphasis on education." That policy ushered in a period of considerable growth in schools in many of our fields. A period marked not only by growth in numbers, however, but also by a far greater growth in self-support. When the missionaries from our ten fields met in New York City last November and looked over that eight-year period, they registered their conviction that "the schools are a direct and conscious evangelistic agency"; that "every educational missionary should be evangelistic in spirit"; and that our whole educational program should be carefully reexamined with these basic principles in mind. The conference urged as an "immediate goal that all schools have enough Christian students to insure a Christian atmosphere, sufficiently strong not only to dominate the schools but to reach beyond the schools to their homes." Any school which failed to maintain this evangelistic atmosphere and to play its part in developing a "strong Christian community with an adequately trained leadership and an intelligent and responsible laity" should be closed. Together with this very clear conviction the conference was equally certain that "in the program for evangelizing the world Christian education occupies an indispensable place." When a man accepts Christ he clamors for an education for himself and for his children. The power of this plea is tremendous, and, more, we see India sweeping on toward home rule, China achieving a national self-consciousness, self-government being clamored for everywhere.

In these democratic movements our Christian youth, the graduates of mission schools and colleges, bid fair to be not merely the protectors of their own communities under governments predominantly non-Christian, but they also promise to be the saving leaven to make those great new governments of future India and China not merely democratic in name but also in spirit. The missionaries cannot, the nationals alone can and they are permeating those governments with the Spirit of Christ. Take Burma, for example; it together with another of our great mission fields, the Madras Presidency has been the most successful of all the provinces in India in exercising the powers of self-government which were conferred on it six years ago. Our Christian schools have made a real contribution to that success. Buddhists trained in those schools have not all accepted Christ, but for all the tenets of Buddhism have taken on a loftier meaning. As they live in friendly, daily contact with Christian students and teachers, there has been stirred in them a desire for the brotherhood of man, a desire which Christ alone can satisfy—yet a desire that has played no small part in successful self-government. Seven Baptists, products of mission schools, have been elected to the legislature and have been a genuine force in molding legislation in that body; hundreds of Christians, graduates of mission institutions, hold important government positions. Without Christian education these things could not have been.

Not content with the great things already accomplished by our schools, in making Christ the Master of lives, this important conference of missionaries, board members and secretaries placed on record its conviction that every school must play a real part in our evangelistic task if it is to draw on our "resources human and financial." Schools inevitably spring up wherever the church may penetrate but those schools must not forget the church which brought them into being; rather they can and must function to build up that church.

The Crisis

BY ROBERT WHITAKER

ON that high day when ocean's veil was rent,
And out of hitherto unvisioned seas
A melody of surf, and birds, and breeze
Choralled the matins of the Occident,
The world knew nowhere what the moment meant,
Nor East nor West forsook their ancient ease;
The day was as all days except to these
Who from that caravel a wondering went.

When has the world the day of doom discerned?
Or man the measure of the moment guessed?
How answered Rome the day Golgotha stressed?
Or England when the Mayflower westward turned?
What common doings filled the common earth
The day of Abraham Lincoln's humble birth?

Progress with Friction

Force or love; Christian decency or imperialistic grab; masterful push or brotherhood—which are our goals?

BY DAVID BRYN-JONES

THERE are disquieting factors in the religious situation in America today, but I am convinced they are factors that will pass away. We look out upon the ecclesiastical world and we see a rather embittered theological war being waged in practically all the denominations. It is waged more fiercely in some than in others. It flares up fiercely enough in our own denomination on occasion. But really the struggle is general and no church is exempt from it. It is foolish to deprecate differences of opinion. It is worse than foolish to ignore them. Discussion is healthy and invigorating. If it is unprejudiced, inspired by a sincere purpose, it never fails to be helpful. There can be no progress without discussion. As Socrates said long ago, it is in the travail of discussion that truth comes to birth. But the wordy warfare of our day is disquieting. It develops too readily an amazing lack of charity. Discussion is excellent but heresy hunting is deplorable. And the two things, of course, are absolutely incompatible. The struggle today is very largely unreal. Outside America it arouses practically no interest. In Great Britain thirty years ago echoes of the conflict were waning cries. In America it arouses some interest still. It flares up occasionally in sensational headlines.

The Modern Man's Religion

But it leaves the great masses of the people unmoved and I suspect uninterested. And the reason is obvious. The modern man has ceased to think of religion primarily in terms of creed. He thinks of religion rather in terms of experience. That doesn't mean that creeds are unimportant. It does mean that they are secondary. Men will always try to formulate their experience in terms of thought, and they will use the terms current in their day. But thought forms are subject to change. And men will certainly not be content with the thought forms of other ages. Some of the historic creeds of the church were shaped in the thought world of the fourth century; a world that has passed away. These creeds have been revised again and again. And they have been reinterpreted. And the process of revision will go on. There is a continuity of Christian experience which finds no parallel in Christian theology. Religion is a relation—a living relation of the soul to God. Theology is an attempt to define that relation in terms of human knowledge. It is never adequate. It can't be until knowledge is complete. Religion is eternal, theology in its essential nature is changing and expanding. It will be, it must be criticized, as age follows age and knowledge grows from more to more. The modern mind has become aware of all this, sometimes vaguely, sometimes definitely. It finds theological discussion natural. It finds dogmatic inquisitions unprofitable and futile. For a time it will be interested in a fight because it is a fight. But the interest will be superficial when the issues are outworn. It will pass away.

Naturally, the scientific spirit in religious thought has had profound reactions. I can indicate only one or two points of outstanding importance. It modified our conception of God's relation to the world. The idea of "laws of nature" has been dominant in science in our time. The scientist observes certain sequences in nature which he recognizes as causes and effects. In nature, things do not occur haphazard. We speak of the uniformity of nature; we assume that uniformity. Things don't happen by chance. We have come to think then of God as working primarily through law rather than by the abrogation of law. God works reasonably. There are things in nature that we cannot understand. Of course there are. But we do not think of God today as working primarily by breaking in upon the order of nature. Divine activity is not something additional to the ordinary activities of nature. That activity sustains and permeates all that is and all that comes to be. God is the purposive Will and Spirit in this world.

We assume the same point of view almost unconsciously when we think of human life. We see God in history, not merely in isolated events which we call interventions. It isn't by way of "visitations" that God determines the destinies of men, at least not primarily. In the development of human thought, in the purifying of human motives in the ever higher and ever nobler ideals of men, God is realizing himself. In the steady growth of a broader spirit of charity and in countless ways, that at a given time may be obscure, he is bringing his purposes to pass. Not by fits and starts, but steadily, persistently, continuously, God is working in this world. I have no doubt that that idea was pushed to extremes and it was abused. It led, for instance, in the later stages of the Victorian era to an easy-going complacency against which there has been such a violent reaction in the post-war world. People believed in "progress" and their belief had no particular foundation in fact. Face to face with undoubted evils, we consoled ourselves that things would right themselves in time. And we found that things didn't right themselves. They went down into chaos in the world tragedy of 1914. The Victorian world put its faith in a kind of natural necessity that everything would turn out well. "God's in his heaven, all's right with the world" expresses the too-easy optimism of that point of view. Progress, evolution, development, these were the magic wands, that were waved until a catastrophe proved that we were waving straws and reeds that were impotent.

The World Must Be Made Better

We realize now that progress is not a matter of natural necessity. There may be sweeps back in history in which the gains of centuries are lost. Whatever evolution means, it does not mean that things are bound to come right in time. Wrongs do not right themselves. They have to be righted or remain forever wrong. Evolution does not convert a slum into a Paradise, men and women have to do that. Evolution does not mean that you can afford to neglect the weeds in your garden. The world does not develop if left to itself. It has to be made better. The idea of progress has its dangers. It passes very easily into a naturalism which rules out will and purpose. That transition was made all too frequently in our pre-war world. But the abuse of an idea does not prove the idea false. The conception of this world as the manifestation of God; of its activities as the expressions of creative purpose; of nature as the living vesture of the Infinite; that conception remains. The conception of history as the unfolding of his will—stayed, foiled on occasion, frustrated again and again by human perversity, that conception remains. God is not a deity merely outside the world that his power first made. He is not merely one who is throned in the heavens, ruling the world only by interfering in its course now and again. The modern mind will never think of him in that way again. He has never left this world. He is the sustainer of all that is and the creator of all that comes to be. "In him we live and move and have our being."

This general point of view expresses itself in all our religious thinking. Ideas of inspiration, for instance, were necessarily modified. One of the realms of thought in which the idea of development was particularly fruitful was the domain of history. The past came to have a new significance and a new interest. Documents were sifted and analyzed as never before. Historic criticism entered upon its task. The Bible could not escape attention. Who could wish that it should? The Old Testament is the literature of a people, it is the unique record of the development, the aspirations, the ideals of a people that in its religious experience was also unique. It is a priceless treasure from any point of view. It is not a book, but a book of books. Historical science applied to the history of Israel just the same method and just the same canons, that were applied elsewhere. The scientific study of the Bible began. The whole history of Israel was subjected to searching examination. For years rationalists had pointed out contradictions and inaccuracies and seeming impossibilities. And their attacks had point while the old attitude of an inerrant Bible was maintained. They really did have some ground for merri-ment over the consternation of the religious.

But this is the remarkable thing. The scholar and the critic almost silenced the extreme rationalist within a generation. A Tom Paine or a Bob Ingersoll is almost unthinkable today. The Old Testament became more precious and more interesting than ever before. There is no reason why we should not be frank and clear about it. The Old Testament does not mean for us just what it did for our fathers, but it does not mean less for us. We admit that in the Old Testament there are statements that are contradictory. We no longer cudgel our brains in a vain attempt to reconcile them. Truth has nothing to lose from candor and honesty. We no longer discuss the questions as to the historicity of the books of Ruth, Job or Jonah. The question of historicity is beside the point. Ruth is a sweet and tender idyll, Job one of the inspired masterpieces of religious drama, Jonah the most splendid propaganda for universal religion. Here the question of historicity is meaningless. Are they inspired? Read them understandingly and judge for yourselves. Today we go to the Old Testament and there we find the wonderful record of God's guidance in the life and experience of a great people. We see that knowledge, which is life growing, age after age, and God becoming more and more real. Hebrew religion is unique. Unique because of the heights of spiritual knowledge reached and the depth of religious experience sounded by Israel. Unique because this guidance culminated in the life and person of Jesus. Here you are given glimpses into the minds and hearts of the men who come near to God—you see their lives touched to finer issues as there came to them the Word of the Lord. Inspired? God does not inspire parchments and manuscripts. He inspires men, Amos and Hosea and Micah and Isaiah and Jeremiah—if these men were not inspired, then inspiration has no meaning for me.

We are facing a real crisis. There is before us a stern conflict. And face to face with that conflict we cannot afford to squander our resources in wranglings about unimportant theological subtleties. The challenge about which I am concerned today is the challenge to Christianity as a way of life. Is the cross a principle adequate for the need of this world? Can a permanent social order be built up on the basis of Christian ethics? Can a real civilization be created by the Spirit of Love? All over the world that issue is being forced. In Europe, in China, in dramatic fashion just now, in America. Force or love, Christian decency or imperialist grab, masterful push or brotherhood? Which are our gods? That is the tremendous issue that is forced upon us by the social and international problems of our day. And it is in relation to these issues that I am anxious to range men and women of good-will under the banner of the Christ. Label yourself as you will, are you prepared to take your stand with him?

As we come face to face with the majestic figure of the Christ, do we recognize him as our Master and Lord? Looking out upon this world, perplexed, troubled and burdened as it is, do we feel that he has the words of life for humanity? Is he the hope of the future? Labels do not matter. Face to face with Jesus are you moved to confess "my Lord and my God"?

Evangelistic Leadership in Country Districts

BY SAMUEL G. NEIL

THE problem of the town is fast becoming the problem of the country. Auto transportation has brought the village and hamlet into direct touch with the big cities and the whole countryside has been opened up. Before the war our young people were fairly content with village life—today it is spoken of as "far too slow."

Instead of the church being the center of attraction, other things secure the attention, and the Christian worker in the country district is faced with the peril of drift.

The village church, as a rule, has not been sufficiently progressive, and stagnation is our greatest danger. The challenge of the present day is not being met, many of our people fail to realize that "new times demand new methods." We need a new line of appeal, more widely embracing in its application, more sympathetic in its presentation, and infinitely more reasonable in its demands. Before revival can come there must be reform within the church.

Prejudice and Custom

Too many of our opinions are based on prejudice and custom rather than upon reason and conviction. The negative instead of the positive is still being stressed. Too often the "narrow way" has been interpreted to mean the joyless and purposeless way. Few churches have set out to foster the spirit of fellowship and comradeship; religion in the minds of many is a thing which operates only in a meeting of the old-fashioned type. We have men in the churches who are willing to use scientific knowledge in connection with their treatment of the soil; they are prepared to accept the aid of anything that will assist them in their business; but they are quite unwilling to allow any change within or about the church. Frequently the differences and difficulties that divide churches can be traced to family feuds rather than to questions of doctrine.

But perhaps our greatest difficulty is that of leadership. Wherever we have strong, intelligent, spiritual leadership, we have wide-awake and aggressive churches, even in country districts. Our young people can be led, but not by men who imagine ignorance to be a virtue, or by men who regard all pleasurable things as sinful. Many of our country churches provide the finest kind of opportunities for recruiting and training young men and women for responsible positions in the church.

There are difficulties in country church work, but there are also great opportunities. American Baptists can never forget the debt they owe to country churches.

The church that hopes to retain its young people and win the outsider must turn its attention to week-day activities, as well as to Sunday service. The work of evangelism can and must be done on farm, in factory and on recreational fields, as well as in the church, and must not be left, as too frequently in the past, to one man who pays a flying visit; it must be the work of all.

The Methods of Appeal

The quiet, reverent service is as a rule the most effective and helpful. There must be ways and means of attracting people to the house of God, which each man must discover for himself. For ourselves, we have little faith in "stunt" suggestions like "politics," "gambling," "marriage" and other political and social topics. A few people may be attracted out of curiosity, but great evangelistic ministries are not built up in that way. The demand today is for an evangelism which directs its appeal to the will and reason, as well as to the emotions. A short pointed sermon, and a prayer meeting in which perfect freedom is given have been found to be effective. If the prayer is difficult, decision will be difficult also. Better and more definite preaching, better music and singing, greater soul-winning zeal on the part of the church membership, and, above all, more intensity in corporate prayer, are greatly needed. Silent prayer before making the appeal is invaluable. The gates of the new city are open on every side, and men are constrained to enter from various motives. The pastor himself has a right to ask for a verdict on his proclamation of the evangel. It is a good thing for the pastor to go into his Sunday school at least once a year and make a definite appeal to the young.

The Spirit Needed

With decision the work has only begun and it is at this point that the country church is faced with great difficulties. "The culture of souls" demands wise and consecrated leadership that keeps step with the times, and recognizes that the central verities of our faith are unalterable. The country districts wait to be won for Christ and this can be done, for the greatest forces of the known and unknown world are on our side. We need the spirit that ventures and reaps success in the place of the timid and "time-serving" spirit which makes progress impossible. Personal evangelism was central in the teaching of Jesus, central in the work of the apostles and was at the forefront of the tasks of the early church. The church must do intensive work, and then commit itself to aggressive evangelism.

The church should function not merely in matters of organization and finance, but in the more vital matter of personal evangelism. The church must go into training. It never occurs to the rank and file in our churches that it is any business of theirs to do a bit of personal evangelism—that has been left to the minister and a few choice souls, all of which is a mistake. The church as a whole must give itself up to this work. Ministers are the key men in this matter. If a church has confidence in its minister the members will follow him. Granted the ideal and moral passion, with discretion, and ways will speedily open for all. Forces are stored up within the church which if released would astonish their possessors and make for the coming of God's kingdom among men.

The Real Objective

There is a kind of casual evangelism we can all do if the desire to do it is present. But discretion must blend with enthusiasm. Too often a church is an end in itself instead of being a means to an end—the setting up of God's kingdom in the hearts of men and in the market places of the world. Each church must find out for itself the best method or methods to adopt for saving its own locality. No cut and dried arrangement can possibly do for all. The sensation monger has had his day. Granted the desire, and the thing can be done. Let the leaders lead, and the rank and file will follow. Spurgeon once said, "It is not, will the heathen be saved if I do not take him the gospel, but shall I be saved if I do not carry it." It is not primarily to get the people to church, but to Jesus, for if they find Jesus, they will desire to be associated with those who possess a similar experience and joy. We are told that five out of every six are outside our churches. We must go out and reach them. They can be reached, and it is our business to do it. A young fellow in one of our churches recently told his pastor that he had called seventy-nine times to get a certain young man, and yet, "the eighth time did it."

The Way He Leads

NO night so dark
Thy vision doth not penetrate
The gloom, and find the way
Past all the deep despairs,
And failing hopes,
And little cares,
That burden life and try the faith.
On rugged, upward paths,
And in the valleys dark with mystery
Thy voice, long pledged,
Has sounded in the heart
Of him who seeks the Holy Will.
"Fear not," Thou'st said,
"For all this dark despair.
No path runs by a way
I have not known!
Through every gloom I press
And seek along the way
The pilgrim fallen in the night
And offer strength and light."
So I move on full confident,
He leads the way.

Lincoln and His Bible

BY CORA SPEED REID

MUCH has been written concerning the religious opinions of Abraham Lincoln. This article is not intended to prove or disprove his belief in the Bible; but it is written to show the influence one Christian life may have on another. The few following extracts from the many articles and books written on the subject give us at least an idea of what those who have made it a profound study think about it.

The gift of an Oxford Bible to Mr. Lincoln by Lucy Gilmer Fry Speed, mother of Joshua Fry Speed, was so treasured by him that twenty years afterwards when he became president of the United States he had the special photograph, a reproduction of which is shown on the cover of this issue of THE BAPTIST, made for her and autographed it with the following "For Mrs. Lucy Gilmer Speed, from whose pious hands I accepted the present of an Oxford Bible twenty years ago. Washington, D. C., Oct. 3, 1861. A. Lincoln."

Lord Charnwood referring to the gift of this Bible speaks "of Lincoln's lasting friendship with Speed and his kind mother, who gave Lincoln a treasured Bible, and his kind young wife who made her husband's friend her own, and whose violet, dropped into her husband's letter to him just as he was sealing it, was among the few flowers that Lincoln ever appreciated, throw the clearest light that we can anywhere obtain on the inner mind of Lincoln."

A Crisis

The following is an extract from a sermon delivered by Euclid B. Rogers, pastor emeritus of Central Baptist church of Springfield, Ill., recently: "Then came a critical time in the life of Abraham Lincoln. Ann Rutledge was dead. The soul of young Lincoln was sad, his heart breaking, in all his sky he could find no shining star. (I quote from Coffin's 'Life of Lincoln.') He finds himself in a hospitable home. Flowers are blooming around it, balmy breezes sweep through the halls. He breathes an atmosphere of restful peace. A saintly woman sits by his side, opens the New Testament and reads the words of One who himself had been in the wilderness. The Oxford Bible which she presents him as a token of her respect and affection has given her comfort and consolation in every hour of trouble. She talks of God as a Father and of Jesus Christ as Brother. New truths dawn upon him, and the Bible becomes a different book from what it has been in the past. That home with its blooming flowers and atmosphere of peace and joy is the gateway to a new life. Little does Lucy Gilmer Speed know then God has crowned her with honor and glory to be a ministering spirit in leading a bewildered wanderer out of the despair and unbelief that he may do great things for his fellowmen. Weeks go by, the gloom and anguish disappear. The period of doubt has gone, never to return. From that hour the Bible is to be his rule of life and duty."

On one occasion Lincoln said to Speed. "Take all of this Book upon reason that you can, and the balance on faith, and you will live and die a happier man." (Extract from Speed's "Lecture on Abraham Lincoln.")

William E. Barton, one of the best known authorities on Abraham Lincoln, gives in his book "The Soul of Abraham Lincoln" several instances of Lincoln's familiarity with the Bible and says "Only a man who has read his Bible much would have been so confident."

Lincoln's biographers, those who were near him late in life, have this to say. "The late but splendid maturity of Lincoln's mind and character dates from that time, and although he grew in strength and knowledge to the end, from this year we observe a steadiness and sobriety of thought and purpose discernible in his life. And so it is that his biographers and all who were familiar with his life history feel and say that when the great account is made up and the angels of God come from the harvest fields to lay their sheaves at the feet of the Master, to the influence of Lucy Gilmer Fry Speed will be credited the changed life of Abraham Lincoln. It was her life that bade him look up and stand up and front the stars."

The Son of Man

"According to the sacred biography, Jesus grew as a human youth grows, but he surpasses all the names in history, because he drank in the highest truth of all times and all races. He was more universal and perpetual than the great moderns whom we love. His laws were for the great kingdom of which Italy and America are only states. Washington and Lincoln absorbed and expressed man's love of rights and liberty but the greater One of Palestine, after expressing the most sweeping and delicate justice, uttered the world's feelings of piety and its hopes of a second life. To the nations of man he added that vast Fatherhood to which all earthly greatness moves with solemn steps. To him all the great statesmen and philanthropists look. He is the universal ideal and guide. These great names of February are the children of one continent, the leaders of one people, but the Nazarene surpasses them, for he leads all the multitudes of many periods, and was not the son of a nation, a state, but the Son of Man."

—David Swing.

The New Slogan

Christianity has come to a juncture where it is called upon to decide whether it will challenge, champion or compromise with a civilization that is frankly based upon avarice. So affirm a host of pastors, missionaries teachers in both religious and secular schools, writers in both religious and secular periodicals, business men of the very first rank, and new maxims of cooperation and service becoming current in Kiwanis and Rotary clubs. This issue is involved in the rising discussion of the meaning and range of Christian stewardship. Here then is the battleground of true religion in the near future. The old distinction between business and philanthropy can no longer be tolerated in Christian morals. This issue can no more be evaded than could those of slavery and the liquor traffic, which in their day were merely extreme forms of profiteering as a legitimate business. Hot lips of the Christian evangelist which a few years ago were crying, "The saloon must go!" will be heard a few years hence crying, "The profiteer must go!"

The Devotional Life

Our Divine Friend

BY RALPH M. JONES

KINGS have been friends with poor men. Alexander has for his choicest friend Clitus, a man of humble birth. Richard First makes friends with his minstrel. Charles Stuart has not so good a friend among his courtiers as he has in Meiklejohn, his jester. And so it might be proved in many cases. Friendship does not imply equality. Your friend may be your friend and yet have the right to command you.

It is so in this case. Though Jesus is our friend he abrogates not one iota of his divine ascendancy. "Ye are my friends," he says, "if ye do those things which I command you." This friend has the right to command us. He is not only friend but superior. He is not only friend but Lord and Master as well.

Our Incomparable Superior.

It does not do to detract in any way from the supreme dignity of Christ. To cast him down from his supremacy is to vitiate his authority, to take away from him measurably the right and power to command us. This friend is not in any way our equal; he is our incomparable superior. He is King and we are subjects. He is Lord and we are vassals. He is Master and we are servants. And yet our friend.

"Behold," he said, "I call you no longer servants, but I call you friends."

What a privilege it is to have for our Friend this One who is so highly exalted that he has the right to command us, who was in the beginning with God, who is the word made flesh, who is Alpha and Omega, who is the chosen Son of the Eternal Father!

Do you remember how in "Ivanhoe" King Richard of England mingles as the Black Knight with Saxon thanes and serfs and yeomen, and how even the jester and the swineherd are not beneath his kind and friendly consideration. Scott makes him out much finer than he was, but I am speaking now of the fine and chivalrous

Richard that Scott shows us—friend of Wamba the jester, friend of Cedric the Saxon, friend of Gurth the swineherd, friend of Locksely the outlaw. And then one day, after Torquilstone and other stirring events, he reveals himself to these humble friends. Suddenly majesty shines down upon them out of those familiar eyes. A new dignity exalts him. And down upon their knees go Robin Hood and his free foresters, and Athelstane and Friar Tuck, and Ivanhoe, and even rebel Cedric proffers his reluctant fealty. Richard is still their friend, but he is their king, too, with power to command, and with far more power to aid them than he had before.

So with Christ and us. Our friend is the King. And though we call him Friend, we bate not one jot the deference and worship that we owe to the exalted majesty of heaven.

"Ye are my friends if ye do the things which I command you." It is the voice not only of friendship, but of authority.

He is the universal Friend. No man is so high or so humble but that he can claim this Friend as his own. No man is so high that he can do without him; no man so humble that he can repudiate this high relation. No man can possess so many friends as to make this one superfluous. No man can call himself friendless with none but this one beside him.

He is the everlasting Friend. What calamity of life, what chasm of sorrow, what bitterness of failure, what tragedy of death can separate us from his love and friendship? . . . "For I am persuaded that neither death nor life nor angels nor principalities, nor things present nor things to come . . . nor height nor depth nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Friend."

He is the incomparable friend. Is there any human friend so divinely tender, so sensitive to every ache and sorrow, so wise in his sympathy, so strong in his composure, so sure in his comfort, so gracious in his ministration, so true and loyal and loving in his comradeship? "One there is above all other well deserves the name of friend."

There are certain men I should like to have had for friends.

The Highest Privilege.

I should like to have known Abraham Lincoln. I should like to have been intimate with that kind and gracious man (Catholic though he was) who died in Baltimore. To have known Plato would have made me wise. To have known Abelard would have made me learned. To have known Shakespeare and Michael Angelo would have made me a lover of beauty. All these were choice and precious friends, and in some meager way we may enjoy them even yet. But to know Christ—to have him for a Friend—surely that is the most gracious and exalted privilege known to man. And yet it is open to all of us without distinction: "Ye are my friends if ye do the things which I command you."

Obedience is the test by which our friendship is proved. I do not know of any other test. The test is not ultimately theological, though we must put the Master superlatively high that he may have the unquestioned right to command us, and his character demands a place at God's right hand. But the ultimate test is obedience. There he himself places it. "Ye are my friends if ye do the things which I command you."

The Faith of Abraham Lincoln in His Own Words

I BELIEVE in God, the Almighty Ruler of nations, our great and good and merciful Maker, our Father in heaven, who notes the fall of a sparrow, and numbers the hairs of our heads.

I believe in his eternal truth and justice.

I recognize the sublime truth announced in the Holy Scriptures and proved by all history that those nations only are blest whose God is the Lord.

I believe that it is the duty of nations as well as of men to own their dependence upon the overruling power of God, and to invoke the influence of his Holy Spirit; to confess their sins and transgressions in humble sorrow, yet with assured hope that genuine repentance will lead to mercy and pardon.

I believe that it is meet and right to recognize and confess the presence of the Almighty Father equally in our triumphs and in those sorrows which we may justly fear are the punishment inflicted upon us for our presumptuous sins to the needful end of our reformation.

I believe that the Bible is the best gift which God has ever given to men. All the good from the Saviour of the world is communicated to us through this book.

I believe the will of God prevails. Without him all human reliance is vain. Without the assistance of that Divine Being, I cannot succeed. With that assistance I cannot fail.

Being a humble instrument in the hands of our heavenly Father, I desire that all my words and acts may be according to his will; and that it may be so, I give thanks to the Almighty, and seek his aid.

I have a solemn oath registered in heaven to finish the work I am in, in full view of my responsibility to God, with malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right as God gives me to see the right. Commending those who love me to his care, as I hope in their prayers they will commend me, I look through the help of God to a joyous meeting with many loved ones gone before.

—From "The Soul of Abraham Lincoln," by William E. Barton.

A Song Triumphant

EVERY one knows the history of Helen Keller—from birth blind, deaf and dumb—who has triumphed over seemingly unconquerable physical handicaps, with the aid of Miss Sullivan, her friend and teacher. Now this is the song of victory she sings under the title "A Chant of Darkness" and printed in the Boston Transcript:

Once in region void of light I wandered;
In blank darkness I stumbled,
And fear led me by the hand;
My feet pressed earthward,
Afraid of pitfalls.
By many shapeless terrors of the night affrighted,
To the wakeful day
I held out beseeching arms.

Then came Love, bearing in her hand
The torch that is the light unto my feet,
And softly spoke Love: "Hast thou
Entered into the treasures of darkness?
Hast thou entered into the treasures of the night?
Search out thy blindness. It holdeth
Riches past computing."

The words of Love set my spirit aflame.
My eager fingers searched out the mysteries,
The splendors, the inmost sacredness, of things,
And in the vacancies discerned
With spiritual sense the fullness of life;
And the gates of Day stood wide.

Two Cures

CAN we imagine ourselves into an illness? If we can, perhaps we can also imagine ourselves out of one—at least out of an imaginary illness. There is more than a joke in the following story told by the psychologist, Dr. J. Shaw Bolton, which he vouches for as true according to the Chicago News.

"A young bank clerk, fagged out from a protracted cold, consulted a doctor. The doctor questioned him, pounded his lungs, and then said:

"I will write you to-morrow."

"The next day the bank clerk received a letter telling him that his right lung was gone and his heart seriously deranged, and advising him to lose no time in putting his affairs in order.

"Naturally, the young bank clerk was very much depressed by this letter. Before noon he was having trouble with his respiration, while severe pains shot rapidly through his heart. He didn't get up all day, and toward midnight he had a sinking spell that caused his people to send post-haste for the doctor.

"The doctor on his arrival was astounded.

"'Why,' he cried, 'there were no symptoms of this sort yesterday! What on earth have you been doing to yourself?'

"The patient's face screwed up with pain, he pressed his hand to his breast and said feebly:

"'It's the heart, I suppose, doctor.'

"The heart? There was nothing the matter with your heart yesterday.'

"My lungs, then,' the patient groaned.

"What ails you?' the doctor shouted.

"But your letter, doctor—you told me I had only a few weeks to live.'

"Nonsense! Are you crazy? I told you to take a month's vacation in Florida and you'd be as good as new again.'

"The patient drew the fateful letter from a drawer beside his bed.

"Well,' said the doctor, glancing at it, 'this is a pretty mess. This letter was intended for another man. My secretary mixed up the envelopes.'

"The patient laughed. He sat up in bed. His recovery was rapid. That night, in fact, he was well again.

"And what of the dying consumptive who had got this young man's letter? Delighted with the prediction that a month in Florida would make a sound man of him, he packed his trunk and took the first train. That was ten years ago, and today he is in fair health."

Do You Say—

or write—ingenuous when you mean ingenious? For instance would you say, "Speaking of 'ingenuous' ways of getting people to attend church—"? Not unless you mean methods that are frank, free from dissimulation, high-minded or sincere—all of which might indeed apply to such a task as this. But if in the sentence you have in mind some new, clever, catchy method of getting at people who do not respond to the usual invitation then the word you want is ingenious. The words are as often mistaken for one another as ever were any twin sisters who look alike to the eye, but may be quite opposites in disposition. There is an ingenious way of doing things and there is an ingenious way—but each has its individual meaning.

MISS Lydia Clark, director of physical education for women at the Ohio State University gives these rules for adults as an aid to keeping in good health:

Stand and sit correctly.

Sleep eight to nine hours with open windows.

Drink six glasses of water each day.

Exercise one hour daily; if possible, take up some sport.

Eat fresh vegetables and fruit each day.

Have a hobby which will change your mental outlook.

Leave your business worries at the office, and learn to play.

Relax when sitting or lying down.

Have a yearly physical examination.

And we would add—Forget yourself and live for others.

BOYS and Girls

Exciting Moments with the Lhotas

By R. B. LONGWELL, IMPUR, ASSAM

"NOT in my day will this new custom of you foreigners come into my village!" The angry chief of Okotsu fairly threw these words at the missionary who smiled as sweetly as he could and asked calmly, "Why do you not want Christianity here? Are not the half dozen fellows who have been down to Impur to the Baptist Mission School good youths? Do they not work well out in the cultivations? And what would you do without the young schoolteacher or your village children?"

As the Sahib spoke, the chief shifted his position, dropped his eyes a bit, and when coming closer answered in a low voice rather sadly, "I know it is good. It will come—the young men—I cannot restrain them from learning—but,"—and again he stiffened up, drew back and said, "Not in my day."

Only once before had the missionary visited the little village of Okotsu, which is located in the eastern hills of Assam near the boundary line of Burma. Many sturdy mountain tribes such as the Nagas, Kukis and Lhotas are still uncivilized, and the language of some has not yet been put into writing. At the invitation of the Christian schoolteacher, the missionary had now come to inspect his work and also to examine for baptism about twenty of the Lhotas who wished to unite with the little church of which he was leader.

It was shortly before noon when the Sahib, as the natives called the missionary, arrived at the village and met the young teacher. To his surprise he learned that there were only about a dozen women and children in the village, as everybody else was out on the cultivations and would not return until the late afternoon. He was aware that the Christians were suffering some persecutions at the hands of the non-Christians and so suggested that if those that were to be examined for baptism could come soon, the baptism might be quietly observed in a secluded mountain pool in the presence of the other Christians before the rest of the villagers returned from their work. All went as planned and it was announced at the baptismal service that at four o'clock communion would take place in the crude school and worshiphouse combined, which the Christians themselves had built.

Four o'clock came, and as the missionary looked out from his tent to the other end of the village street, he could not see a person going to the little church.

"This is unusual," thought he, "as generally these hill people come very early to a service." Four-thirty and five

Our New Name!

Dear Boys and Girls:

A new name is always lots of fun, and there's a bit of mystery about ours, I think! The editors chose the "Boys and Girls" name, and I chose "The Explorers' Club" name, because I have some rather thrilling plans which will keep us all busy for months to come—Exploring! Exploring! Exploring! For every month there will be a special thing for you to explore; but before we begin I think we ought to know who some of the other (famous!) explorers were, so who can mail to me before February 15 the longest list of explorers and what they explored? Your "finds" will be printed on our page, and every week until March you will find stories here about famous explorers. Send your lists to Miss Margaret Applegarth, 21 Arnold Park, Rochester, N. Y.

came and passed and still no one went to the church! He did notice, however, that a crowd of rough men, about forty in number, were gathered at the upper end of the village. They were earnestly talking in subdued tones but he was so concerned about the "four o'clock service-to-have-been" that he gave this group only a passing glance. What surprised him most was that even the teacher did not show himself to offer any explanation. Had the Christians not understood the announcement? Or had he by some tactless move or word offended them? Six o'clock arrived. The full moon of January was just lifting itself above the eastern horizon. The evening meal was almost ready. The meeting house was as lonesome as ever. The crowd at the upper end of the village now numbered about a hundred and was decidedly noisy. At this moment the teacher appeared in front of the tent.

"What is the matter?" the missionary demanded. "Why have the Christians not come to the communion service?" The teacher replied calmly to the rather excited question, "I think we will omit the service." Indignantly the missionary asked, "Why?"

"They are making plans," the teacher said, "to do a lot of things against us Christians and the first thing is to kill you."

"Well, that is an interesting program, the first act of which you say is to cut off my head! What then?"

"Then I am to be killed," he replied with a shudder, "and Etsusao and all the Christians will be cut up and the little church destroyed. Oh, what shall we do?"

"What shall we do?" The missionary had seen more pleasant outlooks, behind was an almost trackless forest full of wild and ferocious animals, before them was a crowd of cruel, maddened men who wanted to kill a mere handful of their own number that had accepted "the foreigner's custom," after having cut off the head of the white foreigner to whom now the handful of native Christians were looking for advice and protection.

The missionary turned quickly and called his cook and the mission school boys he had with him, and said, "Pack everything. Get ready for quick flight if this is necessary."

Just as they turned to carry out the commands, the leader of the mob called out announcing their plans, which were even as the schoolteacher had said. The Sahib turned, and going into his tent, for one moment knelt in prayer. As he arose, the mob had come up to the tent even so close as to interfere with the guy ropes. The missionary picked up his new double-barrelled shot gun, loaded it and stepped outside of the tent. It was surrounded on three sides. At the front stood the group of Christians. He felt that he must protect the boys first, so told them to file past the mob and he would protect them and himself as best he could. But no,—they quietly said, "Sahib, we will follow you." He knew action must be immediate, and with his finger on the trigger and the muzzle of the gun just above the head of the crowd, he walked past the mob and out of the village, the two boys and a few of the Christians following. The mob stood as if transfixed by this coolness; or was it in the words of Daniel, "My God hath sent his angel and hath shut the lions' mouths?"

Out of the village about one-eighth of a mile the party came to a recently harvested field, and in it an elevation which had been used for a threshing floor. They concluded to turn aside and wait here until the rest of the village Christians should have time to overtake them. Two of those who were with the missionary were stationed at this place.

These guards had no more than taken their stand when two of the chief men of the village came, and, pretending to be friendly, demanded to see the Sahib. With gun in hand he talked with them, listening to all their explanations as to this sudden change of tactics. He utterly disbelieved them, however, drawing his own conclusion that they were afraid of being reported to the officers of the British government. As they continued to press their case the Christians kept coming up one by one, bringing with them the tent and other impedimenta

From pages 255 to 406 of "A Short History of the Christian Church" you will find a great deal about the Reformation and the divisions of the church thereafter.

If you will look back to the topic for Jan. 24, you will note that it was suggested that a Bible be locked in a cash box. If this method of presentation was not used at that time, perhaps you can do this as a preliminary, but very briefly.

Going on, tell of the period of time within which the autocracy of the pope existed—drawing the parallel of the key in his hands. Show that if the box containing the Bible had been put away for that long a time, the Bible therein would have become musty. Just so, the ideals and teachings of the church had become musty from being kept away from the people. The key to the box should be taken up, with the statement that the key to the church had been literally forced out of the hands of the pope, and the church opened, at the same time opening the box. Then tell that in order to get the mustiness away from the church, in order to rid it of all vileness, it had to be fumigated. Show how the Bible would be fumigated after having been laid away for years—by being placed in the sunlight and fresh air. Show that just so the church had had to be fumigated—brought into the sunlight of Christ's teachings and into the fresh air of godliness.

The result of this process, the growth of the church and the spread of the gospel should be shown, leading up to the beginnings in America.

Youthful Evangelism

An air of subdued excitement seemed to pervade the auditorium. Those at the rear of the church noticed that the front seemed empty. Excited whisperings were heard outside the doors. Hearts beat faster with a thrill of expectancy. As the first notes of the organ were heard, necks were craned—and eyes were well rewarded. A steady stream of children wended their way to the front of the church, followed by older girls and boys, those of the teen age. Clean, happy faces they had—that wonderful looking group. They seemed to be tingling with life—overflowing with the joy of living.

Through the first part of the program they seemed restless—as if anxious to get on to another part. And then their time came. As the Boy Scouts and Camp Fire Girls presented the flags, the others sang.

But as the evangelist arose to give his message, these young folks settled down in earnest, and they were well rewarded as they heard about the "Lessons from the Old Steamship."

So were the young people of the Temple church of Brooklyn initiated into the week of evangelism. Each day during that week there were two meetings, one in the afternoon for the juniors, and one later for the older young people. And how could these young people help but come when they would hear about "The End of the Rainbow" or "The Cup of Life" or "The Wordless Book" or "Kites and Aeroplanes" or "Doll Pageant of the Nations." When the appeal was made to them in such every-day interesting phrases, how could they but decide for the right way of living?

You are probably wondering why all of this—what relation this has to you. Don't you see? This is the "evangelism season" for the denomination. The young people are being depended on for a share in the work. What better way than this could there be to get the thing going?

If you are a pastor, perhaps you could decide to have your evangelistic services similar to this—by having a regular "children's program" on Sunday, and then continue during the week with meetings for them. Naturally, you will interest the parents as well as the children and young people.

After these young folks have the matter of Christian living presented to them in terms which they understand, they will more than likely take the stand for Christ. And what better way is there of evangelizing the world, than starting with the children and bringing them up from the start in the right way!

Or, if you are the president of a young people's society, perhaps you could talk over with your cabinet the idea, then present it to the pastor or deacons, and see if the society cannot sponsor such meetings for the younger ones of the Sunday school or neighborhood.

By the way, evangelism is one of the points under the Christian Life program. You know what that means!

March

You're going to hear it once. You're going to hear it twice. You're going to hear it three times, four times, five times—as many times as we can get you to listen. Hear ye: March—the month of self-denial—special Easter offering.

Get it? That means that during March we are asked to deny ourselves something—a luxury, perhaps a necessity—and give the money to missions. You don't have any luxuries? Well there surely is something which you can give up during this month. There is that candy at noon or that dessert. Perhaps it will be the gum we are so fond of chewing or a new book. Maybe it will be something big—a dress or hat, or shoes. Whatever it is, surely for one month we can deny ourselves something in order that missions may go on.

"Oh," you say, "but I am tithing now—giving my tithe to the church and missions." Good for you. But now, don't you think that God would like a little over and above that "debt"—a thank offering from you?

Or, perhaps you'll say, "But I can't give much. My little won't be missed." Yes, every little bit—no matter how small it may be—if held back will be missed. For you see "the whole is equal to the sum of all its parts," as they say in geometry, and if your part is withheld the "whole" will not be complete. There will be money missing. It may mean that some child will have to do without a meal—one of those hungry little children in far off lands. Or perhaps it will mean that some person here in our own country will not learn of Christ, because your dime or nickel is withheld.

Now you'll help, won't you? That's the way.

In Colorado they have already started on their campaign. The special banks which have been made for you to put in your pennies, nickels, dimes, quarters, dollars (you choose which it will be) are going out. It looks as if they were going to have two months instead of one, doesn't it?

All of this leads to this: If you notice that by the first of March you have not received one of these banks, you might go to your pastor and tell him that you would like to have one. If he hasn't any, both of you might tell your young people's society president. If he hasn't any either, you might all get after your state promotion director. Then maybe you won't have some action!

Among Ourselves

Advancing India

By W. L. FERGUSON

The close of 1925 is at hand, for Christmas is on the morrow; and this is not a bad time in which to take stock and find out what has been accomplished in this empire for good or for ill during the past months.

Though the unrest has not been so marked as at some other times since the great war, nevertheless, India is far from having attained to a state of settled equilibrium. Politically the conditions are very much upset. But on the whole progress has been making towards co-operation with the British in authority. It now seems to be quite generally recognized by all party leaders that if changes are to be brought about in a constitutional way, the thing to do is not to refuse office or membership in the legislatures, but to accept them and to work for and effect changes from the inside. The Swarajists (radical home rulers) have gained considerably in power and in representation in the various municipal councils and in the legislatures; and their program is much more balanced than it was a year or two ago. This is a hopeful sign.

Two Objectives

The two great things for which India is asking now are the abolition of diarchy as a method of administration in government, and total prohibition. Diarchy takes its name from the present scheme of reforms, which were brought into force in 1921, and which provided for certain parts of the government administration to be transferred and other parts to be retained. The transferred departments were put into the hands of Indian ministers, chosen from the local legislative councils; and the retained departments were kept in the hands of the British. The governor of each province serves as the coordinating head of the departments, and has the power of veto and certification over the heads of legislative councils. It is claimed that this system is impracticable. And what the politicians now demand is its abolition and in place of it a legislature with full powers of law-making and taxation, and with ministers directly responsible to it. A further installment of the reform is promised for 1929; but many are the voices saying this is too long a time to wait. As for prohibition of the liquor traffic, great progress has been made towards its attainment. Already four of the native states have adopted it for themselves and the question has been brought forward very strongly in most of the provincial legislative councils, and in the legislative assembly at Delhi, where a full-dress debate was held and a resolution passed declaring that India wishes this relief. There are two great hindrances in the way of its accomplishment. First, the habits and desires of the Europeans resident in the land, who think prohibition is tyranny and a violation of personal liberty; and, secondly, the immense loss of revenues which government would have to recoup from other and now invisible sources. This sum is now Rs. 200,000,000 per annum, and in this Madras Presidency means some 38 per cent of the total revenue of the province. But the fight is on, and the demand is increasing that liquor shall be banished. An All-India prohibition convention is to be held in Delhi at the end of January, 1926.

The Financial Status

Financially depression has been upon us for the past four years, and only during recent months has the pressure been a bit lifted. It is too early to say whether permanent relief is in sight. What improvement has taken place has not been enough to cause a demand for increased labor. There still go about the streets thousands of workless people. Great strikes have been on in the Bombay cotton mills. The mill owners refused the increased wages demanded by the workers on the ground that the cotton duties were so oppressive that they could not pull on further with the trade if wages had to go up. Competition from abroad, Japan, say, would ruin them. After nearly three months of idleness, on the intervention of the governor of Bombay and the viceroy the strike came to an end. The government brought it about by suspending the cotton excise dues for a period pending fresh consideration, and the mill owners thereupon granting concessions to the workers. A royal commission is now at work in India looking into the whole question of exchange and finance. For a long time past exchange has been heavily against America and Britain. Instead of receiving Rs. 308 to the $100, which is par, we have been getting only Rs. 270 or thereabouts. It is easy to be seen how seriously this affects missions and foreign mission societies. It is hoped that the commission will see its way to effect currency reforms and to bring exchange back to the pre-war basis, that is to say, to par with the dollar and the pound.

The monsoon rains have been abundant this year, and famine conditions seem to have been averted generally. Planters are rejoicing over the boom which has come to rubber, tea, coffee and cotton during the past months. One of our local papers here in Madras is fond of preaching to American rubber manufacturers and dealers that the enhanced prices are not exorbitant and that they have nothing about which legitimately to complain; but Americans, according to papers coming from their land seem to think otherwise. Meantime the cost of "flivvering" increases.

The Women's Christian college, Madras, recently dedicated its fine new science building, which cost more than Rs. 500,000. This is one of the first fruits in India of the special fund raised in America some three or four years ago for the relief of seven colleges in the Orient, and in the campaign for which Mrs. H. W. Peabody did such noble service.

The Andhra Christian Council early in December held a very successful meeting at Bezvada. The council consists of delegates and representatives from missions of nearly all kinds at work in the Telugu country. The sessions were presided over by the Bishop of Dornakal, who is the first and only Indian to become a bishop thus far. He made a fine officer and kept the council hard at work all the time. The new Emily Coles memorial for the Nellore training schools is nearing completion. It is a handsome structure, with a beautiful clock with chimes in the tower. The whole plant is the gift of Dr. J. Ackerman Coles, of New Jersey, and adds one more to the many fine things he has done towards the equipment of the Telugu mission with buildings for its use.

Between Now and May

How much our mental condition has to do with our view of the task ahead! With the winter solstice past, Northern Baptists face, in respect to the unified budget, the necessity of accomplishing in three months, financing that should have been spread over a period twice as long. This is no new state of affairs, but there is something decidedly new about the spirit in which the duty is faced. Everybody feels it and probably very few doubt that we will end the year with our budget satisfactorily balanced. Considered as a state of mind, the Northern Baptist position shows a great improvement when one makes comparison with the situation a year ago.

Actually the amount to be raised during the closing months of the fiscal year

An Invocation

By NEWTON G. THOMAS

HELP us to know thy hand
Discern thy living word
What e'er, where'er thou writest

is a little less than the amount that was raised in the same relative period last year, but fortunately we have developed in something less than a twelve-month a mental attitude like that which gave rise to the French slogan at Verdun, "They shall not pass". Wherever Baptists have come together in recent months it has been easy to sense the surer feeling of solidarity that is gripping the denomination, the sort of teamwork spirit that found high expression in the Chicago conference last December. That is why, although the job is not to be minimized, the state and national officers who are responsible for rounding out the budget are going about the work in the cheerful conviction that the denomination will see them through to a successful issue.

To raise 64 per cent of our budget in less than one-third of a year—that is the measure of our task in terms of arithmetic. It is too high a percentage, but one may lessen its seriousness by reflecting that at this time last year the percentage that loomed head was still higher. Perhaps "gloomed" would be the better word to apply to that period in the early part of the year 1925. There is no gloom now. If we have not moved very far, we have moved in the right direction; we have made our gain by sound, non-spectacular methods that make for true growth in that basic unit of our organization, the local church. It will, of course, take time to conquer utterly the habit of "bunching" our missionary payments instead of distributing them with reasonable uniformity throughout the year, but think how a few years will cause that burden of interest charges to shrink if we keep climbing even at a moderate rate, and every year cut down somewhat the percentage that remains to be raised in the last few months!

We have always to beware of overconfidence and we should not, of course, be lulled into undue serenity by the fact that our budget is very small when one considers the financial power lodged in the elements that make up the Northern Baptist Convention. On the contrary we should all, from the largest organized body down to the individual member, exert ourselves to see that the budget total is provided not only on time but ahead of time.

Meetings in Easter Week

Plans for an all-congregational meeting in every Baptist church during the week following Easter are being developed, and more will be given out about them later. A poster to announce the meeting in the local churches is under consideration and will probably be issued. The general idea of the plan is to have each church, after the Easter offerings are all in, call a meeting to take stock of its position with respect to missionary payments. If some of the money is still unpaid, the church should be urged to take vigorous action to see that the money is raised during the remaining three weeks, so that the good faith of the denomination may not suffer. The planning and carrying out of the get-together will be left to the local church to a much greater extent than was the case with the world outlook week rallies last year, but it is sincerely hoped that each church will call this kind of a "clean-up" meeting during Easter week. If the amount has been raised it will be in the nature of a celebration and a discussion of next year's plans. If the money is not all in, the meeting will resolve itself into a ways and means committee to plan how it can be raised before April 30.

First Church, Des Moines, Recalls Old Times

By JAY A. LAPHAM

As we count time in this young country it is a long stretch from Jan. 18, 1851 to Jan. 16-19, 1926. The earlier date is the time when Rev. John A. Nash and ten others organized the First Baptist church in a little log cabin in Des Moines. Mr. Charles McKay, at the age of ninety-eight, is the only one of the ten living. He sent words of greeting from Indianola, Iowa, where he now lives.

Mr. A. M. Piper was appointed chairman of a committee to make arrangements for the celebration of this important event in the history of the church. Saturday night, Jan. 16, saw a large number at the general reception given by the women's association for all members of the church and congregation. At this time a reception was given to Rev. Harold N. Geistweit and Mrs. Geistweit who have just come among us.

Dressed in costumes suited for the styles of seventy-five years ago, Mrs. Charlotte Van Ginkel Dye and Mrs. A. M. Piper gave old-time instrumental pieces and songs. Bountiful tables were set with old-fashioned dishes and curries for over 300 people. The hours for social cheer and reminiscences were heartily enjoyed. Then the people wended the way to the miniature meeting house of 1851. A number were dressed to picture the church-going of that year. Mr. S. E. Wilcox had written a vivid history of the church. This was listened to with deep interest. Dr. Howland Hanson, for fifteen years pastor of the church, preached a powerful sermon of faith. Dr. H. L. Stetson, for four years pastor of the church and for ten years president of Des Moines college, was the guest of honor. Doctor Stetson is now eighty-two years old, but is still teaching in Kalamazoo college.

Sunday

The weather continued perfect through the celebration. Five of the twelve pastors that served the church in the seventy-five years were present and responded by letter. The letters were read by Mr. A. M. Piper and Mr. J. I. Cochrane, from Dr. Walter M. Walker, Dr. Howland Hanson and Rev. Robert T. Craig. A letter was also read from Mrs. H. W. Tilden of Maine, whose husband was pastor of the church at the time that the new building was erected 1890-1898. Dr. H. L. Stetson had a warm welcome as he told his experience in uniting the two Baptist churches that he found near each other down town in 1887.

The music all through the services was a great inspiration. A vast audience in the auditorium and gallery greeted Pastor Harold N. Geistweit as he arose to give the stirring message of the morng from Paul's words, "I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision."

At the Sunday-school hour, former superintendents A. M. Piper, Frank True, Mills Alldredge, and J. H. Cochane sat on the rostrum. Miss Jessie Sankey gave an interesting history of the Sunday school. Superintendent Marcelus Kirtley, recently elected, gave a live talk and set a goal for the school of an enrolment of 1,000 by the close of the year 1926.

The young folks had an interesting and helpful part in all the services. They gave a reception for the young people at the regular hour of B. Y. P. U. Mr. Fred Freil led a song service and a short history of B. Y. P. U. was given by Prof. Charles Perry.

In the evening hour Dr. J. W. Million, president of Des Moines university faced a very large audience, with happy words of greeting from the university. Pastor Harold N. Geistweit gave a strong message on "For the Sake of Tomorrow." The day had been full and inspiring from morning till evening. God was manifestly with his people. The music was of a high order as is regularly true at the First church.

The Closing Service

President E. H. Rhoades of the Northern Baptist Convention sent hearty words of greeting as did Governor John Hammill and Mayor Carl M. Garver. Dr. G. P. Mitchell, executive secretary, brought greetings from Iowa State Convention. Dr. John A. Earl of Chicago held the large audience with an address on "What of the Future?" In earnest words he maintained that love, the love of God, must finally prevail in all the earth. Dean Raymond Carr and Mrs. Carr rendered excellent music, and the Shrine Chanters, directed by George F. Ogden, captured the audience.

The informal reception sponsored by several of the young people from Sunday-school classes was enjoyed by a large number. The history of the church that cost Mrs. S. E. Wilcox much research and study, revealed the fact that the church has given much more largely for benevolences since 1920 than ever before. The church has great reason to thank God and take courage. Pastor Harold N. Geistweit is warmly received by the church and congregation, and he has entered upon the large task with zeal and many promising plans.

Montana News and Notes

BY ROBERT W. SHAW

The most recent thing of importance in this state was the ministers' conference held at Bozeman, Jan. 19-22. Rev. Donald Williamson of New York, Rev. V. W. Dyer of Rangoon, Burma, and Rev. F. E. Eden of Denver were the leaders. About two-thirds of the ministers of the state were present and, taken all together, it was a helpful and inspiring conference. The vote was cast to have one next year.

During the conference there were several matters of local importance considered. It seems likely that practically every Baptist church in the state will have an evangelistic meeting this year. Some evangelists will be engaged, but a number of churches are using local pastors. From now on evangelism will be the order in most of the churches.

Another matter was getting under the financial campaign. Montana fully expects to raise its quota.

The Assembly

Already Dean Smith of the assembly commission is getting matters under way for the coming assembly which will be held on the Baptist's own grounds beginning July 20. There will be several national workers present to take care of teaching, and one or two local men will be on the faculty. The plan this year is to take care of all who can come, but

Northern Baptist Convention

BY HENRY W. O. MILLINGTON

The Baptists of Washington are looking forward to the coming of the Northern Convention in May. Our great auditorium has been engaged, with its seating capacity of 6000. There is also an exhibit hall which will provide the finest accommodations that we have ever had on one floor for all our organizations. Already applications are coming in for hotel accommodations, and from now on our Baptist people in Washington will be increasingly busy in the matter of the entertainment of the convention. The chairman of the general committee is Rev. William S. Abernethy, pastor of Calvary church, who has selected an executive committee of five, and a still larger organization consisting of the chairmen of the numerous committees. The chairmen of the more important committees, with their addresses, are as follows:

Finance—W. W. Everett, % Woodward and Lothrop.

Hotels and Entertainment—Col. D. H. Sawyer, % Calvary Baptist Church.

Registration—Mr. H. Loren Fassett, 1408 Emerson Street.

Publicity—Rev. E. O. Clark, 217 East Raymond St., Chevy Chase, Maryland.

Banquets—Mr. E. H. De Groot, Jr., 1309 Spring Road.

Music—Percy S. Foster, 713 14th Street, N. W.

Information—Mr. John Ruthven, 4803 Illinois Avenue.

Women's Meetings—Mrs. O. E. Howe, 434 Park Road.

Entertainment of Missionaries—Mrs. H. M. Kendrick, The Cumberland.

Pulpit Supply—Rev. H. W. O. Millington, 320 Woodward Building.

All communications, according to their particular interest, should be addressed to the committees thus named. It is quite probable that the attendance at this convention will be the largest that Northern Baptists have ever known, and while we have exceptional hotel accommodations, it is quite desirable that those intending to come should secure their reservations without delay.

those who do not register in advance must come prepared to rough it for the ten days, as there are accommodations for only 100 at present. No doubt this year's assembly will be one of the best ever held.

State Convention

The state convention will hold its annual meeting at Bozeman in May. The church has appointed its committee on arrangements and they are at work getting ready to welcome the visitors and delegates and to take care of them. A strong program will be prepared.

Some Resignations and Other Notes

Two or three of our best leaders are leaving the state. Rev. Z. C. O'Farrell has left Butte and is now located in Florida. A change was necessary on account of Mrs. O'Farrell's health. The same thing was true in the case of Mrs. Millam and Mrs. Mack, whose husbands were engaged in the district work. The Millams have gone to Arizona, and the Macks to Michigan. We hope these brethren will return to us some day. They have labored well and have made large contributions to the Baptist work in this state.

The church at Belgrade with Rev. Roy E. Reece as pastor is cooperating in a union meeting. Rev. Paris Wells is the evangelist. The meeting will bring a number into the Baptist church.

The Bozeman church is greatly encouraged. A feature of the year is that at each communion meeting since October there have been members received. Others are to be received soon. It looks as if more members will be received this year than for several years. The Sunday school gradually is forging to the front.

The well known work of the Home Mission societies among the Crow Indians is in Montana. Gradually the work enlarges. A recent matter of interest is the erection of a chapel on the upper Big Horn at St. Xavier. This chapel was built by special gifts from brethren all over the world. On the day of dedication the Indians took an offering for missions.

Rev. W. F. Frazier, who has been engaged as state evangelist, is now holding a meeting at Missoula. Reports are encouraging. Other churches will claim his services during the coming months.

North Dakota News Notes

The holidays were saddened for Mrs. Fred E. Stockton and family by the death of Mrs. Stockton's youngest sister, Mrs. Carl Matthews, at Meadville, Pa., Dec. 22. Jan. 8, Mrs. Stockton's father, S. J. Swisher, died in the same city.

The Crystal church has suffered the loss of two of its faithful members, Hugh Ralston and Mrs. James Mitchell. Mr. Ralston was moderator of the Red River Valley association.

Mrs. B. L. Barckley of the Page church died in a Fargo hospital, Jan. 19.

The sympathy of the Baptists of North Dakota is extended to the bereaved families.

The two Baptist churches of Fargo are moving steadily forward. The First church of which Dr. H. R. Best is pastor, expects to start work on its new Sunday-school plant early in the spring. Over $36,000 has already been subscribed for this purpose. The Calvary church of which Rev. C. W. Finwall is pastor has closed a successful year. Reports at the annual meeting showed all bills paid and a substantial balance on hand. This church is also under the necessity of erecting a new plant in the near future.

The Valley City church with Rev. W. A. Weyhrauch, pastor, has succeeded during the year in wiping out a floating indebtedness. The pastor has opened a promising field near McHenry. A number have been baptized.

Rev. John Bucknell, our Russian missionary, has just completed six months of service in North Dakota. Twenty-one have been baptized. The Max church is raising a fund for a new church building. The Dogden church is planning to buy the Congregational church building in that place.

The city of Bismarck has just concluded a six weeks' service of union revival meetings. A number have united with our church. Rev. A. A. Holmes began work on this field April 1. About forty new members have been received since that time, twenty-six uniting by baptism.

Evangelist and Mrs. E. G. Aldridge held a series of meetings at Powers lake preceding the holidays. There were thirty-nine conversions and twenty-five who enlisted for life service. One woman drove thirty-five miles to follow Christ in baptism. During the holidays Mr. and Mrs. Aldridge held a series of meetings with the Rutland Swedish Baptist Church. Pastor Carl Olaf Hogfelt writes enthusiastically about the results. "I never felt so grateful to God as I did New Year's Eve when I followed into baptismal waters four young men and two young ladies." Jan. 15 four others were baptized. The evangelist and his wife are now conducting meetings at Bottineau where Rev. Stephen E. Gregg is pastor.

The board of managers of the State Convention will hold its mid-year meeting in Fargo, Feb. 26. On the evening of this day, Dr. J. Whitcomb Brouger of Los Angeles will be in Fargo to deliver his famous lecture, "Play Ball."

San Francisco Tidings

BY LOUIS J. SAWYER

Our five American churches gain one pastor in the person of Rev. Joseph B. Travis who comes after twenty years of honored service in California, to Twenty-first Avenue. The Tabernacle loses Rev. F. S. Lawrence who is retiring from a vigorous ministry of forty-five years, forty-two of which have been spent upon the Pacific slope.

Evangelist A. E. Lysell led a special series of meetings in Swedish with Pastor J. S. Lundgren of the First Swedish church, a large number of whose members were Brother Lysell's parishioners in the Salem church previous to its union with the First church. A gracious ministry is that of the Calvary Presbyterian church which has an annual week of spiritual uplift services, conducted this year by Rev. Cortland Myers of Los Angeles and which were of profound value.

The Baptist Ministerial association has had a series of superb addresses on its recent programs. Dean Cadman of the University of California and Prof. C. E. Rugh have presented the moral and social aspects of student life from an intimate understanding and with great practical benefit to their hearers. Rev. J. Orrin Gould of the Twenty-third Avenue church spoke illuminatingly of "The Sacred Books of the Mormons." Robert Newton Lynch, executive secretary of the chamber of commerce, addressed the association on "California and the Oriental" at its last meeting.

A dozen churches "tuned in" on Sunday morning to hear over KTAB from the Tenth Avenue church the address by Dr. J. Whitcomb Brouger pastor-elect of the First Oakland church, on "Play Ball." Oakland also welcomes Rev. J. Jensen as the new pastor of the Dano-Norwegian Church and Rev. J. D. Lincoln to the 85th Avenue (negro) church.

Hamilton Square celebrated its forty-fifth anniversary at its annual roll call on Feb. 5. The church is happy in the fourth year of the second pastorate of Dr. Louis J. Sawyer. The First church has recently secured Rev. William D. Holt, formerly associated with Johnston Myers in Cincinnati and Chicago, to assist Pastor James S. West in the pastoral care of his large constituency.

Two Baptist training schools are in operation, one on each side of the bay. Each school numbered 125 students at the opening session. Dr. Millard L. Thomas is the inspiring genius and is assisted by an unusually competent faculty.

The Bay district mourns with many friends the death of Mrs. E. A. Hanley, wife of our First, Berkeley, pastor. Funeral services were held on Monday, Jan. 18. Pres. C. M. Hill, Dr. C. E. Tingley, Dr. J. W. Johnson, Dr. J. W. Bailey and Prof. Herbert F. Evans, all members of Doctor Hanley's church, assisted in the service.

District of Columbia

BY HENRY W. O. MILLINGTON

The Chevy Chase church dedicated its first building with a series of services, Jan. 17-21. The service of dedication was held on Sunday afternoon, with the sermon preached by Dr. T. Claggett Skinner, of Columbia, S. C., and the dedication prayer offered by Dr. William Allen Wilbur. At the morning service the Rev. John D. Clark, of Towson, Md., father of the pastor, preached the sermon. During the week there were three services held, the first with the community pastors present, the second was denominational night when our Baptist pastors had their turn, and Thursday night was observed as church home night, when the different organizations of the church were represented by appropriate remarks with a concluding address by Hon. Grant M. Hudson, Michigan.

This church is an association project having been organized two years ago what is probably Washington's choice suburb. There were thirty-seven charter members, and the number has now increased to 108. The church bought a fine lot, splendidly located, and has just completed an attractive house of worship. It is expected that eventually present property will be moved to rear of the lot to give place to a permanent structure that will be in keeping with the requirements of such a community. In June, 1924, Rev. Edward Clark was called to the pastorate. Mr. Clark has been faithful in his ministry, gaining the confidence of the people and has developed the work at Chevy Chase in a strong way. This church will naturally be, in all essentials, one of our best churches in the coming year.

On Jan. 15 a conference on evangelism was held under the auspices of the cooperative committee on evangelism at the Northern Convention. The leaders present were Rev. A. B. Strickland, I. W. E. Chalmers, and Dr. J. A. Hain. The conference attracted a large attendance from our different churches, and promises to be of some real value in Baptist life in Washington.

Dr. Samuel J. Porter has just closed his first year as pastor of the First church, and the event was marked with special services, on Sunday, Jan. 17. This year has been marked by substantial development along all lines. A Sunday evening club has been organized under the direction of the pastor, with a view to enlisting the whole membership in "go-to-church" campaign. This effort already demonstrating its value.

Shaohing Preachers' Institute

BY A. F. UFFORD

From Dec. 3 to 13 preachers from the Chakiang-Shanghai Baptist association together with visitors from the Presbyterian churches in Yuyao met at Shaohing for a ten days' institute.

The leaders were Rev. T. C. Bau, secretary of the Chekiang-Shanghai Baptist association; Rev. Tsoh Kyien-dor, district pastor in Huchow; Mr. Chen Ien-san of the University of Nanking; College of Agriculture and Forestry Extension Bureau; Secretary Zia of Ningpo Y. M. C. A.; Mr. Gordon Potter of Shanghai college; Mr. J. F. Williams, Sunday-school secretary of the Chinese Baptist Publication society; Dr. J. Shoemaker of Yuyao; and Pres. Robert Fitch of Hangchow college.

The main topics for the study period 9 to 12 in the morning and 2 to 3:35 in the afternoon, were the Sunday school, the Sermon on the Mount, evangelism, the rural church, civics, and the care of church members. Each evening was given over to a general meeting to which the Christian community was invited.

The fact that the meeting was held in the cool season of the year made possible a sustained attitude of serious study on the part of these present. One man expressed the experience of all when he said that in both the lower school and in the theological seminary he had at times been troubled with drowsiness, but that during the institute he had not been drowsy once. It would be a mistake, however, to attribute the alertness of the members wholly to the cool weather. The enthusiasm of the teachers was at once compelling and contagious.

Two things that came out in the discussions are indicative of what a fairly representative cross section of the Chekiang ministry is thinking. In one of the periods on evangelism the question was raised as to whether the present was a good time for preaching. The response was immediate and unanimous. All agreed that the present is the best time for preaching that has ever been known and likewise the most difficult. It was felt that the old line of argument which attempted to prove the superiority of Christianity from the superiority of Western civilization was shattered, but that a new evangel which placed Christ at the center was the need of the hour. The question of finance received considerable attention, especially from the representatives of the Chekiang-Shanghai Baptist association in which group "devolution" has already reached an advanced stage. The declared policy of the association is to diminish the grants to the churches each year until such time as the churches become entirely self-supporting. Since the cost of living is rising rapidly the churches see little hope of reaching self-support on the present basis. The secretary of the association asked for the frankest criticism of the present organization and suggestions as to ways in which savings in the annual budget might be effected. He was taken at his word and several radical suggestions were brought in looking toward a general reduction in administrative expense with a view to establishing in this way a fund that would be available to aid the churches when the grants from the mission ceased.

At the close of these ten days two conclusions thrust themselves upon me. One is that the Chinese pastors have never been more keenly alive to their responsibility. This new alertness has brought with it a deepened longing for God as the ultimate resource. The other is that the missionaries have never been more sensitive to the fact that the only service that can justify our remaining in China is a spiritual service. With these two conceptions dominant 1926 is full of promise as "Chinese leaders and missionary friends" enter the year together.

Shaohing, Dec. 28, 1925.

Our Missionary Dollar

Our denominational dollar makes provision for items of cooperative denominational work not all strictly missionary in character; for example, in granting retirement pensions or benefit grants to aged ministers and missionaries; religious education; and for the limited support of schools and colleges.

Our denominational dollar makes provision for various activities which are designed to benefit in perhaps equal measure all portions of our world missionary service. This is certainly true of our Board of Missionary Cooperation. There is nothing geographically restrictive in the ministry of the Board of Missionary Cooperation. Foreign missionaries are enrolled under the pension plan as well as home pastors. This is quite as true of our service in the field of religious education, in the field of missionary education and of our objectives in maintaining denominational schools and colleges. We are concerned in raising up a force of men and women with world vision and with ability and purpose to undertake world problems. All this relates quite as much to foreign missions as to home missions. Strictly speaking there is no geographic division of our denominational dollar. Our dollar is not provincial, every cent has a world outlook, or should have. Expenditures for such objectives should not be classified either as foreign missions or as home missions. If any percentage is quoted as applying to foreign missions or home missions it ought to be based on the division of the balance of the denominational dollar rather than upon the division of the entire dollar. This more accurate division would show quite a different percentage for any given organization.

As a denomination we are interested in projects; in types of work rather than in organizations. In the main a particular project or a particular type of work follows organizational lines, but not strictly so. For example, foreign mission work is done mainly through our two foreign societies, but a large amount of work strictly foreign is done through other agencies. Methodists, for example, classify work in Cuba, Porto Rico, Mexico, and Central America as foreign missions. We make provision for work in these fields under our home mission agencies. Is such work home or foreign missions? Provision is made for the care of aged ministers and missionaries through the ministers' and missionaries' benefit board, but considerable provision is made for precisely the same type of work through the Foreign Mission society for its own workers. An appeal was recently made to evangelize Italians in the Argentine. This would be foreign missions. To evangelize Italians in America would be home missions.

Any struggle of part with part in the human body at once produces fever, probably pain and certainly lower vitality and loss of efficiency. Current discussion has lowered our denominational

Here is the budget stairway again. This time the picture shows what we have accomplished as compared with what we should have done. At the end of six months, we had just passed the third step, which means that we had collected only a little more than three-twelfths of our whole year's budget. The outline man in white shows where we should have been—a good three steps ahead and halfway up the budget stairway. Now it is our task to bring our actual achievement up to our ideal. The denomination has a stiff climb ahead to reach the goal by April 30, but there is no doubt of our ability to do so. Compared with the record of past years, and taking into consideration the size of our budget, we have made a good start. But every minute of the next few months will count and we cannot begin too soon to make up the gap between our aim and our achievement.

vitality and efficiency. May not our denominational dollar be a benevolent dollar in full. Yes, a happy dollar! Why should not this "organism", our denomination, function like a healthy body? A healthy body loves action. Why not rejoice like a strong man to run a race? "Restore unto us the joy of thy salvation."—From an editorial in the Metropolitan Bulletin.

Here, There and Everywhere

PASTOR GUY G. BLEAKNEY welcomed eighteen new members Jan. 3, at Central church, Elizabeth, N. J.

AS A MATTER OF public interest these statements are taken from the weekly bulletin of the First church, Scranton, Pa.: "Recent statistics show that there are approximately 53,000,000 people in the United States under twenty-five years of age. About 16,000,000 are getting some kind of religious education—Sunday-school, week-day school, or parochial school—leaving 37,000,000 without any. There are about 43,000,000 Protestants under twenty-five; less than 16,000,000 are enrolled in any class for religious instruction—leaving over 27,000,000 or 66.5 per cent receiving none. In Chicago, several years ago, a very careful survey was made. Of the 1,000,000 children in the Chicago public schools, 800,000 received no religious education; 200,000 received some in Sunday school or other schools, i.e., four out of every five were without religious education."

Hartman, $5000; estate of Oella Robertson, $452.50; Miss Lena Fulmer, $500; Robert Lees, $500; Miss Laura Comey, $200; and Jacob Davis, $50. In addition to the regular curriculum the spring term will have a series of lectures by Mrs. Martha K. Lawson Ayer. It is also expected that Dr. Frederick A. Ayer will be one of the spring lecturers. One of the unique features of this school is that each member of the women's board of managers takes a B. I. daughter. On a recent occasion the "fathers" of the B. I. daughters were brought together at a dinner at the institute. It was a happy occasion.

New Books

Over, Brier and Tansy, by O. C. S. Wallace, M. A., D. D., LL.D. New York: Doran. $1.75 net.

A book reminiscent of the garden, the old, the pasture of the boyhood home. Nova Scotia reveal where Doctor Wallace gained strength of purpose, a tranquil spirit, and the wisdom which is part of this world.
—O. E. D.

Timeos From Calvary, by J. W. G. Ward, D. D. New York: Doran. $2.

Dr. Ward has brought into cameo relief personalities that had their small or large part in the drama of Calvary. Some are known—some unknown—but all acquire an intense interest through their relation to Calvary.
—O. E. D.

Sharing in Creation, Studies in the Christian View of the World, by W. Crosby Bell, D. D. New York: Macmillan. $2.

This is a popular but a scholarly and vigorous discussion of the reasonableness of Christian faith. Belief in God as creator grows out of the many-sidedness of life-processes. The evolutionary method of creation, read forward instead backward, reveals man's moral supremacy. And the purpose of creation is "the kingdom of God," which can be realized only through human activity directed by Christ. Divine providence finds its meaning in Jesus. Involved in this creative process is the problem of suffering which finds its solution in its creative transmutation into the highest good, namely, fellowship with God. It was in the divine plan for man to share with God in the creative process of this world.

The book is a fresh and helpful presentation of a view of man's place in the world not often in our thoughts.

Religious Dramas, 1924, edited by the Committee on Religious Drama of the Federal Council of Churches. New York: Century Co.

Abandon your pre-conceptions just long enough to scan these plays. Make a real attempt to imagine their effect upon a modern congregation. Contrast them with the pallid hue of most of our sermons. Sense the reality of impression here made possible. And then remember that each of these plays is definitely proposed toward the revealing of spiritual truth in the mood of the most reverent sermonizer. You will be forced to admit that this book is no device of art, but rather the epitome of a splendid effort to use an old, and traditionally religious, language for the preaching of the gospel. The fact that the vocabulary of the drama has fallen from its high state in the intervening centuries need not blind us to the wonderful new opportunity.

Four biblical plays, which attempt to dramatize an actual Bible scene; then three fellowship plays and pageants which capture the mood of the gospel in symbol-form; finally three other plays, perhaps the most interesting of the collection, form the anthology. The editors announce the pious hope that this is but the first in a series of annual volumes, which will be standard collections to which religious leaders will turn instead of wading through a numberless collection of pamphlets and manuscripts. We may add the sincere hope that the ore of other yields will be as rich in pay-dirt as this which they have discovered in their first vein.

However dubious you are as you begin the book, you have only to read its selections consecutively to emerge with a sense of pleasant satisfaction. For the last play is the strongest of all, "Dust of the Road," by Kenneth Sawyer Goodman. A man and his wife, in a Middle Western farm-house, are discussing the possibility of embezzling funds left with them by a soldier in trust for his son. The soldier is dead, the son is grown and knows nothing of the circumstances, the opportunity seems absolutely alluring. To the door of the house through the howling storm comes a tramp, who pleads with them to be true to their trust. His life has been shattered because he let himself be sold for thirty pieces of silver.

"It isn't only your soul you sell, Peter Steele, and nothing you get will compare with what goes out of you when the first payment clinks in your hand. You'll miss the joy of small things crying in the grass, and the pleasant sadness that comes of watching the fall of yellow leaves. You'll take no comfort in the sound of a woman's singing, or the laughing of a child, or the crackling of a fire in the grate. You'll lie down to sleep with the crystal stars blinking at you, and have only the empty blackness of night in your heart. I know how it will be with you, Peter Steele."

With a sob, we recognize the tramp as Judas, and we see the determination to be true creep over the features of Peter Steele.

Looking towards the Heights, by O. C. S. Wallace New York: Doran. $1.60.

This series of ten sermons, delivered to the students of William and Mary college in the spring of 1924, presents Jesus Christ and his salvation to the hearts of young folk at that critical period in their lives when facts and experience seem to contradict inherited beliefs. Salvation is defined as the power of God to set men free for development and service. Simple faith and intellectual belief are discriminated. Christ stands out as the ever-present companion to give richness and fullness to life.

—F. H. FAHRINGER.

The Twelve Minor Prophets, by George L. Robinson, Ph.D., D. D., LL.D. New York: Doran. $2 net.

A sympathetic interpretation of the Twelve Minor Prophets with the true historical setting and environment. The work is modern and scientific throughout, without being hypercritical. It is evangelical in its belief in the prophets' Messianic vision and their authority. In an appendix is a critical analysis for advanced classes.
—O. E. D.

Child Marriages, by Mary E. Richmond and Fred S. Hall. Russell Sage Foundation. $1.50.

More than 665,000 people living in the United States today have either been child brides or married child brides, that is, brides less than sixteen years old. Most of these brides are of native stock and not foreigners or children of recent immigrants. Are such marriages socially desirable or undesirable? What is the effect upon the parties to the marriage, upon the offspring, upon the home? How does it come about that so many very young people marry? The whole problem is here studied, evils are pointed out and remedies indicated. Cases are startling. Think of a girl of twelve, marrying a man of thirty-nine, or of a child of eleven with her mother's consent, a man who had a living wife. But the book tells the whole story.

—U. M. MCGUIRE.

My Religion, by Emil G. Hirsch New York: Macmillan. $5.

Our generation has known and honored Rabbi Hirsch of Chicago. One is hardly prepared, however, for the statement of the publishers that he was "the greatest pulpiteer produced by Judaism in a century," and more in the same fulsome style. But he was and he deserved to be one of the foremost leaders of his race in his time, and his interpretation of religion may be accepted as an expression of the spirit and range of reformed Judaism. The book is composed of a collection of his sermons chosen for their interpretative value. They were doubtless better in the hearing when reinforced by the personality of the preacher than in the reading without such reinforcement. They exhibit a wide range of information, but not always clear insight and careful analysis. His criticism of Christianity is not bitter but keen, and seems to show a characteristic readiness to accept either facts or traditions that may be turned into arguments against the Christian faith. However, on the whole it is restrained and is marked by a desire to be fair. In these days when there is a revival of interest in efforts to evangelize the Jews, such an interpretation of Jewish thought is highly valuable for guidance in trying to find a true approach to the Jewish people.

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, 2320 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

"Tonight Elijah Squirk will tell us about a prayer meeting out on Swank Creek."

"Evenin' friends. I allow to tell tonite about a prayer-meetin' out in our Swank Creek church. I reckon there never wuz jest sich a meetin' before. It wuz a humdinger if it wan't jest reglar. Pastor reads a lesson an' we raises a tune or two. Somebody prayed an' nobody 'cept God heerd the prayer 'cause a baby whooped it up somethin' feerce. In the country we still take the kids to church. But what one baby with a pin stickin' into him kin do to a prayer-meetin' is amazin'. This kid sure had stayin' qualities."

"Pastor tried to expound the Scriptures but the kid beat him to it. An' finally w'en he wuz yelled out, he quit like a Ford on a steep hill. Then there wuz a real calm."

"That baby laid back an' went to sleep on its mother's arm and its cheeks wuz all red from violent exercise. An' nobody wuz upset. Everybody present, pretty near, wuz a parent an' full o' sympathy. I dunno who or how it started but some one sed it wuz time to renew our subscriptions fer THE BAPTIST. So about all us men chipped in our $2 apiece fer renewals. Obe writ down their names and took the coin."

"Grandpa Jones riz up an' says that a part o' his New Year resolution wuz to send the paper to some boy in prison. He took off his specks an' wipes em on the linin' o' his coattail an' when he sets 'em on his nose agin, we knew somthin' was a-comin'. He says, 'I tell ye it 'ud be good fer our souls if twenty-five of us 'ud chip in $2 apiece more, an' send the paper to twenty-five boys in prison, as the Field Editor is urg'in' us to do.' Then he up an' tells us to remember that pore boy o' Jerry Johnson's as wuz sent up fer ten years. He sed nobody ever did airy a thing fer the boy."

"An' we all knowed the pore kid didn't have no mother to love him or to pray fer 'im. We wuz all a-waitin' fer 'im to come back an' then we wuz a-goin' to be kind to him, grandpa says, an' here one day Jerry's boy was dead uv the flu an' sent home in a box. An' grandpa wuz a-lookin' out the winder, black as ink outside, but he was a-seein' himself and coupla the rest uv us a diggin' a grave. This boy wuz laid out there by the side uv his mother with only a short prayer at the grave."

"I saw the mother with the sleepin' baby hug him up a leetle closer and it wuz awful still. Grandpa stood there a minute and jest looked out into the night. 'If it wan't so dark,' says grandpa, 'ye could see his grave now. It's too late to be kind to Jerry's boy. But there's a lot uv other boys we kin be kind to.'"

"Well, there wuz thirteen as sed they'd send the paper to some boy in prison. An' after the pastor prayed an' dismissed the meetin' Simon Flint takes Obe an' me to one side an' speakin' kinda low, he says that he felt uncommon stirred up. He says that he knew that Johnson boy an' felt that he'd like to jest take a little interest in some boy. An' he handed over the $2. An' neither Obe or me cud press him to take it himself. We jest felt that now that Simon wuz willin' to do something fer some one else, he'd soon come around an' take it himself."

"As we drove home along the creek that night, my wife says, 'Lije, ain't the ways o' God wonderful an' past findin' out? Think uv all that's growed out uv you and Obe gettin' a few families to read a good paper. New idees, Thanksgivin' offerin' fer missions, seven children off to college, pastor in the M & M pension plan, and now fourteen families adoptin' a prison boy far a year an' sendin' him the paper. It'll be somethin' new to think about an' maybe some day we will hear the King sayin' 'Come ye blessed of my Father, . . . for I wuz sick an' in prison and ye ministered unto me,' cause we are doin' this fer Him.'"

"The office boy says in his opinion we got to make it hot for people and stew subscriptions out of them, as Mark Twain remarked about the precious ottar of roses that was stewed out of otters."

"WCOY now signs off. Start stewing tonight. So long."

Steadily the Baptist denomination is increasing its collective demand for a more adequate preparation of its ministers. Take for example the New Jersey State Convention which has a standing rule not to "engage or to continue to employ any missionary, or to aid any church in the support of a pastor, who may be ordained without having met the requirements of the convention." Any council which recommends the ordination of a candidate without adequate preparation wrongs him as well as the denomination.

Ouch! The following paragraph from the American Israelite reports a community Christmas tree set up for Moslems, Jews and Christians by the Y. M. C. A. on the fields of Boaz where the angels sang of the birth of Jesus and concludes: "From this it would appear that the American Y. M. C. A. is busy in Palestine. It is to be hoped that they are doing missionary work among the Christians of the Holy Land. They need it a great deal more than either the Moslems or the Jews."

Congregationalists have their own way of looking at questions of current religious controversy. Their national council has expressed its position in terms that follow: "We pledge ourselves to the conservation of the spiritual values embodied in the time-honored statements of Christian truth, but believe that God makes himself increasingly known through the patient investigations of modern scholars. We declare our conviction that there is and can be no conflict between science and religion. We deplore any attempt of the state or federal governments to interfere with the teaching of widely accepted scientific theories, and encourage all reverent students in their search for the truth in whatever field, assuring them that we welcome all light that God can give us, and commend to our ministers and people the preaching and acceptance of gospel consistent with modern scholarship."

Comments on the Chicago Conference

Dr. Charles L. White, secretary of the Home Mission society says: "The recent conferences of missionary administrators at the Chicago Beach hotel filled me with great confidence for the near and long future of the missionary work of our denomination. The discussions were frank and the conclusions reached were constructive. The net impression left upon my mind and heart was of the highest order. This gathering furnished, as none has ever been given to us before, an opportunity to study the entire work.

"The separate conferences of the state secretaries and city mission secretaries, in which they reviewed every phase of their missionary undertakings, made each secretary familiar with the entire missionary work of the group of which he was a member. Every American problem stood out clearly as a missionary problem, whether it had to do with the frontier, Mormonism, mountain peoples, or rural and urban populations. The missionary work of Latin America, the educational work among the negroes of the South, and our foreign-speaking problems all emerged when, for the first time in the history of the denomination, the associated home missionary agencies, state, city and national, met for the study of their separate and mutual tasks. The work of all the groups was examined with care, compared and coordinated. A continuation committee was appointed by these home mission agencies to recommend at the next meeting some form of affiliation which would continue the studies already investigated and bring about closer and more fruitful cooperation.

"Out of an earlier conference between the representatives of the national societies and boards there emerged a clearer understanding of the work of each organization, whose budgets were studied with deep interest. The united conference of all the groups proved to be an epoch-making meeting. At this time the more important points that had been emphasized in an earlier group or associated conference were reviewed. Home missions and foreign missions at that time were brought into their true relationships and perspective, and those who were privileged to be present will never forget the impressions made upon their minds by the intimate and detailed expositions of our great foreign and home mission enterprises. Adjustments between the budgets were agreed upon which made it relatively easy for the finance committee of the convention to do its work. If the entire denomination could have listened in to the exposition of our home and foreign missionary work, the funds needed for next year would be over-subscribed. Our greatest problem and concern now is to transfer the information, the knowledge, the inner viewpoints and wider skylines of the Chicago conference to the members of our churches. If this could be done there would be the greatest revival in missionary living and giving which the denomination has ever seen. Personally I

P. C. Wright of the ministers and missionaries benefit board: "The meeting of the secretaries in Chicago was significant chiefly because of the clearer understanding that each group gained of the work and problems of the other groups of workers. With the clearer understanding there came a greater sympathy and interest in the work of all. It was not difficult to adjust budgets when each had gained a wider prospect of the work. The final outcome was a unanimity and enthusiasm seldom experienced."

Mrs. Mary E. Bloomer, treasurer of the Woman's Home Mission Society: "Baptists, although they may not be aware of the fact, have just completed a most significant conference in Chicago. Significant because for the first time the all-secretarial group reviewed the whole mission task of the denomination, and understood as never before each other's work and opportunity; secondly because by coming together and talking things through many misunderstandings were swept away and a real sense of co-operation and mutual trust manifested. It was as though we saw through a glass darkly but now face to face."

which had been left in the village, until finally all had arrived. The question as to what should be done was then submitted to the cook. He gave the same "comforting assurance," that had been given before leaving the village, by saying the sahib could do as he pleased, but as for him, he was not going back into Okotsu but was going on to his own village.

"Why, what is your hurry?" all asked eagerly.

Grimly he replied, "The last I heard as I left the village was the whetting of the 'noks' (long sharp knives) and a remark to the effect that if they had lost us tonight they would yet have us on the path next morning."

So they did not make camp, but started down the jungle trail to the nearest Christian village, eight miles distant, lighted on their way by the clear shining of the January moon.

After about four miles of steady walking they came to an open place beside the path, where a crude platform had been made and used by the Lhotas as a resting place when traveling between the villages. Being somewhat in advance of the Christians who were bringing the goods, the missionary and his companions stopped here to wait for them. Two leopards were calling to each other nearby but made no attack. Soon the native Christians came up with the loads. All sat here and talked for a little while and then had prayer meeting in the open moonlight space. Afterwards they resumed their journey and arrived in the village of Lungkum about four o'clock in the morning. The hardships of the previous day were soon put down to the credit of experience in 1908, and today, with an infinite satisfaction, the missionary visits the same village of Okotsu and finds almost the entire village to be Christian. Here is a gem of a little church which cost some thousands of rupees (about 3 rupees to $1.00), and not one cent of mission money went into it, as it was built entirely by the local church. It is surrounded by a beautiful flower garden and a fence to keep out the village cattle and pigs. This is the only church building—the only house used exclusively for worship of God in all that tribe of over sixty villagers, and it is located on almost the very spot where only thirteen years ago the missionary's tent stood.

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for Feb. 14

JESUS THE GOOD SHEPHERD

Lesson Text: John 10:1-30. Golden Text: John 10:11

The incident of the preceding chapter furnished the occasion for the message on the good shepherd. The Pharisees were the hirelings described in the words, "He fleeth because he is a hireling, and careth not for the sheep." The altercation between the blind men and the Pharisees is proof of the fact that religious leaders were spurious shepherds. The contrast of the chapter is between the official shepherds and the one who called himself the good shepherd.

The Shepherds

In a land where sheep-grazing and sheep-raising were among the chief industries the people would readily understand the metaphor. The shepherd and his flock was a familiar sight. There was a kind of mutual understanding and reciprocal affection between the shepherd and his sheep. In a sense they were friends. The true shepherd knew each of his sheep by name and the answered to their names when called. But the hireling cared nothing for the companionship between man and beast. He was in the business simply for the fleece and his care for the sheep was governed by this commercial motive. One looks in vain for a real shepherd among the leaders of Israel in the time of Jesus. They were leaders by official appointment only but not leaders in a real sense of having the interests of the people at heart. That is the reason Jesus saw the multitudes like sheep without a shepherd, and was moved with compassion. Lincoln, whose birthday we celebrate this week, was a genuine shepherd because he loved the common people and had a heart for the slave. But he was roundly hated by the hirelings of his day.

The Shepherd

Jesus seized upon every homelike pattern that would picture his relation to the people. He called himself a roadman the way." The daily necessities of bread and water served him as symbols of his own attitude toward the hungry and thirsty souls of men. Here he took up the pastoral picture of the shepherd and his flocks and as great David's greater Son he gives the world a New Testament version of the twenty-third Psalm. In fact he was so eager to make use of the whole simile that he called himself the door into the sheepfold as well as the shepherd of the sheep. And by this pattern he wished to impress upon his hearers the fact that God is Shepherd and not a sultan, that he loves all the sheep both white and black, and that he had sheep which were not in the Jewish fold. Our God is a Christlike God and Jesus is the Good Shepherd who laid down his life for the sheep.

PASTOR!

You Hold the Key

If every Northern Baptist Pastor will make a special evangelistic effort in February and March, then—

We shall have the entire denomination bound up as never before in a simultaneous effort to extend the domain of Christ in America.

It Means a Glorious Victory

Our expectation, warranted by reports from many districts, is for the greatest year of soul-winning in our history.

We can fully realize that expectation, if for the next two months, the spirit of intensive evangelism dominates every church, every church member and every Sunday School.

Only the full power of our pulpits, unitedly exerted, can bring about this spiritual achievement.

We must bring to Christ the unchurched people of America or the power of Christianity in our national life will inevitably wane.

BROTHER PASTOR! READ THIS! HELP US TO CONCENTRATE ON THE VITAL TASK OF PREACHING CHRIST TO THE WHOLE COUNTRY.

THE NEW FIRST CHURCH OF PASADENA, CALIFORNIA—A SIDE VIEW

Folks, Facts and Opinion

Puritanism in its revolt against vanity gained good morals and lost good taste. So it comes about that a movement is promoted by leaders in the Protestant churches of the present generation to put more art into the expression of religion. The Federal Council of Churches has just held a conference in Chicago in the interest of that movement under the leadership of Prof. E. Augustine Smith of Boston university.

Will religion or science control the future of mankind? This question in this form was actually proposed for serious discussion before the National Republican club of New York City a few days ago. Prof. Henry Fairfield Osborn, president of the American Museum of Natural History, showed the fallacy of the question when he replied: "Religion and science will unite to control the future of mankind—a simplified religion and a reverent science."

Bishop William Montgomery Brown, who was deposed by the Episcopal General Assembly last October at New Orleans, now a prelate of the Old Catholic church, seems to be doing his best to justify the Episcopal church in deposing him. His idea of the issues involved in his controversy with the bishops, according to the reports in the papers, seems to cover two points. He represents the theology against which he rebels as "the idea of a universe composed of heaven in the attic, earth on the second floor and hell in the cellar." And he sets himself to champion "a religion of humanity in which the poor and people of the underworld receive a chance, and not in stilted dogma for the rich in golden palaces of worship, where clothes make the men." It would be interesting to know who opposes him on either point.

Albin E. Roumaine of Chicago notes in THE BAPTIST a statement from Doctor Rushbrook that there are no Baptist churches in Albania, Greece or Turkey and adds this information: "It is no credit to the Baptists that there are no churches of our denomination in these countries. It is a pleasing fact, however, that Rev. Theofil Vickman now has gone to Athens, Greece, to open up work there. He is supported by voluntary contributions from the Swedish American Baptists. Some years ago he went to Madrid, Spain, supported by the same methods. He established several churches there, which were subsequently taken over by the Southern Board, and are flourishing today. Here is a chance for those possessed of means to step in and help out. If the Baptists had put more money and men in the work in the capitals of Europe, Baptist work would have been in a different condition today."

From Holland comes an extraordinary news item concerning the draining of the Zuyder Zee. The dyke, which is to be built across its mouth, will cost ninety million florins, and will take eight years to finish. Then four "polders" will be dried, affording a quarter of a million hectares of fertile soil. A lake will be left in the middle, to afford navigation. Altogether, the total expense will be half a billion florins.

Pause in the rush and fret of American life a moment, and listen to the story of the Caroline islands as told in the Geographic News Bulletin: "These bits of land, scattered over a large area of the great Pacific, are far from any great land masses. They lie 3000 miles southwest of the Hawaiian islands and some 500 miles east of the Philippines. Life is easy and time drifts slowly by on the little tufts of green in the warm blue of the Pacific which now are under Japanese mandate. The largest is less than thirteen miles in diameter, while a half dozen cocoanut trees, surrounded by nature's breakwater of mangroves, tells the whole story of many of the smallest. Nobody knows how many or how large they are. One careful estimate is 1000 islands, with a total area of 970 square miles. The years of missionary teaching in the islands have made the natives a peaceful, friendly and hospitable people."

Prof. L. H. Marshall of McMaster university, called in question as to his orthodoxy from a fundamentalist point of view, stated his personal creed, as reported in the Canadian Baptist in these words: "I believe in God the Father, Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth; I believe in the deity of Jesus Christ, his Son our Lord; I believe that on all the great questions of morality and religion the absolute and final word is with Jesus Christ our God and Saviour. I believe in the virgin birth; I believe in the vicarious suffering of Jesus Christ as effecting the atonement between man and God; I believe in the glorious resurrection of Jesus Christ, in the empty grave—remember that, in the empty grave on the first Easter morn; I have already testified on that point. I believe that Jesus ever liveth to be the inspiration of all of his followers. I am a fundamentalist in the New Testament sense of the term—'Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ.' And nobody in the wide world shall ask any other fundamentalism of me. I believe that the Bible is the inspired Word of God from Genesis to Revelation. I believe in the life hereafter, as the trust deed says, both for the just and the unjust. I believe in the necessity of conversion, in the need of people being born again."

In order to raise revenue the soviet government legalized the liquor trade last fall. Now liquor, according to habit, is raising in Russia something besides revenue. Consequently the bolshevist papers are mobilizing against the evils of drunkenness, and the government is bestirring itself to enlighten and educate the people on the subject.

The fortieth anniversary of the founding of the General Baptist Messenger was recently observed with enthusiasm. This journal is the denominational organ of the General Baptists, published at Owensville, Ind. Mr. James P. Cox has been its publisher from the beginning. The paper owns its printing plant with a small outfit of good modern machinery and it faces the coming years with good prospects.

Thomas F. Millard, an unusually reliable observer and reporter of Chinese affairs, thinks that the communist propaganda and leadership in China have become really formidable. He says "Radical Chinese elements combined with Soviet Russian agents who are discussing plans to form a new Chinese party outwardly professing Red doctrines—the announced program. While probably four-fifths of the Chinese political intelligentsia and also a major part of the people are unwilling to accept sovietism now, present conditions favor the bolsheviki because they are the only Chinese faction having a definite program designed to promote a fixed idea, while the conservatives are not united, have vague ideas and lack a program, thus making it possible for the minority to gain its ends. The trend of events, causing serious alarm among the foreign interests, which are taking steps to counteract it."

The last annual meeting of the Chinese National Anti-opium association, composed wholly of Chinese, enrolled representatives of the Chinese Medical association, the Red Cross, Buddhist association, Chinese chamber of commerce, National Christian council, Roman Catholic forward movement, Buddhist Temperance union, Chinese students' union and numerous other organizations. The Buddhist Temperance union reported opium sanatoria in 2,000 centers. A five year policy and program was adopted covering suppression of poppy cultivation, suppression of use of opium and narcotic drugs, suppression of traffic in opium, and survey of the narcotic situation throughout China and among Chinese overseas. The meeting called upon the churches of the United States and the world, and especially the young people's societies, to lend support in every way possible to China in its overwhelming task.

Definite developments indicating powerful fascist movements in both France and Hungary serve to spice up the news of recent weeks. Such movements may be expected to occur naturally where conditions favor them. Given an undisciplined and irresponsible communist movement on the one hand and a firm purpose to hold on to special privilege on the other, with a badly informed or misinformed, misguided and irresolute mass of the people, a resort to blind partisan force may be calculated with almost astronomical certainty. It is also said that Mussolini is negotiating with fascist groups in Austria.

Frank L. Miner, president of the Farmers Accident Insurance company, treasurer of the Northern Baptist Convention for more than twelve years and a honored member of the First church, Ames Moines, Iowa, passed away on Monday, Feb. 1. Mr. Miner had been living with a bad cold for about two weeks prior to his death but it was not considered serious. However, he died as he had lived, quietly, unobtrusively and with unshaken confidence in him as he said, "I am the Resurrection and the Life." In the going of Mr. Miner the denomination has lost a faithful and efficient servant. He will be sorely missed by the many interests with which he was identified.

Mexico is in the act of trying public ownership along a new line. According to press reports the right of exploitation of all petroleum lands belonging to the National Mexican railways has been taken from that organization and bestowed upon the federal government in a decree issued by President Calles, which explained that the railways were being turned over to private management, whose charter does not give the right to exploit petroleum. The decree includes both the railroad's and contiguous government lands which have been under exploitation by the federal railway management in the last year. The properties have given promise of developing production rivaling that of the largest companies. Their value will go into tens, perhaps hundreds, of millions of dollars.

Study this act of generosity which is supposed to be unexampled in the history of the world's organized industry: When the 3000 employes of the Arthur Nash company were formally inducted into membership in the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, at a meeting in Emory auditorium, Cincinnati, here, was witnessed one of the most dramatic steps in the progress of the labor movement of the Ohio valley. Not only did these workers come into the union of their trade in a body, but they presented to the annual meeting of the company—in which hundreds of them are stockholders—a formidable petition asking that henceforth the Christmas bonus be discontinued, and that the $60,000 to $100,000 that annually has gone in this way to the highest skilled and best paid among the workers be used to adjust upward the wages of the minority who now are not well paid.

The population of the United States is rapidly reaching the point, it is said, where it will be able to consume all of the cotton produced in the country and will no longer require a foreign market for that commodity. This condition will give a new turn to the tariff question. American capital invested in home production will demand protection and American capital invested in foreign production will demand free trade.

A proposal for the union of Congregationalists and Universalists is so far within the field of practical discussion the Congregationalist editorially regards such union as feasible. It says: "We believe that the outstanding leaders of the Universalist body desire union with us, and we believe that it would be acceptable to them on the basis of that liberty of faith in Christ commonly recognized as the very foundation of our present Congregational fellowship. It is our opinion that the Universalists as a whole represent in general religious belief a more conservative position than is taken by groups of Congregationalists, already under the fellowship of the National Council, numerically much larger than the entire membership of the Universalist body. A passion for truth and righteousness, zeal for a progressive, effective gospel ministry, characterizes the leadership of this body at the present hour. Laymen like 'Golden Rule' Nash represent a surging power of real religion in industrial and social life. It will not be to our credit if we cannot effect some closer affiliation with such men of simple faith and devotion. With them we have everything in common, and we ought not to be apart."

"Pussyfoot" Johnson, returned from a world tour in the interest of prohibition, brings encouraging news of the movement in many lands—Scandinavia, Lithuania, Poland, Jugo-Slavia, Serbia, Bulgaria, Turkey. The backward nations in the movement, he thinks, are France and England.

Bells rang, crowds cheered, schools were dismissed and there was general jubilation in Germany, because the British flag at Cologne, the French flag at Bonn and the Belgian flags at Moers, Dusseldorf and Aix la Chapelle had come down and on Feb. 1, more than 2,000,000 Germans saw for the first time in seven years the flag of the fatherland flying over their heads.

Thousands of Russians are seeking their fortunes in the recently opened gold territory along the Aldan River, an arm of the Lena River east of Yakutsk, Siberia, under conditions strikingly like those in the California of the middle of the last century or the Klondike of the late '90s. The soviet government is reported to have barred the field to all foreigners for the purpose of reserving its development for Russians only.

Commissar N. A. Semashko writes in the Moscow Isvestia that his department intends to establish concentration camps in the vicinity of the larger Russian cities to confine the homeless children, which number 800,000 in Russia. The street waifs are mostly morally defective and need the strict discipline of these camps, he says, adding that sentimentality must be abandoned in dealing with this problem. M. Semashko says the camps will follow the lines of the political police camp near Moscow, which houses criminals from ten to sixteen years of age. Whether this means hope or hell for 800,000 Russian children depends upon the way the enterprise is handled.

Here is fine material for an international entanglement. The German Railroad company, which is an independent organization under control of the transfer committee, provided by the Dawes plan, has brought suit against the German government in the supreme court at Leipzig. It demands that the arbitration law to settle disputes of employers and workers shall not be applied to the railroad. The minister of labor recently decreed that the railway company must increase the workers' wages two pfennigs an hour and grant the workers standard living wages. This would increase the company's expenses $20,000,000. The directors, including the American member of the transfer committee, Mr. Mogarrah, and M. Leverne, the French member, assert this expense is unbearable. The government, under pressure of the labor unions, insists that an increase in wages be granted. The rail workers threatened to strike. The company retaliated with a threat to exclude strikers. Such action would lead to a general strike in Germany. American business men in Berlin contend that unless the company is exempted from the labor laws it will be unable to earn reparations funds.

Two negroes were beaten with a hickory stick and the stick was rammed down the throat of each till the blood came, their deaths occurring soon afterwards. Henry Wooten was dragged by his chains behind a truck, then stoned by the boss and flagged almost daily. He died. Gregory Sides, working in the chain-gang, had his arm broken. No surgical attention was given to it. With his arm hanging by his side, he was kept at work, frequently kicked and beaten, till his sentence ran out. When you drive over the fine roads of North Carolina, remember that this is how they were built. It is a report of an official investigation by the state authorities that gives a long list of such atrocities. But why worry? There was money in it for the contractors.

Dr. James Whitcomb Brougner's visit to Chicago contributed greatly to a good understanding and to a spirit of cooperative fellowship among Baptists. In fact he seems to be repeating in the central states the same effective unification that was reported from the Atlantic states. Chicago was ready to welcome him and his fine personal spirit and inspiring messages fully justified the welcome. What is true of the city is true also of the whole Chicago area. Whether in pastors' retreats, in ministers' unions, in formal conferences, at banquets, or in smaller groups and more confidential interviews, the effect has been unvarying. In his presence and under his guidance men of the most remotely differing theological and ecclesiastical convictions sat down together and tried in the spirit of true brotherhood to arrive at a solution of denominational problems, not evading even the most difficult ones. Baptists of the Chicago area seem consequently to be far nearer to oneness of mind concerning the denominational task than at any time since the recent controversies began.

The Advocates, syndicated publications of the M. E. church, are in the habit of syndicating certain leading articles which may be desirable for use in order to produce a mass effect among their readers. A recent instance is the simultaneous publication in those papers of an article by Bishop Blake on the imperfection of creeds as expressions of faith, in which he makes some significant if not surprising statements. For example: "Why should we look askance at one who does not accept the virgin birth, and treat him as an alien and an outcast as certain churches do? One may turn aside entirely from this doctrine and yet maintain a profound faith in Jesus as the Son of God. As with the virgin birth, so with the bodily resurrection of Jesus . . . It is of little concern whether he arose in body or only in spirit . . . Or what matters it what theory of atonement—substitutional, governmental or moral influence—one may hold? or that he hold no theory at all. Redemption is a fact, not a theory . . . It is the experience, and not the explanation, that is the essential thing to be laid hold of." What reactions may be expected in the Methodist church?

By the terms of the Treaty of Versailles the Germans must send 10,000 volumes per month to Louvain to compensate the destruction wrought in 1914; the books thus to be sent are selected by the officials of the university, and the choice confirmed by King Albert of Belgium. In order to fulfill this treaty condition the libraries of Heidelberg, Leipsic, Jena, and Bonn have been called upon to surrender some of their treasures. For every manuscript that perished in the Louvain fire the Germans must give to the university one of equal age and value.

Among the great events that are making history for the Baptist denomination on the Pacific coast has been the erection of the great new building of the First church of Pasadena, California. Dr. John Marvin Dean is pastor of the church, and he is so well known to Baptists throughout America that an attempt to sketch him in the space at command here would seem trifling. The coast papers were filled with personal sketches and with pictures and stories of the church in connection with the dedication running through the week of January 18-24. The illustration on our cover and the accompanying picture tell better than a page of description something of the dignity and greatness of the structure. It is sufficient here to state that the auditorium will seat 1600 people and that the baptistery is lined with gold leaf.

The Florida Baptist Witness gives typical and fraternal southern view one of the problems of the Northern Baptist Convention thus: "It will be remembered that at the meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention in Seattle last May there was 'much ado' about the unsoundness of the missionaries employed by the Foreign Mission Society. Certain rabid brethren went so far as to offer resolutions looking to the recall of the missionaries, which resolutions they had been adopted, would have totally disrupted the work. However, better judgment prevailed and the brethren of the convention wisely decided to take time for investigation and to deal with the matter in a sane and fraternal way. A strong commission was appointed, headed by Dr. E. W. Hurst, president of Bucknell university, to make the necessary investigations and to report its findings to the society. The appointment of this committee was a sufficient guarantee to the sober brethren of the North that nothing would be covered up and no one would be whitewashed. This committee has now completed its work and made its report. It is eminently fair and confirms us in our conviction that the great rank and file of the Northern Baptists are just as sound in the faith as are their Southern brethren or Baptists anywhere else." And the Witness follows up this statement by printing the report in full.

How Far Apart Are the Two Wings?

[N CURRENT doctrinal discussions in the Baptist denomination reference is frequently made to "the two wings," and there is an undertone of assumption which sometimes rises even to affirmation, that there are irreconcilable antagonisms between these wings. If such contrariety exists and to such degree that it will ultimately render fraternal cooperation impossible, the sooner it is clearly ascertained and recognized the better for the cause that Baptists are trying to serve. But if it does not exist, one of the first duties at the present juncture is to isolate and eliminate the misunderstanding based upon it. Let us therefore frankly face the fundamentalist and the modernist types of thought in their actual relation to each other in order that we may intelligently chart our course in the light of the facts.

Let us endeavor first to identify the fundamentalist type. Its formulated expression is found in a statement of doctrine set forth some years ago by the Christian Fundamentals Association. But that statement has not been accepted by any Baptist group as satisfactory and final. A second typical statement is found in the Des Moines Confession adopted by the fundamentalist conference of 1921. This confession was closely in harmony with the historic Baptist position; but it never became current. The next year at Indianapolis the New Hampshire Confession was substituted for it as a representative fundamentalist statement. This, however, was, in the nature of the case, a transitional gesture, which was later superseded by something more precisely definite, viz., the latest formal creed of the Baptist Bible Union, a statement of doctrine not yet sanctioned as representative, satisfactory and final, for the whole fundamentalist group. It is perhaps enough to say that this group stands for "the central values of inherited orthodoxy."

But is not the basic position of the reasonable modernist so far at variance with that of the reasonable fundamentalist as ultimately to compel their separation? That question is germane. What is the basic position of the modernist? Perhaps no man is better qualified to state that position than Dean Shailer Mathews. He has written a book recently for this very purpose. In that book he states with studied precision and in italics the ground principle of modernist thinking in these words: "It is the use of the methods of modern science to find, state and use the permanent and central values of inherited orthodoxy in meeting the needs of a modern world."

Is the principle of modernism so stated by Dean Mathews antagonistic to the faith of a reasonable fundamentalist? Perhaps no man is better qualified to give an authoritative answer than President E. Y. Mullins. He also has written a recent book having for its express purpose the warning of Christians against the perils of an anti-evangelical modernism. What is his attitude towards the use of the methods of modern science in the investigation of religious truth? In this book he says: "It is most pleasing to say with the greatest emphasis, in this connection, that there is a common standing ground for Christianity and modern science. That standing ground may be summed up in three words: Loyalty to fact A sincere desire to know facts; a spirit of patient and painstaking investigation to discover facts; courage to proclaim what is clearly proven; modesty and self-restraint in refusing to go beyond the evidence; willingness to accept evidence of an unusual kind, provided it seems genuine; unwillingness to prejudge the evidence even when it tends against one's convictions; openness to evidence bearing upon reality of any kind, physical or spiritual—these are among the qualities of the true Christian and the true scientist The defender of the faith . . . is willing to apply every criterion and test which the field of investigation permits." Every fundamentalist who has spoken of the subject is in accord with this statement of President Mullins. And between his statement and that of Dean Mathews as they stand, there is not a shade of essential difference.

What is the conclusion? It is not, of course, that there is no difference between fundamentalism and modernism; but rather that so far as they are evangelical at all they are related as two complementary emphases of a common faith. Fundamentalism emphasizes the inherited doctrinal content, and modernism the scientific method of investigation and interpretation of that common faith.

Since neither the fundamentalists nor the modernists are prepared to submit a formal, final and authoritative creedal statement, a valuable index to the possibility of continued cooperation between the two wings may be found in another quarter. The American Baptist Foreign Mission Society enunciated last year at Seattle its conception of the gospel to which it pledges and demands of its workers a steadfast loyalty. That statement runs in the following terms: "By the gospel we mean the good news of the free forgiveness of sin and eternal life (beginning now and going on forever) through a vital union with the crucified and risen Christ, which brings men into union and fellowship with God. This salvation is graciously offered on the sole condition of repentance and faith in Christ and has in it the divine power of regeneration and sanctification through the Spirit. The only reason we have for accepting this gospel is our belief in the deity of Christ in whom we see the Father, a faith founded on the trustworthiness of the Scriptures and the fact that we have experienced this salvation in our own hearts."

How far is that statement acceptable to the main body of fundamentalists as satisfactory for a basis of continued cooperation and fellowship? On this point we have a declaration which may be regarded as being as nearly authoritative as Baptist traditions will permit. It is the declaration of Dr. James Whitcomb Brougher. He proclaims himself without hesitation or evasion a fundamentalist. He has been recognized for years throughout the field of the Northern Baptist Convention as a leader of the fundamentalist movement. He is now touring the country in an official capacity for the Board of Missionary Cooperation. No man has greater reason than he to be careful of his words. Under this double or compound responsibility he is saying over and over and in the most public way that the gospel syllabus of the Foreign Mission Society, faithfully observed, "is all that any reasonable fundamentalist can ask."

What is the attitude of the modernist group? It is sufficient to say that if a single person of this group is unwilling to cooperate in the work of the denomination on the basis of that syllabus he has not publicly so declared himself. And if the principle of modernism stated by Dean Mathews, when pursued to its consequences, leads to a denial of any item in the Foreign Mission Society's syllabus, no hint of such consequence appears in the book.

Thus, in the absence of any contrary evidence, we may conclude that all Baptist modernists and all Baptist fundamentalists agree that the Foreign Mission Society's syllabus sets forth inherited values of Christianity acceptable to both groups as a basis for cooperative fellowship.

There remains only the question of baptism as a present factor in division. With the possible exception of the personal opinion of one man unofficially expressed, not another of the fifty thousand Baptist ministers and not a single Baptist church in the United States is publicly known to dissent from the position that baptism is for the believer only and by immersion only.

In view of all these considerations the Baptist denomination was never in its history in a better position to join hands, if so disposed, in a confiding fellowship for the united prosecution of its common task.

The Finance Committee

IN THE issue of THE BAPTIST dated Dec. 26, 1925, an editorial appeared under the heading, "A Unique Family Reunion." The editorial was a modest attempt to appraise the value of a great conference of the executives of the various boards, societies and conventions which cooperate in the unified program of the denomination. The conference was held in Chicago about the middle of December, 1925, and lasted for ten days. The object of the conference was a detailed survey of the needs and resources of each field of missionary, educational and philanthropic work carried on by the respective organizations represented in the conference. The general foreign and home mission societies were there in the person of their executives, the boards of cooperation, education and ministerial aid were present, the publication society had a place at the table, the city mission societies and the state conventions were represented. It was the first time in the history of the denomination when these distinctive interests reviewed their budgets and problems together with a view to adjusting differences in the light of all the facts. The conference marked an epoch of progress in the unity and mutual understanding of the various agencies engaged in the common tasks of extending the kingdom of God in the world through regular denominational channels. If the facts disclosed at this epoch-making meeting could once become the property of the members of our churches a new day would dawn in the missionary work of Northern Baptists.

We owe an apology to the finance committee for our unwitting remark in the former editorial to the effect that the conference was not all it might have been because of the absence of the members of the finance committee from the meetings until the last day or two. We now see the wisdom of the finance committee in staying away from the conference until the various interests having a part in the general budget came to a mutual agreement on the distribution of the missionary dollar and on the total amount of the entire budget to be raised for 1926-1927. In addition to the fact that the finance committee is made up of business men who serve without salary and who, because of the demands on their time, cannot give days in succession to such a conference, it was best for all concerned to leave the conference free to work out its own salvation. And this the conference did with such unanimity and enthusiasm that the finance committee was happy to approve the budget as suggested by the combined wisdom of the representatives of our organized work who had spent days together in council, fellowship and prayer. There is no more important agency in the organized work of the Northern Baptist Convention than the finance committee. It is charged with tremendous responsibility which demands a high type of business ability and calls for vast expenditure of time and thought on the part of the members during the year. The convention is fortunate in having men who can qualify for the exacting service which such committee work demands and who are willing and glad to give the time and energy necessary for such a service. We believe the work of the finance committee will be greatly simplified if the good results of the Chicago conference of executives can be conserved and if the precedent there established can be followed by a similar conference each year in the future.

The World in Transit

BY THE ASSISTANT EDITOR

The Assistant Editor Poses For a Sad Example

In the issue of January 23, page 1571, in writing about cancer, the present writer advised ministers to be slow to give advice in cancer cases, and recommended that persons desiring information on the general subject of cancer quackery write to the American Medical Association. His advice to ministers has come home to roost. A Baptist physician writes from Pittsburgh that while greatly concerned over the frequency of cancer and "fervently looking for some suggestion as to the means of relieving these sufferers," the source of information above named is one of the least satisfactory that could have been selected, and gives a number of vigorous reasons. If any minister wishes to know how one looks and feels when he has ventured with more sympathy than wisdom into the cancer problem, let him steadily contemplate the assistant editor.

Maybe Evil Insinuations Will Do As Well As Facts

Treatment of predatory business on this page can hardly be regarded as excessively tender, but any kind of business is entitled to fair treatment anywhere. And just now certain prominent if not influential daily papers are sounding an alarm over the insidious schemes of big predatory business to overthrow the constitution, to pervert the institutions and to sacrifice the interests of this country in order to facilitate and make secure the foreign investments of these big business interests. It is even more than hinted that these same interests have subsidized the Federal Council of Churches for the purpose of securing such religious support and sanction as it can control. That is a large accusation. It might be more impressive if supported by a tangible exhibit of facts, persons, firms, names, dates and occasions involved. It becomes a bit suspicious when alleged by papers whose owners, themselves carry large and increasing foreign investments.

The Radical Cat Has Got Out of the Clerical Bag

Margaret C. Robinson promptly opens the new year with a story in the Dearborn Independent revealing the "American pulpit captured by radicals" and "churches made links in a chain of 'red' propaganda." It is on the whole a rather dramatic story of multitudes of unfortunate and uncomprehending clergymen lured by splendid phrases into the support of the principles of the bolshevik revolution without knowing the real import of their own sermons, throwing down the defenses of their own religion, misleading and alienating spiritual and earnest members of their churches, and mostly dupes beguiled in the simplicity of their pious souls. We take her word for the matter. We are not in possession of the facts. The story is merely passed along so that the offenders may see themselves as at least one other person sees them.

Religious Self-Maintenance Requires Moral Optimism

It is a fine word of Prof. Douglas Clyde Macintosh: "Why should we not believe . . . that which we tend almost inevitably to believe when we are at our best, physically, mentally and morally . . . that ultimately the universe is on the side of the highest values. . . . Moral optimism is an act of self-maintenance on the part of the spiritual life of man." That is, when we have discovered what our nature in its fullest development and balance affirms as good, we have found a key to a true religious faith—the faith that the universe is built true to that affirmation. The universe and its Maker are as good as we are at our best, and the farther we go in the direction of our ascertained and balanced best the more perfectly do we discover within ourselves the purpose of God and the working principle of the universe. We are compelled to be optimists in order to validate and maintain our own personal integrity, for if the best in us is not true to ultimate reality in both nature and God, our very sincerity is a deep and fatal falseness. No; the best that is in us and the best Person we ever knew both face the other way and welcome the morning.

Chicago Takes Her Prospect Of Future Growth Seriously

Fifteen millions of people spread over a radius of fifty miles, along a lake front of 100 miles from Michigan City to Kenosha, with a labyrinth of parks and woods and dunes and drives and flying fields and harbors and palaces and temples of religion, science and art—such is the serious dream of Chicago at the opening of the year 1926. And Chicagoans are foretelling such an achievement within fifty years. As a condition precedent to such greatness, Chicago will have to learn some new lessons in the art of just, clean and capable municipal government. Unless our increasingly urban civilization can conceive life in higher terms than movies, jazz and graft, a very different and troublesome experience awaits both Chicago and the rest of the world.

Will Britons Return to The Two-Party System?

The Christian World discusses thoughtfully the political trend in Great Britain and finds itself, in agreement with the Nation (of England), "driven by the sheer logic of things to the conclusion that to reestablish the old balance between the right and the left is essential, and that this can only be done by bringing together the greater part of the forces which liberalism and labor represent. In this direction, it is argued, liberalism must set its face, however discouraging and dreary may be the prospect. It is palpable that the country is groping its way back to the two party system. Upon that system democracy almost depends for its smooth working, and a frank and calm discussion of the means of escape from the present tangle must be welcomed in the interests of stable government."

Go Farther or Else Do Not Go So Far

The Christian Century is editorially responsible for the following note: "A national board of a leading denomination has entered into an arrangement by which the league of nations non-partisan association is to furnish the salary of a 'peace secretary,' who is to go to his denomination advocating America's entrance into the world court and the league. This peace secretary is not to be in the employ of the league of nations non-partisan association, but of the denominational board, yet his salary is paid by the association. He thus wears the mask of his denominational board while he derives his support from a propagandist organization. One cannot help wondering how many of our ecclesiastical internationalists are wearing this same mask! It is really a disquieting reflection. If this is being done in one denomination, why should it be assumed that it is not quite a general practice in many denominations?" The Christian Century needs no counsel on ethics from the office of THE BAPTIST, but the vagueness of the statement quoted does not relieve it from question. Who wears that mask? Does the group of "many denominations" include the Baptist denomination? Such an accusation compels the question. We have a right to know.

Death and the Life Beyond

I—The Question Nearest to Us

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

The enthusiastic appreciation with which previous articles contributed by Mr. Spurr to the columns of THE BAPTIST were received, is a guaranty of the pleasure our readers will take in following the series which begins with this article. No subject has more perennial interest for all the people in the world than "Death and the Life Beyond."—Editor.

I AM to deal in these lectures with the general subject of death and the life beyond. In undertaking this I lay myself open to a double charge: that of audacity in daring to discuss a subject concerning which it is declared by many that nothing can possibly be known; and that of irreverence in reopening a question which "Catholic" orthodoxy has settled once and for all. In answer to that possible double charge I declare, in advance, that I am neither audacious nor irreverent. On the contrary they are audacious who make their agnosticism the measure of all possible knowledge; and they are irreverent who close their minds against re-statements of old truths, supposing that, because the fathers have spoken, there is nothing further to be said.

Truth can never change. It is eternal. But our conceptions of the truth are bound to change. As the mind enlarges and wider horizons disclose themselves, we perceive things in different relations and in different perspective. Our eyes, as they grow stronger, can support fuller light. And the light of God, so far as our apprehension of it goes, is ever growing. In no department of life do we bind ourselves by the science of the ancients. We have outgrown their ideas of the universe, of chemical elements, of astronomy, of matter and the like. And even the most conservative of men have outgrown patristic and medieval theology. Ever growing light has given us new clues to the meaning of things. Yet the things themselves remain unchanged; it is only our view of them that alters. The Christian, of all men, should freely open his mind to light from every source since he alone is assured of the unity of all truth in Christ Jesus. Lovers of Christ who open their windows to truth share in the glory of God's evergrowing day.

The Awakening

The world today is demanding light upon the grave question of death and the hereafter. The war of 1914-1918 forced the whole subject upon the human conscience. Prior to that time ordinary men had been largely indifferent to it. It was possible, indeed, for a famous encyclopedia to appear without a single article upon the soul or immortality, while in the same encyclopedia seven pages were devoted to the subject of dogs, twenty-three pages to the subject of whiskey, wine and beers, twenty-one pages to the subject of apes and monkeys, twelve pages to the subject of angling and fishing, and more than a hundred pages to the subject of anatomy and physiology. And nothing concerning the greatest thing of which man has ever dreamed! In these easy days before the war, rationalism gave itself to the iconoclastic task of destroying the most cherished beliefs of humanity. Even a Doctor Haeckel, departing from his strict role of scientist, could commit himself lightheartedly to the purely dogmatic statement that belief in the survival of the soul is the "acme of superstition." And that such a belief "is in hopeless contradiction with the most solid empirical truths of modern science." How antiquated and odd such a statement reads today, yet thirty years ago it was received with awe!

It was the war that gave the coup de grace to academic vaporings of this kind. Rationalism found itself suddenly dumb in the presence of a great human awakening. It had nothing to say to wounded hearts. Day by day came the story of vast numbers of men on the battlefield blown to pieces by high explosives. Where had these boys gone? Was that the end of them? Parents, wives, brothers, children and friends were no longer to be put off by icy discussions addressed to a hypothetical situation. They wanted to know the fate of their loved ones hurled from this world by a satanic outburst of lust. The cruel bereavements of the war made the question of the survival of the human spirit the most acute of all questions. And it still remains the first of all questions for many. One of the early questions of the world, "If a man die shall he live again?" is also one of the last. So long as man is man it will be upon his lips.

It is not only the war, however, that has forced the subject to the front. There have been other influences at work. Science has been busy upon the question. It was not so long ago that men eminent in the world of science confidently affirmed that "science had no certainty whatever of any life beyond the present." Life they said is a piece of mechanism that wears out and is then scrapped. Or it is a flower that blooms once only and then perishes, leaving behind it no seed. When death comes, the chemical substances of which man's body and brain are composed pass into the vast mass to which they properly belong. Man, it was said, is a physico-chemical being of whom science can give a complete account without the necessity of positing a "spirit" or a "soul." "Thought is a function of the brain; the brain secretes thought as the liver secretes bile." Death is the final dissolution of the various elements which have bound man in a physical unity during his earthly existence. Man is purely and simply a creature of earth. To it and to nowhere else does he belong. As he sprang from it so he returns to it. There is no evidence whatever that there is anything in him which belongs to a spiritual world, nor is there any evidence of the existence of such a world. Neither the telescope which sweeps the heavens, nor the microscope which compels the earth to yield its uttermost secret, tells us a single word about this "soul" to which Christianity bears witness. As to the alleged disclosures of the spirit world, whether these emphasize the appearance of angels, the communications of the departed, or the reality of the resurrection of Jesus Christ—all alike belong to the world of myth or fantasy. Let it be said once for all, these savants cry, there is no future life. Life is largely a lottery and an affair of luck. All we can do is to make the best of it, to ward off death as long as we can, to enjoy to the full the pleasures which life presents, to secure as full an immunity as possible from disease and suffering, to aim at making the world a pleasant place to live in for everybody, to do our duty as citizens and neighbors and then to pass out without complaint. It may be a little humiliating to reflect that a fool and a philosopher can at last arrive only at the same goal of nothingness, together with vermin whose destiny is the same as our own; but this blow to our pride is inevitable. We have to take things as we find them. So spake many of the supposed wise men of yesterday. A few of them went farther, in declaring, as did Doctor Haeckel and Mr. Archer, that when men found life insupportable they should be permitted to terminate it by means of the lethal chamber, and that such suicide, so far from being regarded as an act of cowardice, should be respected as an act of wisdom. To such a pass were some of our philosophers driven!

The New Language of Science

The scientific men of today are speaking in another language. Science is enlarging its borders. Dazzled with the overwhelming discoveries of the physical world in the Victorian epoch, it is not surprising that many scientific men lost their bearings and became obsessed with the idea that the physical was all. But things have changed and are still changing rapidly. For one thing evolution is compelling men to reach out into fuller worlds. At first, the discovery of Mr. Darwin induced a kind of intoxication among his disciples, and, as in the case of physical intoxication, the victims of the cultus did not see clearly or they saw double. Supposed origins and processes filled the vision to the exclusion of other things of far greater importance. It was easier to link man, by reason of his vestigial remains, with the lower creation, than to discover in him, by means of another kind of science, a kinship with God—the Eternal Spirit. And so man was wholly accounted for by reference to his animal ancestry. His morality and his religion were traced to the same sources as his animal appetites.

But time has his revenges. The bases of the materialistic philosophy were challenged, first by the discovery of radium, and then by the emergence of the science of psychology. By means of the first the entire conception of matter was changed. By means of the second the conception of man was enlarged. Fifty years ago Professors Balfour, Stewart and Tait, the two most eminent physicists of the day (who were also devout Christian men) published (anonymously at first) this startling volume, "The Unseen Universe," in which was set forth a hypothesis which the science of today is on the road to confirming as an established truth. It was a spiritual hypothesis of the universe almost identical with that which is known as the electrical theory of matter. And it means, in a word, that matter is not the creative principle of the universe; it is the medium of a spiritual principle behind it. Again, the older evolutionists saw in man in his mortal habitation, the term of the whole world process. Man, it was admitted, was the crown of a mighty and lengthy process, but there was no further coronation for him. The story was told of his development from lowly forms, until his body and brain achieved a marvelous degree of perfection. And there the story tellers stopped. All this vast process ended in the production of a being, who, by his mind, was able to embrace the vast scheme of things, to rise to the contemplation of the Infinite, and yet who was doomed to exist for a few brief years, soaring all the time, and at the end to be dashed to pieces and forever snuffed out. Little wonder that the brutality and grotesqueness of such a conception made many of its advocates disguise it as skillfully as they could, as if they were in their hearts ashamed of it.

Religion's Auxiliary

Evolutionists of today are asking pertinently by what right is it assumed that the process of "upwardness" ends in man as he is? If the order hitherto has been animal, human, mental, moral in the name of what science is it forbidden to continue, and to add "psychical, spiritual"? And here psychology enters and dealing with man's "behavior" and his ideas, opens the door into the holiest of all and discloses man as a spiritual being. It is not on one line that we reach the Christian conclusion concerning the nature of man, but by means of several convergent lines. Science no longer blocks the way. It never did block the way. It was man's misunderstanding of it and his failure to coordinate various branches of knowledge that really blocked the way. Now that misunderstandings are disappearing and cooperation is entering, religion will yet find in science one of its greatest auxiliaries. In the following lectures a number of the points of contact will be touched upon. It must suffice now and here to name the bare fact.

The strange idea still persists in some quarters that the question of the hereafter is purely speculative and has no relation whatever to practical life. "Be content to do your duty" said the agnostic, Justice Stephen, "and leave such highly controversial questions as God and the hereafter out of your calculations, since you can never solve them." But what a begging of the question! What is a man's duty? It is the sum total of what is "due" from him—the debt, the obligation of his life. Is nothing "due" from him to the Power which produced and which sustains him? Has he no obligations to the future if it exists? Will it make any difference to his present conduct whether he works with a limited or an extended end in view? Tell a university student, for example, that it is his duty to his father and to himself to throw himself heartily and nobly into his studies with a view to perfecting himself, and then as an incentive, tell him that on the day he leaves the university, the only thing of which he can be quite certain is that there will be absolutely no career for him. Will he be likely, with such an urge, to study with ardor, inspired by the noble ideal "of working for work's sake"? And in what way can a man be inspired to do his duty if there is no worthy end in life, and if he and those for whom he works, together fall into the gulf when the day is done? It is no question of rewards or punishments; it is a question of sheer worth. There are noble souls who affirm that life and service for man can be as great and beautiful without belief in God or the hereafter. "Can we not have for ourselves and spread to others truth, beauty, honor and power" they ask "without tying up these things with religious beliefs?" The answer to the question is a simple one. On the severely practical side it is an established fact that the men and women who have most nobly served their fellows in the way of true charity, benevolence and social service, have been and are inspired by a faith, first in God, and then in the spiritual nature of man. For this reason their benevolence extends not only to the bodies, minds and surroundings of people, but to their spirits. Draw up a list of the great societies that give themselves to the work of helping men to a richer life, and see if it be not true that the vast majority of the workers are men and women who labor by the dynamic of the Christian ideal. As to those who, without belief in God or the hereafter, aim at social and intellectual betterment for their fellows, is it not true that the majority of them come from a Christian stock and are still haunted by Christian ideals? Where are the institutions of social service that are inspired by a disbelief in God and the future? More than this, can the highest service for man be sustained without the dynamic of faith in the future? Why, after all, should any man labor for the good of the race if the race be doomed to perish? Why should he lay himself out for posterity, if his descendants in their turn have no guarantee of the permanence of their moral achievements? Why should he seek to secure the greater material comfort of man when the irritation at having to surrender it all can only be increased as the spiritual uselessness of it all is discovered? However the plea may be in theory, in practice it makes for sterility of effort.

The question of the hereafter is not only intensely practical as it concerns human endeavor for others; it is quite as practical with reference to our own personal lives. It is simply idle to say that it does not matter one way or another. It matters everything. The question of our destiny is fundamental for life and endeavor. It is to our humanity what the sun is to the solar system. Where it shines clearly and brightly everything is illuminated and vivified. When we are deprived of it we walk in darkness and in peril. Truth will be lacking, for how can life be true unless it be directed to its true goal. Wisdom will be lacking since wisdom is the relation between a worthy end and a worthy means of attaining it. But if there be no worthy end to be sought how is it possible to adopt a worthy means?

Liberty also will be lacking, for true liberty is not any kind of free action, it is that action which directs every movement in accordance with the law of our being and the end for which we are created. Does it, or does it not make any difference to practical living to know whether we are only like leaves blown about by chance, or whether we are spiritual beings for whom a high and divine destiny is reserved? We cannot believe the former and act as if the latter were true. Believe that death ends all, and nothing but despair and misery can seize that soul which is fully awake to the cry and call of normal humanity. If the human race could tear from its heart its deep-seated belief in the future, philosophers may say what they will, nothing is more certain than that we should return to the jungle sooner or later. Not at first, for the momentum gained by Christianity would keep us going for a time, but when that had ended, then the deluge. For man could not blot out the best he has believed and remain the best in character.

Religious Education in Action

Character after the pattern of Jesus Christ is the goal

By F. W. STEWART

WHEN the history of present-day religious life in America is written, no feature of the story will be more prominent than the new interest in religious education and the phenomenal development of week-day instruction in religion. Whether it be wise or not, even evangelism, in the thought of many, yields place to the new enterprise. This is a false discrimination, and doubtless there must come a renewed emphasis on sane and earnest evangelism in which religious education will play its essential role. But at present religious education is being written into the budgets of our churches never again to be erased. Indeed the day is not far distant when home mission societies will be aiding in sending religious educators into sparsely settled parts, as now they send the evangelist and the colporter.

Great caution is needed, however, lest in our enthusiasm we imagine that religious education is an easily acquired magic, an alchemy that will turn lead into gold, or a panacea to cure all human ills, social and spiritual. And wisdom is essential lest we thoughtlessly set up new means of repeating old mistakes. To avoid these errors, it will be well to remind ourselves of the new approach to the subject which religious education should seek to make.

The basic assumption must be that vital religion is not a body of knowledge which we can impart, as we have tried to impart the multiplication table, but is rather a "set of the soul," a way of life, that can best be acquired by actual experience. Religion from this point of view is not so much a noun as it is an adverb; not so much a something which one can "get," as a mode of acting which one may achieve. It will not be enough to be able to repeat the Ten Commandments, or the two great commands, but rather to have these become part of the habitual machinery of life.

The idea is, of course, but a new emphasis on an old principle. Socrates said that virtue is knowledge. But Aristotle even more wisely said that it is practice and habit. We may impart to our boys and girls a perfect system of ethics which they can glibly repeat and yet leave them with a train of bad habits which they practice. It is the difference between the legal code of the Pharisees and the personal following of Jesus, who said, "I am the way," and again, "He that doeth the will of my Father shall enter into the kingdom of heaven."

Imagine a boy who can repeat his memory verse, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," but who acts as if neighbors are to be found only on the Jericho road, while he has no idea how to be neighbor to the new boy that has just moved into the next block. Or again, the boy who has memorized the words, "Ask and ye shall receive," yet who, in the face of his boyish temptations, has no knowledge of how to pray. And he cannot know how to pray if he has never prayed beyond mechanically repeating, "Now I lay me down to sleep." Picture Harry's mother calling him to run an errand for her and him pausing to say to himself, "Let me see; Exodus 20:12 (or is it Deuteronomy 5:16?) 'Honor thy father and thy mother,' " and then calling out to her, "Yes, mother, I am coming." The poor lad left to his precepts is in grave danger of confusion like that of the centipede:

"The centipede was happy, quite,
Until the toad for fun
Said, 'Pray which leg comes after which?'
This worked her mind to such a pitch
She lay distracted in a ditch,
Considering how to run."

If the habit track of obedience to the stimulus of mother's call has been formed by repeated acts of response, and the whole is colored by a happy and affectionate emotional glow, mother may be reasonably sure her request will be promptly met. Then Exodus 20:12 when learned, will come as an illuminating interpretation of existing habit, bringing the added social stimulus of binding Harry to all the obedient boys from antiquity to the present time. For the rule embodies the long results of social experience, and is the expression of united social judgment as to the highest human values, and so it endorses and clarifies Harry's own experience.

Wise educators see the relation of this principle to the field of general education and fashion their programs accordingly. Thus there has come the multiplication of laboratories and workshops, of kitchens and school gardens, and in every class purposeful projects are undertaken. Geography must not result merely in a memory rammed with statements regarding the capes of Kamchatka and the rivers of Thibet (if there are any), but also in skill in adjusting oneself to new geographical situations, whether actual ones which may arise on a family auto trip or those of the imagination when we follow Macmillan toward the Pole or seek to grasp the significance of Muscle Shoals. Even multiplication ceases to be a mere series of memorized tables, and becomes the habitual way of reacting to the high cost of living or the income tax, wave lengths or baseball scores.

Application of Principle

The application of this principle in religious education calls for a program in which there will be relatively less emphasis on precept and more on practice. To help Mary be truthful, we shall give her abundant opportunity and help for the practice of actually living truthfully, so that when a new situation in life presents itself, habit will already be set toward the truth, and there will be no wavering or uncertainty. To help Robert to purity of life, we shall see that he acquires skill in living purely in act and thought, skill in the use of the weapons available for fighting the inevitable battles against impurity. To insure our children becoming true worshipers, we shall not alone give them rules and instructions, but we shall secure for them actual participation in skillfully adapted exercises of worship till a joyous, reverent and trustful attitude toward the heavenly Father becomes the habit of their lives. And so the list might be extended. Religious education believes that what has hitherto been the happy good fortune of a privileged minority may become the heritage of all.

"But is there to be no place for instruction, for precepts, for ideas?" some one will say. "Where in such a program is the place of the Bible?" These, when fully understood, do their essential work as vicarious experience. Through them the child supplements his own experience, clarifies it, enlarges it, socializes it. These help him to just the extent that they become his own. As he enters into the situation of the simple story of the Good Samaritan and himself becomes in imagination the hero of that tale, he partakes of the experience of that man, and his own life becomes enriched and strengthened. Jesus knew the profound principle of psychology that to be best acquired instruction must become concrete, must be interpreted in terms of experience. Hence his matchless parables. The experience of the race is available for the child of today, but even the Bible itself will be nothing to him till it becomes his own experience, directly or vicariously.

Let nothing that has been said be taken to imply that we can enlarge our wisdom and dispense with the activities of the Spirit of God. Rather we would seek to know how he would have us do his work, how we may cooperate with him by improving the means and methods of doing our human part. We covet his approval, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Laboratories for Practice

Certain practical considerations follow from these principles. First of all we must realize that ideally the great institutions to which every child normally belongs—the home, the church, and the school—should be laboratories for practice in religious living. It is of the essential nature of a laboratory that the conditions under which work is done are controlled, so that the desired results are assured. So in these places in which a child spends so much of his life we should be able to control conditions, so as to give him just the type of experience needed to produce the best character. The ideal is high, but what are ideals for if not to spur to noble endeavor? Is it too much to add the playground to this group? Not if there is proper supervision.

In the next place in our purpose to give education that is religious, we shall introduce those things that give most opportunity for the acquiring of desired experience. The project, with its "purposeful activity," will find place in our instruction. Dramatics will be used, not for entertainment, but for the good of the participants, that they may get the emotional glow that comes with great deeds and noble aspirations. Camping, club life, scouting, and such things will be amply justified as instruments of religious education because through them wise leaders may direct the type of experience secured, and may give opportunity for that difficult but essential business of living together, while controlling the conditions of that life. Worship will be planned so as to give to each one the experience, appropriate to the conditions of his age and circumstances, of approaching the heavenly Father. And all of this should have suggested by this time the superior opportunities of the week-day school of religion and of the vacation school for practice as opposed to precept in religion.

If these principles are sound, what of the results? Wait and see. Wait patiently. Character is not made in a day, and character after the pattern of Jesus Christ is the goal. No generation has yet appeared that is the fruitage of such procedure as we have advocated, and the partial results at present attained may not easily be tabulated and exhibited. Character tests that will mark the progress from year to year are surely coming, but as yet they are in the experimental stage. So let us wait, and work. Surely God is in this thing for the blessing of your children and mine, for the children of our own country and of the world, for the children of today and for those of generations yet unborn.

The Church and Parenthood

BY LETITIA KNIGHT MINTZ

Young people are trained for everything in life except the biggest job of all—that of being parents.

AT AN older girls' conference recently, the subject of choosing a life work was presented in a helpful way. Leading women of various professions talked to the girls about the possibilities of their callings and the preparation required. The girls received the information with enthusiastic interest. So far as I have been able to learn, not one word was spoken with regard to the vocation of parenthood. Yet one may safely say that the majority of these girls are destined to marry and become mothers. One might add that most of those who marry will cease to function professionally after marriage. They are being encouraged to put a great deal of time and energy into preparation for an occupation which they will follow for perhaps five years. The occupation they will follow for the remainder of their lives is to be prepared for, if at all, only incidentally in connection with their vocational training, or by hurried chance reading when the need for information becomes imperative.

The conference mentioned is fostered by Protestant churches. It stands for the cultivation of high ideals and the development of Christian leadership among the young women of the community. Not for an instant would we question the value of the work it is doing. Undoubtedly girls should be trained for the professions, because the exigencies of life often demand that they support themselves and because they need a direct contact with the work of the world as much as boys do. We wish, however, to call attention to the fact that in regard to the training for parenthood this conference is abreast of most movements of the day, but in no sense ahead of them. Popular magazines publish frequent articles under such titles as "The Dub Father" or "The Parent Off the Job," many of which emphasize the fact that the writers of such articles were trained for everything in life except the biggest job of all—that of being parents. In the great Christian movements for young people, instruction is sometimes given in winning a husband or wife. There is no valid objection to this that we know of. But we wonder why it is not equally desirable that young people be taught to manage the family which ought to be the result of proper mating.

A Lack in Schools

Few institutions of higher learning offer courses calculated to fit the individual to bring up children. Many courses contribute to such training, but they are widely scattered among the several departments and no one person manages to benefit by even a majority of them. For the multitudes who never go beyond high school or the grades, there is no training for parenthood except the haphazard training of the school of experience, either first or second-hand. All education was once gained in this way. Only after ages of inefficiency and ignorance did humanity learn that the young could be fitted into the society into which they were born more quickly and more completely if they were trained in the accumulated experience of the race by a conscious, deliberate process. Schools were organized, and gradually larger and larger areas of human knowledge were reduced to didactic form and taught to the children. The tools for the acquisition of learning came first—the three R's. Then came the "content" subjects—philosophy, music, literature, history, science. More recently, vocational and trade courses have been added. The process of fitting the curriculum to the demands of contemporary living is continuous. Old courses are being combined or discarded altogether and new ones are being introduced. When a demand arises for instruction in some new line, the need is met by the introduction of a new course. No one knows the limit of this process. It would appear that if a phase of knowledge can be transmitted by teaching, and if people feel that they or their children need to be taught, all that is needed is to have some books written on the subject and it can be made a part of the curriculum. It is not necessary to leave things to chance in the "university of hard knocks."

The Need of Parents

An increasing literature on the subject of child psychology, home and school hygiene and kindred subjects has aroused the interest of educated parents. On the other hand, a sense of inadequacy in the face of the complicated problem of rearing children in this fast-moving age has sent most thinking parents in quest of information to help them to a solution. They read the books that happen to come to their notice. Few have sufficient time or knowledge to sift the available literature and select what is best. They need the assistance of those who can master all that is being written in this field, compare points of view and opinions, and glean the conclusions as to both principle and method which they consider helpful guides to parents who are dealing with concrete situations. They need a chance for discussing together the application of principle and methods to the situations they meet in their homes and the results they obtain from their efforts at such application. Each home is much more liable to make uncorrected mistakes in isolation than it is if it is constantly impartially compared with other homes. In short, what parents need today is an opportunity for organized study of the function and duties of parenthood.

II

What has the church to do with this need? Long ago when education was for the church and the aristocracy exclusively, a movement in the Christian church gave the privilege of schooling to the common people. Protestantism, with its belief in the authority of the Bible and the sacredness of the individual, needed to know how to read and the result is to be found in the public school system of today. The debt of society to the church cannot go unacknowledged.

Today parents are asking themselves how they can learn to meet the problems which confront them in their children. They are turning this way and that for an answer. Should not the church meet this emergency as it met the needs of an illiterate constituency centuries ago? While the public schools are awakening to the demand for this type of education and devising means for meeting it, the church can do much to supply the immediate needs. Some local organizations are already doing so. Clubs for young mothers (seldom for fathers) and Sunday-school classes studying the religious rearing of children are to be found here and there. Courses of lectures sponsored by the church give some very real aid. Something better organized and more widely effective could undoubtedly be done.

That education for parenthood is within the scope of the church school becomes apparent at once. The Catholic church remains strong through the careful training of its children. Most Protestant churches grow in proportion to the efficiency of their Sunday-school work. If the homes of church members can be made more effective in religious training, the position of the church will be strengthened accordingly. On the other hand the increase in child delinquency and crime is appalling. In many cases it is traceable to home training or lack of it. The conservation of childhood and the safe-guarding of our future citizenry demand the training of parents for their task.

Every child is regarded by the church as a sacred trust. Many churches emphasize this fact by a service of consecration in which the parent is enjoined to bring the child to a godly life. Following such a service, the parents and child are not isolated from the rest of the world, to work out their own salvation in the fear of the Lord and in company with one another. They are thrown into the midst of a complex social environment in which influences of all sorts are brought to bear upon them. The child is presently taken from home for hours each day while other adults teach him many things. He plays with other children, many of whom come from homes where the name of God is never mentioned. How are parents to make their child feel that he is a child of God under such conditions? The answer is increasingly hard when one considers that most young parents have only the faintest idea of the problem that confronts them. They have no conception of a definite goal to be attained—definite habits of action and thought to be taught, definite attitudes to be cultivated. Having no goal, they cannot have a method. Their home life is haphazard, unintelligent. Yet evidence is constantly accumulating to show that children brought up by intelligent methods under the guidance of what science has learned are well-trained children. The fact that many parents are successful without the aid of science is due to their native intelligence and consecration.

The Church Must Help Parents

If a child is to be brought up in the kingdom of God, his character must be founded upon a ground work of habits acquired in babyhood. If parents love God and their children, they want to bring the children into fellowship with God as early as they can. A spoiled child cannot be expected to learn the love of God readily. All of Christ's teaching implies the intimate connection of high moral living with the spiritual life. A child's moral life must be of the highest type possible for him if he is to find God in Christ. To help the child to this way of life is, then, the parents' greatest task. The church that would echo the Master's call to little children in this day must help the parents.

III

Judging from the general discontent of parents with their own methods, from the helpless admission so often heard that "I simply don't know what to do with him," it ought not to be hard to create a demand for organized instruction of parents in the church. The first necessity is to secure the cooperation and support of those in charge of religious education in our churches. Denominational boards of education should broaden their program to include training for parenthood. Handbooks and suggested courses of reading to be put in the hands of parents may be carefully prepared and constantly revised to make room for new literature as it appears. The organization of classes and clubs of both men and women should be encouraged and fostered. In most churches may be found some mature man or woman who has a wealth of practical experience and the ability to assimilate new ideas. Such a person, given the other qualities which go to make a good teacher, would be very suitable as the leader of a discussion group of parents.

The organization of classes and clubs for training in parenthood could be encouraged by advertising the courses planned, and a national organization similar to the Philathea and Baraca movements or the Agoga and Amoma classes. Have we carefully surveyed the situation to see whether existing organizations are taking care of all within our reach who need their help? In many cases, local identification with a national movement would not mean a new local organization, but merely the reshaping of an old one. As a means for cooperative effort among Christian parents to raise the standard of child-training in Christian homes, a movement fostered by the church seems to be of the utmost practical value.

A story is told of a convention of mothers at which the question for discussion was the time at which a child's religious training should begin. One mother said that she began when the child said his first word. Another began when he entered public school. Still another thought religious training should begin at birth. At last an older woman rose and said that the suggestions made were all good, but she believed that the time to begin to train children was the generation before they were born. It is not enough that parents whose habits are fixed should be given help in the problems they face. Young people, not yet married, whose minds are wide open to new impressions should be trained for future responsibilities. We suggest, therefore, that an elective course for college-age men and women should be prepared dealing with the functions of family life, child psychology, the laws of growth, mental and physical hygiene of child life, and the religious training of children.

Parents as Teachers

The suggestion has been made by a leading religious educator that all parents should be enrolled by the church as teachers as soon as their child is born, and that they should be held responsible to the church for his religious training. Such a course may seem drastic at present, but to introduce courses for preparation for parenthood in our teacher-training institutes or to encourage all young people to take such courses already offered as are helpful to parents—might be done with little difficulty. In churches maintaining teacher-training classes of their own, parallel elective courses in child training in the home ought to be given a prominent place. Local conditions must dictate local methods. Whether the church is to take up this task permanently, or only until secular education assumes the responsibility, the present need is apparent and urgent.

"Falsehood, especially if you have a bad memory, is the worst enemy a fellow can have."—Abraham Lincoln.

Rev. Dr. J. H. Jowett once spent a few days in the house of a distinguished man of God. The thing in that man's house which made the deepest impression on the great preacher was the phraseology used in returning thanks for the meals. "We never had the same phrase twice, and I always sat down to a meal with delightful expectancy, wondering what the next phrase would be. It was very enriching and vitalizing. Every meal became the opportunity for a new expression."—The Expositor.

There is plenty of room today for the simple practice of old-fashioned principles. It is an age of new theories, cure-quicks, and cure-alls; but a little more practice of solid, old, ordinary virtues would do much to change the face of the world.—Congregationalist.

The Devotional Life

Wireless Telegraphy and Reality in Prayer

"When thou prayest, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seest in secret shall reward thee openly."—Matt. 6:6

BY G. W. CASSIDY

THE Volturno burned at sea, Oct. 11, 1913. The nearest vessel was seventy-four miles away; 657 souls were on board. It seemed that all were doomed; yet only 136 of the 657 were lost; 521 were saved. How was it done?

In a little cabin on that boat, a man sat at a wireless key. Message after message flashed out into the air. Seventy-four miles away in another cabin a receptor began flashing and sputtering. Its coherer was receiving the message of distress that its aerial had picked out of the quiet air about. The prayer of the Volturno was heard and relief hastened to her.

The first movements in the history of wireless telegraphy date back to experiments completed by Faraday in 1846 but the first steps in the present successful processes date from Hertz in 1888. Its practical use comes down to Marconi in 1896. It has practically revolutionized ocean travel. No longer can a man on the ocean drop out of the tides of life or live unconscious of the affairs of men and nations.

The Equipment

For wireless telegraphy there must be a transmitter by means of which the sounds are electrified and sent into space; and a receptor with its sensitive coherer by means of which the air currents are received and the message reproduced at the receiving station. At either end there is a living being—one who sends, the other who receives the message. If the message calls for action, the receiver is the one on whom depends the answer. The air is the only medium of transfer. All these facts give us a practical demonstration and help us grasp a great spiritual reality—the reality of prayer. Prayer is the wireless telegraphy of the soul. It unfolds the whole philosophy of prayer as taught by the Master in the model prayer. The main difference lies in the fact that in prayer we talk in terms of life. It is law in a spiritual world.

Six steps are to be noted in the process.

1. There is a virile transmitter. The man who prays sees a need; possesses a desire; finds a possibility he wishes achieved. He realizes his inability. He believes there is a God able and willing to accomplish for him what he cannot accomplish, or at least give him ability or wisdom to do. He prays. How far may his prayer go? If audible, he only knows that those within range of his voice can hear. If silent, he has no immediate evidence that it has gone out of his own heart. Here comes the second step in the parallel.

2. By a man's prayer, a warmth of soul has come to him. If we seek the answer from the Word we hear, "We know not how to pray as we ought but the Spirit himself makes intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered." The Holy Spirit is the transformer in the transmission. He vitalizes that message. He speeds it on. The Holy Spirit is the magnetizing power.

3. Wireless telegraphy has a medium through which its message goes. The magnetic disturbance of the ether goes on and on and on. Impinging somewhere on a sensitized receiver, it conveys its message there. This is a material transference after all. In prayer the transference is not material but spiritual. There are soul means of transference we do not understand, but they exist. Human actions—psychical phenomena have demonstrated the reality of this assertion. Mind reading is a manifestation of this truth. Spiritualism and clairvoyance are readily explained by it. There is no mystery in the fact. Nor are spirits, good or evil, essential for its explanation. It is telepathic communication pure and simple.

4. As our prayer wings its way it finds a resolving coherer. This is our Christ. He catches the message. So Paul tells us, "Christ liveth to make intercession." (Rom. 8:34.) "He is able to save to the uttermost for he ever liveth to make intercession." (Heb. 7:25) "If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father." (I John 2:1) So he resolves the message for us as he presents it to the

5. Sympathetic receiver. The ear of God is open to hear our cry. So is our text true. We pray to our Father in secret and "the Father which seeth in secret rewards us openly." As John puts it, "This is the confidence we have in him, that if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us." (I John 5:14, 15) So our prayer is heard by the Father.

6. The answer comes because he is a powerful Helper. So Jesus could positively declare, "Ask and ye shall receive."

In Tune

But one tremendously important fact needs yet to be noticed. Positive certainty of wireless communication demands that the aerials be in tune. Sometimes we ask why prayer is not answered. For the same reason a wireless message might pass by unheard. We are not in tune with the Infinite. David expressed it, "If I regard iniquity in my heart the Lord will not hear me." (Ps. 66:10.) The prayer of faith puts us in tune. Therefore we may ask with the expectation of receiving, for we have the certainty that he will hear.

NOTE: All references hereafter made to these "Meeting Helps" will be to the following books: "Modern Discipleship and What It Means" by Woods; "Twelve Tests of Character" by Fosdick; "The Man Nobody Knows" by Barton; "Gates and Keys to Bible Books" by Robinson; "How We Got Our Bible" by Smyth; "A Short History of the Christian Church" by Moncrief; "Peasant Pioneers" by Miller; "God's Dynamite" by Lerrigo. The entire set of books may be had from the American Baptist Publication Society. A few others may be added later.

This lesson is based on the fifth chapter of "Peasant Pioneers." Read this over several times to fix it in mind.

A leaflet "Baptist Progress among Slavic Races" will help you considerably. This may be had for five cents from the literature department of the Board of Missionary Cooperation (New York, Chicago, Boston, Los Angeles).

If you do not know of a Slav who could come and tell the young people of the many forms of worship prevalent among his people, this chapter could be subdivided among the members of your group and presented as a story.

Or if some of your members have had dealings with the Slavs and know of their worship life, perhaps this person could bring the message of the evening.

Should your group decide to give this topic themselves, they could make it a sort of trip among the Slavic communities in America. One could tell of his visiting the Roman Catholic church, where the people "worshiped an Unknown God." Another could tell of his visit to the Greek Orthodox church which was in many ways similar to the Roman Catholic. Others could tell of the Protestant churches and missions and the work which is being done there.

If there is a Slavic community accessible to you, perhaps you could get one or two of their songs and have them sung at this time.

Another member might tell of visiting a community hall where socialism and atheism seemed to prevail. Show that because of the oppression in Europe by the church, many of these people turned entirely away from God—because they never knew him as he really is, but as he was represented by the priests. Try to bring to the young people the lesson that because there are so many who do not know him, we must, by our actions toward them and by our daily living among them, show them the Christ as he is.

"I greatly enjoyed attending the 34th Anniversary Convention and was much impressed with the splendid program you put on at that time. I have no adverse criticism whatever to offer. It seems to me that you have done the work superlatively well."

What Kind of a Noise Does It Make?

Does it "clink clank?" Does it "rattle bang?" Or does it ring true?

Does it sound hard? Does it sound cold? Or does it sound new?

That's what the people wanted to find out. Maybe money talked to some people, but it didn't to them. That was all imagination and foolishness anyway. They'd see if it weren't. They saw—and they heard.

Perhaps money doesn't talk very often—so that we can hear or so that we will hear; but when it does talk, or when we do listen to it, we learn a lot. This time the people listened—and heard and learned.

They learned about the work which our missionaries were doing in Africa and India. They followed a colporter on a trip he made in the grand old West. They were living again in their school days, were back in college as they looked on at that picture of the Baptist work in colleges.

A High Percentage

The B. Y. P. U. of First Church, Washington, D. C., reported the following (six months):

Membership increased from 56 to 71, 30 per cent.

Average attendance at meetings, 91 per cent.

Daily Bible Readers during 6 months, 96½ per cent.

Monthly participation of members, 93 per cent.

Study course, members taking, passing, 100 per cent.

Attendance at Federation rallies, 68 per cent.

Every member participated in devotional meetings at least once each month for three successive months.

One hundred per cent of the members were reported as daily Bible readers for five of the six months.

Total funds raised $725, including $185 for benevolences and missions.

Again, they saw the business-like but Christian way in which the state office was run, caught an idea of the immensity of the work and of the results. They discovered what the B. Y. P. U. of America was doing—how it was trying to help the young people of our land to do their best for Christ.

They caught a glimpse of our Baptist headquarters in New York, and received an insight into the heart of our denomination's executive leader. And finally, they saw what the result of all of this had on two young people, who had been eager for a good time and indifferent to the work of our church.

What's all of this we're raving about? Why, haven't you heard? It's a play presenting the great cooperative home and foreign missionary program of the Baptists. The name of it is "Money Talks."

"Oh," you say, "we're not interested. We've had those sketches or plays or whatever you want to call them, and as soon as people heard that they were about missions they stayed away. That is, some of them did. Some came out, and were interested, but that's about all."

"Well," we'll answer you, "try again." This time you won't be showing the people the work of just one organization, but the work of the whole denomination.

"That may be, but those things are usually so dry and uninteresting. Most people want something human and interesting. Of course, they want to know about the work, but they can find out through reading about it."

"But," we'll counter, "do they read about it?" As a rule, they do not. But here is the chance for them to find out all about the work—in a "different" way.

"But what has that got to do with money talking?" That's right, we forgot to tell you that. Perhaps that is why this is a little different from other sketches.

All these "scenes" of the work are shown by "Money" who visited some young people who were not interested. They expected to be bored to death; but, they listened.

That's what your people will do, too, when "Money Talks" is shown to them. They will sit up and take notice. They will be convinced that if they but listen money can oftentimes tell them some interesting stories.

Now, don't you want to let your people—and all the church-folks, too—hear "Money Talks"? If you do, you may secure one free copy by writing to the B. Y. P. U. of A. After you look it over, you'll feel that it simply must be "put on." And after it is "put on"—well, we're willing to bank on results!

The Chimney Corner

"What My Father Meant to Me"*

BY GENE STRATTON PORTER

"Blow high, blow low, not all the snow

Can quench our hearth-fire's ruddy glow."

THERE was no man in our county who could point a finger of scorn at my father and whisper that when he held a position of trust in the church, in the schools, in the affairs of the county, he had managed matters to further his own ends, had used funds dishonestly, or had not faithfully administered his office. I have seen too many hearts wrung, too many lives ruined, too many fortunes wrecked by the machinations of men lacking honor, not to be devoutly thankful that I had as a birth-right from my father an honorable name, one which meant not only godliness but uplift and progress.

And next I admit my obligations to him because he was sanely religious. He had made a study of all religions; had read Confucius, Buddha, and all the great books of the world on the subject of worship—and the King James version of the Bible was the one in which he believed.

No human being could say that my father did not practice what he preached when he stood in our pulpit, or the pulpits of other churches of our own, or any denomination. Each hour of his daily life was given to fulfillment of his conception of the religion of Jesus Christ—put into actual living, daily practice. His religion was not a shelved thing for Sunday; it was oiled, regulated, and in working order from early Monday on to Saturday night. His religion was a religion of hope, of joy, of helpfulness. It was a religion of song, of good cheer, and loving kindness.

My father held himself to be a pioneer, not only in the literal sense of marching westward when he had his own road to carve before him, of cultivating soil and building homes and helping the neighbors and administering local government and establishing schools—these were material things—he also believed in mental pioneering. He did not care for progress which cleared land and built homes, unless the land were properly cleared, and the homes of a kind that would tend, in the aggregate, to make a safe and desirable community in which to live.

He always felt that any day was lost in which he had not learned, from books or from some other man, some way in which he could be a bigger man and a better man than he had been on the day before. He counted that day lost on which he had not shown some especial kindness, carried some message of the gospel, helped a needy neighbor, or in some way furthered the cause of making his township, his county, and his state a little bigger and finer than they had been on the day before.

I owe to my father the privilege of having been born on a farm so lovely that I have never seen one to equal it, as I knew it forty years ago. Through the middle, from north to south, ran the public highway, a highway, so far as we were concerned, neatly fenced, with not a weed growing in a fence corner on either side of it. The only decorations were clumps of alder and of wild rose, left for adornment, the corners filled with long grass and wild flowers.

Three energetic brooks of running water, fed by half a dozen springs, crossed the land.

The house was at the height of an elevation—which was merely a gentle slope—and back of it lay a carefully planted orchard; rows of apple trees, selected with extreme care, and bordered by a peach tree in every fence corner, so that in early spring our big white house, surrounded by evergreen and fruit trees and flowering shrubs, was an alluring invitation to every passer-by on the road.

To the south of it spread a garden that would have deceived anyone into thinking its mission in life was flowers.

Father never was too busy to plant any kind of shrub or flower that needed the muscle of a man in comfortably placing its roots. One of the most beautiful decorations, even in a yard filled with every tree and shrub and vine possible to obtain, was a wild sweet brier. It grew so near the corner of the back porch that it was possible to stand on the porch and hang the dish towels to sun on its widely spreading branches.

Some of its older shoots were as thick as mother's wrist. Its leaves had the exquisite scent to which it owed its name, "sweet brier;" and the big clusters of wild roses that grew on it, with their varied pink satin shadings and their hearts of gold, were as exquisite as any flower I ever have seen.

There was a well, deep and walled, for drinking water, and back of the house a cistern of rain water for washing. There was a big woodhouse, in the front part of which the washing was done. Along one side of this ran a workbench, at which father was very expert in making anything that was needed in the repair work about the house. He even constructed a beautiful double-seated sleigh and beside it, in the big red barn that housed so many sheep and cattle and horses, there stood on the threshing floor a shining double carriage, with side lamps and patent-leather trimmings. On state occasions this was drawn by a team of long-tailed matched grays which were my mother's pride.

I do not remember any home in the neighborhood that had quite such pretty blinds, such billowing lace curtains, or such a wonder of red cherry and black walnut furniture upholstered with shining black haircloth. I never saw elsewhere anything to equal the papering of the parlor walls. There was a three-inch stripe of green velvet of the richest loveliest shade; then a wide creamy band of a foot or so; and crossing it were little flowery festoons on each of which was strung a quaint little flaring basket filled with red rosebuds, blue cornflowers, yellow daisies, lilies-of-the-valley, and lilacs—too dainty and pretty for words.

When three men had carried huge logs in to the fireplaces, and the storm was beating outside and frosting the windows with crystal ferns, and the flames were crackling and roaring up the chimneys when the doors of all the rooms stood open and the candles flickered on the mantels and highboys, and the lamps glowed on the tables, and the bright carpets over their soft paddings of wheat straw gave to our steps, we liked our home!

Dimly, from the time I was a little thing, I realized that it was because my father's shoulders were square, and his head was high, and his eyes were on the stars, and his hands were strong and capable, that we had this big white home and the patent-leather carriage and the gray team; that mother stepped out in her billowing silks of gray and brown and black, and her dainty little bead-and-flower-trimmed bonnets, and her pretty, shiny shoes, and the flashing pin of gold-stone at her throat, and the ring of gold from California on her finger.

(To be concluded)

Do You Say—

"I feel badly" or "I look badly?"

Correct—if you mean that there is something wrong with your sense of touch, or with your organ of vision. But if you mean that you are feeling ill or are grieved; or that your appearance is not up to par, then say, "I feel bad;" "I look bad." You need in this case an adjective to describe "I" and not an adverb to describe your manner of feeling or looking. There's a rule to the effect that the verbs seem, feel, appear, look, and a similar significance are followed by an adjective.

BOYS and Girls

Curly-Kews Explores

CURLY-KEWS was putting on airs. She wagged her head and swished her skirts as she walked past and was too important to stop and talk to Emmaline: "I'se gwine to trabel norf a very shortly, Emmaline," she explained over her shoulder, "that I'se got to get my duds togedder straight off. Pickin' takes a heap o' time. 'Deed it es!"

"I reckon," sighed Emmaline enviously, "if she had never been anywhere or picked anything in her whole life: couldn't I perhaps come help you? I'd jess admire to be of 'sistance."

"Mighty 'bliged, I'se sure," said the disdainful Curly-Kews, who perfectly shied for an audience, of course, but who really had so little to pack that she wondered if Emmaline might not sniff at such a small collection. But as Emmaline was already trailing along behind her, the matter really settled itself, and beside the log cabin Curly-Kews pointed out the corner of the family box which was hers to fill.

"I reckon up norf it am so monstrous old I likely won't be wearin' this old dico again," she said as she folded it.

"But what will you wear?" gasped Emmaline, who knew perfectly well that Curly-Kews had only two dresses to her name—the old faded blue calico now being packed and the bright pink calico ready donned for the trip.

"Why, honey chile," said Curly-Kews gaily, "ain't you nebber heard tell how cold up norf is, so dang'rous cold that folks wear furs all winter? Furs of bears and lions and things like that. Jess to keep warm. I 'spect I'se gwine to get me one of them hebbly coats, first of; 'cause when I 'tends the white folks' school I'se not gwine have them think I don't know nuffin."

Emmaline felt limp all over: "What you say—you gwine to 'tend the white folks' school? Oh Curly-Kews, you can't stuff me with such a tale; tell me the truth!"

Curly-Kews swished her pink calico skirt: "Shucks, that's nuffin! Jess 'tending white folks' school isn't nuffin. 'Course, they don't let colored chillen into white folks' schools down souf here, but up norf—oh, a heap different. Look here, Emmaline, I ain't gwine take this old no account hair ribbon along, not worth packin', so you can have it if you likes."

Emmaline grabbed the poor old tattered ribbon eagerly: "I'd jess admire to have it off you, Curly-Kews, and I'se a-min' to think of you kindly up norf, so stand and all! Oh me, oh my!"

As a matter of fact, it wasn't much of a trip. Her family seemed to do nothing but change cars, and carry heavy bundles up and down station platforms, asking bewildered questions, going in all the wrong directions, sitting in all the wrong seats, getting cinders in their eyes. Curly-Kews suddenly felt too little and tired and unimportant to swish her pink calico skirts. And secretly, down in her heart, she thought trains were altogether horrid . . . if you tried to stand up, they tumbled you down! if you tried to drink water, they spilled the water; if you tried to sleep, they blew whistles and frightened you awake; if you went to sit on the shady side across the aisle somebody would be sure to say: "This seat is reserved!"

Curly-Kews' city was made up of rumbling carts and roaring cars and dashing autos and whizzing motor-cycles: she needed a hundred eyes at once to see the hundred astonishing things always trying to run over her. She needed a hundred legs to carry her from street to street looking for a place to live.

"Get out of here!" thundered the first landlord, "do you think I'm going to let a lot of negroes rent such a fine house as mine?"

This "fine house" was a shabby queer little box of a place with all its windows broken and its front steps lacking entirely. "We don't want no such old wiggilty-piggilty house, anyhow!" grinned Mr. Wiggly.

Landlord Number 2 was almost as bad: "Not much, I won't let such a parcel of kids rent my house," he roared as he counted the young Wiggly noses, "What you think I'm doing—running an orphan asylum? Think I'm going to have you kicking my elegant walls, demolishing the window panes and dirtying the wall paper? Good morning!"

"Sakes alive!" said Mrs. Wiggly, beaming, "ain't he got a grand vocabulary? Don't seem to me like seven is such a big family of chillen. Wouldn't part with one of you, no, sir, not jess on account o' the grandest house on earth!"

"Same here!" said Mr. Wiggly, also beaming. And all the seven little Wigglys beamed all over their seven dear black faces. But somehow, that night, they couldn't beam another beam, for would you believe it? Every single landlord either refused to have them or else asked such terrible rent that Mr. Wiggly felt scared to remember the very sun.

So next time you see a colored person in your town, remember the Wigglys and say to yourself: "Now I wonder if that person is living where he or she wants to live, or just where he or she is forced to live, since it is the only place they can afford?" And when you see a little colored boy or girl, do stop and remember Curly Kews, and wonder how this other child is being treated at school! For Curly-Kews lost her last proud kink at our white folks' school. For there were fifty-seven varieties of white boys and girls in her grade—clean white boys and girls, dirty white boys and girls; bright white boys and girls, stupid white boys and girls; rich white boys and girls; poor white boys and girls; yet every single one of them turned up his or her little white nose at the new black pupil.

"She's black all over!" they sniffed, as if that were something awful. But one girl in that grade was a Baptist, who thought that the things you learned on Sunday in Bible school were meant to be practiced on Monday in day school. And one of the things she had learned in Bible school was that the Saviour loved everybody alike. That he died to save everybody alike. That he has a heaven for everybody alike. That he can't have much use for a white child who feels too proud to speak to a black child.

This Baptist girl, Elsie, told this to her cousin named Bob, and they thought it would be fun to start a club. You gained your membership by doing something nice for Curly-Kews and you lost your membership at once if you did anything unkind to Curly-Kews. "C. K. W." it was called. Some people thought it was a Greek letter secret society, but of course you and I know it was just the initials of Curly-Kew Wiggly's name; although the club members later decided that C stood for "courtesy" to any black person anywhere; the K stood for "kindness" to every black person you meet; and the W stood for "worth" as much as white people.

"For," explained Bob, the president of C. K. W., "God made some folks black and some folks white, and one is worth as much as the other, I guess." And I can't help adding—provided, of course, they are all being shepherds of Kingdom Come, like Elsie and Bob!

Among Ourselves

A Unique Method of Evangelism

By WARREN L. STEEVES

We feel that the Northern Baptist Convention did a great piece of work when it endorsed the movement to give the right of way to evangelism during the months of January and February. Many pastors do not like the stereotyped evangelistic meetings, still others are weary of the lonely effort of special meetings conducted by themselves; hence, each pastor must evolve a plan that seems suited and adequate for his needs.

We have just concluded a campaign which is unique and arresting in its dimensions, its aim and result. We pass it on through the columns of this paper.

We asked fifteen preachers throughout the state to come to our aid for two weeks. Six pastors came the first week and nine the second week. Only two stayed over on Sunday. The campaign was directed by the pastor of the church. It opened with considerable publicity. Electric signs which told of the meeting were placed on the church, and the city newspapers gave large space to the campaign. The first meeting was held Jan. 3, the pastor preaching and an augmented choir assisting under the direction of the regular chorister. On Monday the pastors began to come into the field.

One of the important parts of the work was the entertainment of the visiting brethren in certain homes of the congregation. This was for the purpose of creating an atmosphere of hospitality and responsibility on the part of the people. The outcome of this was that each home blessed with the presence of a visiting pastor felt that the guest was the finest man in the world, and each pastor felt that he had the best possible place to be entertained.

Shop meetings were arranged for each week day in the factories and from one to five of these were held every day. A noon-day luncheon was held in a downtown restaurant where we had one large room for the workers to meet. Here we gave reports of the work and had sweet fellowship and meditation.

Each morning all met at the church office at eight o'clock. After some time spent in devotion and prayer, the plans for the day were adopted. This meant visiting all the members of the congregation, and holding the shop meetings and luncheon together with a great meeting in the afternoon where the Bible was expounded and taught for one hour by two of the visiting pastors. These meetings were largely attended and were appreciated by many people not members of the First Baptist church.

The entire membership and constituency were called on during the first week and everybody was alive to the opportunity that had come to the city to hear the gospel and feel the power of God. The evening congregations were large and each pastor who preached exalted Jesus Christ, the watchword of the meeting being, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." At each service during the entire campaign, some were converted and came forward, making their confession of faith in Christ.

The place given to prayer in the meeting was possibly one of the main reasons for success. At the close of every evening service the congregation would separate into groups and remain in prayer for some time. Twenty-four of these groups were arranged throughout the church.

Filling the Church

The last Sunday, the pastor of the church was alone in the service and such was the interest that the Bible school was greatly increased and the morning service was one of the largest ever held in the church. At the evening hour, long before the time for worship, the church auditorium was filled and the Bible-school rooms and galleries were overflowing with eager worshippers. We are not counting the number of converts; they were many, but we cannot at this time estimate the blessing both to the city and the church of the wide spread sowing of the gospel seed.

All the expenses of the campaign were raised without the slightest commotion and every bill was paid when the meetings closed. No individual was asked to give anything, but some felt that the plan was so admirable and the blessing received so extensive that they came forward and gave their money voluntarily. The church is a great spiritual unit and the prayers of the congregation are following the faithful men who assisted the pastor in the work. These men are Revs. Marion Flint, Prospect, Ohio; Charles Walsh, Sidney, Ohio; J. H. Ansberg, Cleveland, Ohio; M. Hanenkrat, Findlay, Ohio; J. W. Hooper, Columbus Grove, Ohio; Amos Oyer, Lima, Ohio; W. T. Carpenter, Lima, Ohio; L. A. Wood, Mansfield, Ohio; A. W. Coates, Cleveland, Ohio; E. L. Holliday, Marion, Ohio; Earl Griffith, Toledo, Ohio; G. A. Cole, Cleveland, Ohio; A. D. Laman, Chicago, Ill.; F. L. Tinkham, Lima, Ohio; Mr. Manning, West Mansfield, Ohio.

We recommend the plan to any church with a membership and constituency of over 1800 in a city of over 50,000.

Baltimore, Maryland

By O. C. S. WALLACE

What is that old story of Cromwell and the twelve golden statues of the apostles? The sturdy soldier gave order that they be melted and coined, that they might "go about doing good," like the Master of the original apostles.

Something like this is happening in Baltimore if rumors as to the method of financing certain Roman undertakings are trustworthy. It is said that the late Cardinal Gibbons accumulated great sums of money, and that this is the source from which Archbishop Curley draws to finance these undertakings. Lately the Knights of Columbus building was dedicated. It was Sunday, and the governor was there, and our leading Jewish rabbi, and other notables. The building is located near our central Y. M. C. A. Though not remarkably attractive on the outside, it is said to have equipment so spacious and up-to-date within that this building is likely to become the "Social Center" of Baltimore. Please note the capital S and C. Fashionables will hold costly balls there. The "400" will eat costly banquets there. Other high-class hotels will feel the pinch, and the Roman church will gain some prestige. At least this is what some good folk, who are interested in this sort of thing, believe. In passing it may be remarked that the erecting of fine school buildings, combined with attractive chapels, in our rapidly growing suburbs is another form of activity made possible by the funds of the church. Here is an example: Near my suburban home the city has built a million dollar school. Not many months after it was completed the Roman church completed within its stone's throw of it a large and beautiful parochial school building. Archbishop Curley has not won the favor of Protestants as Cardinal Gibbons won it, but he is a mighty force for his church.

Down-Town Denominations

The Episcopalians are strong, aggressive and growing in Baltimore. Bishop John G. Murray, recently promoted to the primacy of the American Episcopal church, is a man of extraordinary personal force and administrative capacity. He will tell you that he was born a Presbyterian and educated under Methodist influences. In connection with his campaign for a cathedral he had here a couple of years ago Coadjutor Bishop Bay of Birmingham, England, son of a Baptist minister and grandson of a Baptist minister. In these affiliations do we find an explanation of Bishop Murray's "apathy" towards the members of other denominations? Whatever be the e-planation the glad hand is extended to men and women of light and leading, and many there be that find it. Stories are told in corners that need not be proclaimed from housetops; but the social ure of Anglicanism, so well known in England, is reproduced in sacerdotal, sacramental Baltimore, and the Episcopalian are the chief gainers.

We have some strong pastors in down-town churches, and the continuance of these churches in strength is purposed. There are two notably strong down-town Presbyterian churches, three Episcopalian, and one Methodist. Eutaw Place Baptist is facing its future as a down-town church, though not yet so close to the pulsation of commerce as the six referred to above. Our Seventh church, though farther away from the great center of Baltimore's business life, is on the edge of a rapidly developing business area, and is making its plans to serve as a down-town church should do. This church has just called Dr. John H. Davis, of the Memorial church, Philadelphia, to the pastorate. The Eutaw Place church, manned by a group of men of rare quality and devotion, is facing the future with a song. A project has just been launched for raising a $100,000 endowment. This is casting an anchor to windward, to quote from the late J. G. Blaine, remembering that the financial strength of down-town churches is liable to fluctuate, and intending that by means of this endowment the physical properties of the church shall be properly cared for in all weathers.

Maryland is maintaining its place as the largest per capita giver to Baptist causes among Southern Baptists. When the Foreign Board asked lately for $1,000,000 towards its debt, Maryland undertook to raise $20,000. Eutaw Place gave nearly two-fifths of this. Though Maryland has reached its objective, this is not true of the South as a whole. Perhaps two-thirds of the million asked for will be raised. Many in some of the states did not approve of the Foreign Board making an independent campaign. Baptist growth in the South has been so rapid that some improvements must be made in the machinery of the denomination if creaking is to be avoided.

Colorado Letter

By F. B. PALMER

Evangelism has the right of way these days in the Centennial state. The Taylor party consisting of the father and two sons are in the midst of a meeting of great promise at First church, Denver. On the opening day, Jan. 24 the capacity of the church was taxed at both morning and evening services. Rev. Francis W. Starring of Denver, on Jan. 24 closed a three weeks' series of meetings with fine results, assisting Rev. F. W. Hart of Berthoud. The Arvada church had one of the best meetings in its history early in January, when pastor W. F. Cole, was assisted by convention evangelist, E. M. Steadman, who is now in special meetings at Ault, assisting Rev. A. Z. Hall. The first two weeks in January, Rev. W. I. Fowle of Greeley, assisted pastor R. O. McCray in revival services at Sterling, with most commendable results. Rev. E. O. Otto is now conducting evangelistic services at Boone. At Grand Junction, Rev. Franklin Fenner conducted his own meetings with exceptionally good results. Rev. E. B. Hart of Fort Morgan, is now assisting pastor J. C. Matthews in evangelistic services at Fort Lupton. The first of February evangelist J. M. Kramer began meetings at Canon City; about this same time Rev. H. W. Cole began meetings, assisting pastor C. B. Miller at City Park church, Denver. It now looks as though this year would pass the record-breaking year of 1925, in the number of baptisms.

Dedications

Feb. 21 the new church at Bethune is to be dedicated. Early in February the new $10,000 edifice will be dedicated at Steamboat Springs. The church was organized within this last year and the building erected under the able leadership of Chapel Car Evangelist Frank I. Blanchard. A new $40,000 edifice to accommodate the flourishing East Side church, Pueblo, under the leadership of Rev. W. M. MacIntosh, will be dedicated late in February. A fine new edifice is to be dedicated soon at Crowley, where pastor James M. Bennett recently organized the church; he is carrying on building activities at the same time at Ordway. Early in June one of the finest edifices in Colorado will be dedicated at Boulder, where Rev. John H. Skeen is the untiring and successful pastor. Our state convention will be entertained by this church the third week in October.

Pastoral Changes

Dr. W. J. Bingham, who has had charge of a fine hospital in Puebla, Mexico, for the past two years under the Home Mission society, recently returned to Denver. Soon after his return he came down with typhoid fever and is now at St. Luke's hospital.—Rev. E. O. Otto has closed his work at Bethany, Denver, and is devoting himself to state-wide evangelistic services.—Rev. C. H. Uttley has closed his work at Boone.—Rev. A. C. Huff has moved from Fountain to Craig.—Rev. G. W. South of Nampa, Idaho, is now located at Longmont.—Rev. Fred Isler moved from Mesa, Pueblo, to a joint work at Peyton and Victor.—Rev. Geo. F. Lowe is now pastor at Mesa, Pueblo.—Rev. H. C. Murphy recently closed his work at Eaton, and is now residing at Fort Collins, but is without pastoral relationship.—Rev. W. A. Pipkin has accepted the unanimous call to become pastor of the First church at Rocky Ford. This church is now doing its best work in recent years.—Rev. Jas. H. Davis, after more than a decade of very successful work as colporter missionary, is to close his work the last of April, by reason of having reached the retirement age.—Rev. Lester F. Sage, recently state evangelist in New Mexico, is doing a fine work at Montrose.—Ill health and advanced age has compelled Rev. D. S. McGlashan to close his work at Eckert. Brother McGlashan has given more than forty years to a number of successful pastorates in Colorado.

Second Annual Pastors' Conference

A state-wide pastors' conference was held at Colorado Woman's college, Jan. 20-22. Some seventy-five of our pastors attended the conference, and all speak in the highest terms of appreciation of the conference leaders—Dr. A. W. Rider and Dr. A. M. Petty of Los Angeles; Rev. W. H. Rogers of Wichita, Kan., and Dr. Thomas S. Young of Philadelphia. Others bringing helpful addresses were Mrs. F. I. Smith, Rev. Robert Lynn, Dr. W. I. Fowle and Dr. C. B. Miller. The college graciously entertained out-of-the-city delegates for lodging and breakfast. We thought high-water mark was reached in the conference last year, but the institute this year, by reason of a larger attendance, established a new record.

The state convention quarterly board meeting was held on the morning of the last day of the conference.

General News

Rev. J. Franklin Day is now in the state in a set-up visitation, arranging for the Dr. James Whitcomb Brouger meetings in Pueblo, March 18; Greeley, March 19; and in Denver, Sunday afternoon, March 21. It is difficult to find an auditorium large enough to accommodate the crowds. Automobile parties are being worked up by churches within a radius of fifty miles.

On Saturday, Feb. 27, Dr. W. H. Bowler is to hold a conference with Inter-Mountain state secretaries at Baptist headquarters, Denver.

The writer is to assist in the dedication of the fine new church at Ogden, Utah, Sunday, Feb. 14.

Laymen Fred W. Freeman, D. T. Pulliam, A. H. Stockham and A. I. Foote, the "big four" from Colorado, recently enjoyed a reunion in Los Angeles. We are glad to say that all of them will soon return home.

Under date of Jan. 16, A. W. Armour, acting comptroller of the finance committee of the Northern Baptist convention, said that "State Convention Treasurer Smith's balance sheet is a splendid presentation, and I am pleased to note the sound condition in which you find yourselves. If every other treasurer submitted such a clear cut statement as the one you forwarded, the troubles of the finance committee and its acting comptroller would be mighty few."

Dr. Frank E. Eden was the pastoral leader for the state-wide pastors' conference at Bozeman, Montana, while Dr. C. B. Miller sustained the same relation with the Kansas pastors' conference at Norton. Both report exceptionally fine annual meetings.

Connecticut

By HORACE B. SLOAT

Dr. George A. Huntley spent a week in Connecticut, speaking in the First church, Bristol, Waterbury, New Britain, and Asylum Avenue, Hartford. He addressed also the New Haven ministers' associational conference at Shelton and spoke to the Baptist students in the Yale divinity school. He was present and delivered an address at the mid-winter meeting of the Fairfield association in the First church, Stamford. He spoke to the boys and girls of the Central church, Norwich, and in the evening of the same day addressed a representative meeting of the three associations in that section of the state. Doctor Huntley won men, women and children by his simplicity, sincerity and the vividness of his presentation of things missionary.

The co-pastorateship at the Central church, Hartford, will end on Feb. 14. Pastors J. N. Lackey and H. J. White having resigned on Dec. 27. Doctor White, after seventeen years in Hartford, goes to the White Plains church, New York. At the annual meeting of the Central church on Jan. 18, Doctor Lackey was asked to withdraw his resignation and accept the full pastorate of the church, which he will assume at the expiration of the co-pastorate. The Central church expects to occupy the new plant on or about April 1. The going of Doctor White is deeply felt by the citizens of Hartford and the Baptists of the state. His ministry has been outstanding in many respects. His cordiality, integrity and unselfishness won him the affection of all types of folks of every group.

Golden anniversary luncheons were held in the state as follows: Norwich, Jan. 14; New London, Jan. 15; Willimantic, Jan. 19; Winsted, Jan. 20; Waterbury, Jan. 22; New Haven, Jan. 23; Bridgeport, Jan. 26; Danbury, Jan. 27; Stamford, Jan. 28; Hartford, Jan. 29. Rev. Ellis Gilbert, formerly pastor at Danbury, has assumed his new duties as pastor of the First church, West Hartford.

Women's N. E. District Rally

There was a record attendance at the mid-winter rally of the N. E. District societies on January 21, at Tremont Temple, Boston. Mrs. N. R. Wood conducted the devotional exercises. Mrs. G. M. Chisholm, literature secretary, stressed missions. Mrs. C. N. Arbuckle spoke for "our girls in college." Miss Esther Palacios of Caquas, Porto Rico, talked on her work—she has served in this field for twenty years. Mrs. Streeter of Tarcy, Burma, spoke hopefully of the work in Burma. Rev. A. A. Forshee, secretary of the Boston Baptist Bethel city mission society, spoke in the interest of the West End community house, a model of which was exhibited at the meeting. Dedication day is to be observed on Feb. 14, and a series of teas for all the associations given Feb. 15-16-17. It is hoped that every one interested may visit the new community house on one of these dates. Dr. Richard M. Vaughn of Newton Theological institution, gave an inspiring address on the holy, comprehensive and ceaseless love of Christ.

At the afternoon session Mrs. A. E. Reynolds conducted the devotional exercises. Mrs. P. R. Bakeman, of Shanghai Baptist college, spoke encouragingly of her work. After this address Miss Mary Howard stepped to the platform and in a fitting way told Mrs. Coleman that the women of N. E. wished to honor her as their president on her Ruby anniversary and the gift that she was to receive at this time from the women of N. E. was to be used to furnish the new dormitory at Mather school, Beaufort, N. C., to be known as Alice B. Coleman Hall. Each state president marched in with her gift in a golden satin bag and deposited those in a golden basket held by Mrs. Budgell, who with a few words of appreciation of the forty years of faithful service Mrs. Coleman had rendered, presented $1139.25 as the Ruby anniversary gift of the women of New England. Mr. G. W. Coleman added $1000 to this amount.

Mrs. A. E. Watkins of Arlington presented a golden bough ($1000) in memory of her aunt, Mrs. Almyra J. Byam, for thirty-five years a member of the New England board. This gift was designated to the West End community house. Mrs. Sherman Perry, of Winchendon, presented a bough in memory of Mrs. Emily Spencer, home mission director for Connecticut for many years. A bough in honor of Mrs. E. C. Herrick, a former president of the N. E. district of the Home Mission society, was presented from a member of the First church of Fall River. A bough in honor of Miss L. M. Hayward, of the First church of Malden, Mass., was presented by the president of the missionary society. A gift of $500 was given by a friend in honor of his wife who is actively identified with the work of the Foreign Mission society. This amount was also designated for the West End community house.

Mrs. Coleman spoke on the budget, the

On the Honor Roll of States

Nineteen state conventions, the Board of Missionary Cooperation announces, won their right to a place on the honor roll by bringing in more money for the united program in the first seven months of the current fiscal year than they did in the corresponding period of 1924-25.

The states are listed here in percentage order: Utah, Montana, South Dakota, Nevada, East Washington, Idaho, New York Metropolitan, Arizona, Southern California, Vermont, District of Columbia, Kansas, West Virginia, Ohio, New Hampshire, Connecticut, New York State, New Jersey and Massachusetts. In addition these are given honorable mention for coming within $500 of attaining the honor roll.

It is a cheerful duty to record the fact that not a single state included in the six months' honor roll dropped out in the month following, whereas two important states, Ohio and Massachusetts, appeared in the list for the first time. These states started rather slowly and for a time fell behind their record of last year, but like some other slow starters they developed plenty of power when once actually under way and since autumn they have been going grandly.

The record for the whole denomination, as disclosed in missionary receipts, shows that we are gaining momentum. Receipts for seven months of the present fiscal year were 6.5 per cent more than the total for the corresponding months last year.

"cuts" that had come and some of the results. Golden anniversary reports were most encouraging. All pledges for the fund must be made by April 30, 1926.

Dr. Hugh A. Heath, secretary of the Massachusetts State Convention, made the closing address.

A New Adventure for the Baptist Missionary Training School in Chicago

BY CLARA D. PINKHAM

For several years missionaries from their fields have sent requests to the training school for a month's study and recreation. They have felt that the newer methods both in subject matter and field activities would prove beneficial to them. Many whose work had deprived them of the privileges and opportunities of a large city have longed to hear again some of Chicago's leading pastors and professional men; to visit the various civic and mission centers; to take advantage of the recreational and musical opportunities offered here; in other words to find in the heart of a great city a helpful, useful and restful vacation.

When these requests continued to come to us, we wondered if there were not others who would like to share these same opportunities; pastors and their wives from rural and small town churches; Christian Americanization secretaries and leaders who feel the need of more definite information and also really different vacation; leaders of B. Y. P. U. and W. W. G. work who crave more than the summer assembly can offer and yet cannot find a way to go to college or find just the kind of Bible and religious educational work they would like.

To fill this need, we are opening our first summer school from Aug. 2 to Aug. 30, 1926, in our building at 2969 Vernon Avenue, Chicago.

There will be standard courses in Bible, religious education, Christian Americanization, kindergarten, church school methods, with special emphasis on week-day and church vacation school methods and curriculum; and instructional courses in mission study books for the current year. The instructors will include the resident faculty of the school; Dr. Thomas S. Young, director of week-day and church vacation school for the Publication society; and other leading educators located in Chicago.

Room and board will be $8 a week for two persons in a room; $9.25 a week for a single room. Each four-week course will cost $5; and the two-week courses will cost $2.50 each.

All persons interested in Christian work of any type are invited to take the courses. There are no educational entrance requirements. Day students will be accepted on equal terms with those who live in the dormitory, and may take luncheon in the building for 3 cents.

We expect these four weeks to be filled with all that is worth while for missionaries, Christian Americanization workers, church workers, Sunday-school teachers, leaders of church vacation schools, those working in week-day schools of religious education, and all types of Christian lay work.

We are anxious that our students could make their vacation a real play time too. There are the Chicago busses to parks, beaches, and recreational centers; visits to the art galleries, Field Museum, stadium, libraries, and board of trade; opportunities to see real mission stations in action at Katherine house, Cooks house, Aiken institute, and the famous Olivet church just two blocks from the school. Then there are the foreign groups in various sections of the city, the Ghetto, with its echoes of Old World customs; China town, a bit of the Orient in the heart of a western city; by no means the least interesting is the great motley group of foreign peoples surrounding our own Raymond institute, where Greek, Pole, Rumanian, and Slav strive to learn American ways while they labor in the Union stockyards.

For registration information, address the president, Mrs. Clara D. Pinkham, 19 Vernon Ave., Chicago.

Porto Rico Outgrowing Her Clothes

By CHARLES S. DETWEILER

This little island, scarcely one hundred miles long and thirty-five miles wide, has increased its population from 950,000 in 1899 to 1,300,000 in 1920. Most fitting is the scriptural figure of speech: "The land is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it; and the covering is narrower than that he can wrap himself in it." Porto Rico has a density of population of 377 inhabitants to the square mile; a record surpassed only by the states of Rhode Island, Massachusetts and New Jersey, where the people are supported by manufacturing. In Porto Rico three-fourths of the people live in rural districts not even classed as villages; and though engaged in agriculture, very few own any land. With the advent of the American flag twenty-seven years ago, a great change came over the social and economic life of the inhabitants. Sugar factories were established by great corporations and little by little small farms disappeared to give place to the big sugar-cane plantations. Where formerly the people needed little money with which to buy their food, the land producing most of what they needed, now most of the staples used on their tables have to be imported. Where formerly cattle were exported to Cuba, now refrigerated meat is brought in from New York; and the number of cows has decreased from 104,000 to 61,000, necessitating the importation of much canned milk, and a great increase in the price of the native product.

In the midst of poverty and squalor it is astonishing to see the many beautiful school buildings in both town and country, and to know of the larger number now under construction. Three hundred consolidated rural schools have been built in the past two years, giving a full eight-grade course to children in the country, who formerly could not receive education beyond the fourth grade. And yet the department of public instruction is unable to provide seats for all who desire to learn to read and write. It is not unusual to see school desks in the Sunday-school rooms of some of our larger churches, which are making an effort to see that some of the children shut out from the public schools shall learn to read and write. In Carolina the board of education is using one room of our chapel for one grade of a nearby school.

In view of the above facts it is not surprising to learn that Baptist chapels are bulging with crowded Sunday schools and evening congregations. It also made the eyes of four visitors from the States bulge to see a magnificent Sunday school in Santurce with an attendance of 572, housed in a little one-room frame chapel and in an adjoining two-story frame residence, and some of the classes in the pastor's residence half a block distant. It was a well-organized graded school. A Porto Rican young woman, principal of one of the magnificent public schools in the neighborhood was superintendent of the intermediate department, occupying the whole upstairs of the residence. And the teachers in the primary department certainly were trained, and understood how to teach their little charges. Some day, please God, American Baptists are going to build a $40,000 dollar building for this heroic church that is struggling onward toward self-support, and at the same time paying for a $3500 parsonage for its pastor.

That night we visited the Baptist church in Caguas and listened to an anthem by a mixed quartet of Porto Ricans, led by a Porto Rican organist, a young woman, converted and trained in the church, now a music teacher. This church is entirely self-supporting. An audience of 400 crowded the building to the doors. When we asked the pastor how many were in the Sunday school that morning, he said that he was ashamed to confess as the school had fallen below its average that day; there had been present only 340. The superintendent of the Sunday school is a young man who is a public schoolteacher. Indeed were we to inquire into the secret of the well organized Sunday schools in so many of our Baptist churches, it would be explained in part by the large number of evangelical public schoolteachers who also teach Bible classes in the church.

People Who Love To Sing

The next Sunday we were in Ponce and a shower in the morning interfered somewhat with the attendance, so that there were only 443 in the Sunday school. Only 443! How many pastors in the States would be glad to talk of their churches in that style! One reason for the good church attendance is the love of singing. There is no lack of heartiness. They sing as heartily as Joshua's army shouted, as if they also expected to see the walls of Jericho fall. What we missed in their singing was the majestic rhythm of "How sweet the name of Jesus sounds," "Rock of Ages," and others of the great hymns of the church, which nurture the soul on the realities of the person and work of Christ. But they are not to blame if they have learned to sing about "dwelling on the mountain underneath a cloudless sky," and other spiritual unrealities. No church hymnal is obtainable in Spanish. Those that were in common use twenty years ago are now out of print. The great denominational publishing houses have no money to finance the issuing of a hymn book for our Spanish-speaking churches, and consequently they have allowed their emotional life and their public worship to be exploited by pentecostal pamphleteers with syncopated songs.

In five of the churches that were visited by the deputation appeals were made for larger buildings for the growing Sunday schools. The speakers were young people who addressed us in English discourses carefully prepared, but evidently unrevised by any whose native tongue was English. One of the gems with which we were delighted was as follows: "Venerable brethren: The Biblical school of the Baptist church gives you a hot and cordial greeting." This on a night when the thermometer was nearly ninety and the church crowded to suffocation! We were then told that to obviate the difficulties of lack of room the Sunday school has been divided, only the children coming on Sunday morning, and the adults coming Monday night to study the Bible. But even then, "those difficulties have run fastened to our plans. The hall is not wide enough to give room even to the children that come every Sunday." The pastor of the church in another town had figures prepared to show us the growth of the town, and the growth of the Baptist church. When the church was founded there were only 300 inhabitants; now there are 2000. Then the Sunday school had an average attendance of twenty-seven; now it has an average attendance of 217. The one-room frame building with which the church began its career, is no longer sufficient. But the best exhibit of all in this church was that of a vigorous old man of sixty-eight, a Spaniard, who was converted about twenty-five years ago. He told us that including himself, his wife, his sons and daughters, sons-in-law, daughters-in-law and grandchildren, his family now numbers thirty-eight souls and every one of them is converted and a member of a Baptist church. One of his sons is a Baptist pastor and one of his daughters is in training for missionary service. Thus the kingdom of God grows!

Protestant missions have created in Porto Rico a hunger for the Word of God and for a new type of church life. The whole population is open to receive the gospel appeal. Shall we turn a deaf ear to their entreaties for larger buildings in which to develop their new life? "The ostrich leaveth her eggs on the earth, and warmeth them in the dust, and forgetteth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may trample them. She dealeth hardly with her young ones, as if they were not hers." The ostrich is not an example for Northern Baptists to imitate.

A Letter from the Crow Indian Baptist Mission in Montana

Dear Friends:

It is the custom in the business world to take an inventory about this time of the year, and we on this field have been applying this business principle to our work here and have been doing a little "stock-taking." Last year Mr. Bentley made out a list of nineteen objectives toward which to work during 1925 and of the nineteen we find that thirteen of them have been attained wholly or in part. Here are a few of them and the results of the year's work. The first one says, "twenty-five new members for our field." Of that number sixteen were actually added to our membership, all by baptism. One of the objectives fully attained was to "refinish and decorate the interior of the church." "Seventy-five per cent of all church members at the association" was another aim fully attained.

The attendance at church in the districts of Reno and Black Lodge have been rather discouraging the last two months, but there are reasons for it, and there are encouraging spots even in that. Many of our most faithful church attendants in the Reno section are living in town this winter and they come to the evening church service at the Crow agency chapel, and the children attend the Sunday school here in the morning. We have been having exceptionally large congregations at the evening services here, which are all in English, and many who live out in the districts come in for the preaching. We have the added attraction now of a choir. The majority of the singers are Indian so we have special music nearly every Sunday either by the choir or a solo or duet. Several times during the past month the attendance has reached seating capacity and we have even had to bring out the small chairs from the primary room for the numerous children, so that there might be enough chairs for the adults. The attendance has ranged from eighty to one hundred and the majority of the congregation have been Indians.

A Full House

Our Sunday-school attendance has been up as high as ninety-two more than once during the last two months, a large majority being Indians. Frank Shane teaches the adult Indians in their own language, and he has had a large and interested class. I have charge of the primary department where twenty-five to thirty meet in the little back room. If we had many more we should have to hang them out the windows, or on hooks for we should have neither space at the tables nor chairs for more. Last winter we had thirty in attendance every Sunday.

The Sunday night after Christmas we had a "white gifts for the King" service. The gifts were of "service," "substance" and "self." Over $35 was taken in money. After the singing of the two Christmas songs by the congregation all the lights were turned out except the one in the star and two at the front of the platform. The choir was out of sight. At appropriate intervals during the service Christmas songs were sung. As the different classes were called on for their gift one of the members went up on to the platform and laid the gift at the foot of the picture of Bethlehem. Besides the money, two boxes of groceries and provisions were given by one of the classes for two needy families in the community. There were several gifts of "self" to the King and two or three reconsecrations. Deernose spoke a few words which were interpreted in substance were: "I don't understand English so I don't know all that's gone on tonight but I can see that there have been giving, and it seems to me that the best gift a person can give is Jesus is to give themselves."

Of course, there are still our old activities with the young people and women. In fact if we could only multiply ourselves by two or three it would still be more than we could do. That is not possible, but there is a way in which we can be multiplied, that is through the power of prayer, only our own but that of the Christian people all over the land.

In His service, Clara E. Olds.

Philadelphia Letter

BY ARTHUR C. BALDWIN

Our city has just passed through a well-directed campaign of visitation evangelism under the direction of A. Earl Kernahan of Boston. The first was in West Philadelphia and included ten churches of various denominations; the other was north in Logan and included about the same number. The result in people won to a personal decision or to bring their letters and enter into an active church relationship, was impressive in both campaigns. In North Philadelphia about 600 were thus won to one church—the Christian—winning about 180. In West Philadelphia under more difficult conditions, 318 signed cards. One church is receiving fifty; other forty; and the Chestnut Street church, about twenty-five.

I have been intensely interested and have watched the work and its reaction to see its effect on the church itself without a single extra meeting or departure from the ordinary routine of the church. We have constantly seen newcomers in our congregation. On four Sundays I have given the invitation at the close of our morning service and had responses each day, totaling two up to the present time, with a number of others whom we expect shortly has been a glorious surprise to people to discover that they can bring others to a Christian decision and that they are determined to go on in a continuous campaign to win others. It has been most wholesome experience and I want to commend the method to my brother pastors. It should be added that Doctor Kernahan does not profess to be the originator of this method of evangelism. It merely happens that he has the personality and the practicality to put the campaign across in spite of the incredible inertia. The entire method is being well exemplified by Doctor Stiles and those cooperating with him.

The Philadelphia association had a mid-winter rally on the theme "Baptism and World Missions," in the Chestnut Street church, Jan. 25-26. A strong program was presented beginning with the ministers' conference, which held a meeting in conjunction with the association. Speakers of national reputation

Ray Petty and Dr. James H. Frank of New York and Dr. Frederick E. of Indianapolis, gave great messages. Rev. Harold Stanley Stewart gave a most impressive address to the conference. The women's conference Tuesday afternoon was particularly able in its interest and practical suggestiveness.

Rev. Ivan Murray Rose, minister of First church, has been enjoying increasingly large Sunday evening audiences. For the month of February he announced a series on "Pressing Questions That Still Press"—"Is Prostitution a Failure?" "Is Christianity a Failure?" "Is War a Crime?" "Is Socialism a Menace?" I think the reception of these subjects will be enough to indicate the practicality of Mr. Rose's preaching. He is handling large themes in a fearless manner and has the hearty enthusiastic support of his church. At a recent prayer meeting he was presented with a gold watch which had been carried by Dr. George Dana Boardman, who for thirty-nine years was pastor of that church. The presentation was made by Dr. W. W. Keen on behalf of relatives of Doctor Boardman. Doctor Rose slipped away for a ten days' well-deserved vacation toward the end of January.

A Unique Advertisement

A few weeks ago a most interesting advertisement appeared in our Public Ledger: "Wanted, a Baptist minister! Not easily discouraged. Not afraid of hard work. New church, modern equipment, Philadelphia residential suburb, particulars confidentially desired." It was not difficult for us to locate the church that had thus advertised. The publication of their ad that many Baptist ministers could be easily discouraged was a reaction of our laymen. Evidently it is well for us ministers to see the reaction of our laymen. Evidently we do not think that we are all mighty men of valor. As to the ethics of a church advertising for a pastor—why? Why should not a church adopt business methods and do what other corporations would do when the man they want is not immediately in sight? From the standpoint of business there is nothing to be said against it. Actually the officials of this church tell us that they are now in touch through their advertisement, with men whom they could otherwise never have dared to approach. Undoubtedly it is good business and the expression of hard common sense and yet some of us may be shocked if we make a reservation in our minds, and feel that the business of a church is somehow different. We feel the method may be successful but there is a world of meaning in "but."

Dr. Groves W. Drew has entered his twenty-third year with the Third church. This is the record of a notable pastor. During this time he has baptized 1200. During his service the people have given more than half a million dollars to current expenses and benevolences. The present house of worship was erected, congregations have kept up, there is a Bible school of 598 and four Christian Endeavor societies. Four young men are now pastors, one a chaplain, four young women trained nurses looking to the foreign field, a young man a missionary to the Indians, two students in training for the ministry, one of whom has just been licensed to preach. The last year was the best yet, in congregations, attendance in the Bible school; $25,000 was raised for all purposes, including $2000 paid on the mortgage and $4500 on refurnishing the building.

North Frankford church, Rev. Horace Hunt, pastor, is feeling the tide of new life that is being brought to that locality by the Elevated. They have completely renovated their church at a cost of $20,000. The other day they raised $2000 to clean up some extra bills and then quietly made a generous increase in Mr. Hunt's salary.

The campaign for the Christian Association building at the university, has been vigorously pushed. They desired $750,000. At the present writing it looks as though almost the entire amount will be raised. It has been a mighty effort and the response from the churches and people has been most heartening.

The South Broad Street church, Rev. John V. Ellson, minister, has just celebrated its golden jubilee.

Resignations

Now we must sadly report some resignations of recent date. Dr. Frank MacDonald, after an eight months' pastorate, has gone back to his former church in Alabama. He told the people here that he should not have left the South, but we are sorry that he had to go back. Rev. George Lockett has resigned from New Berean to begin a new pastorate at Palmyra, N. J. Dr. John Henry Day has accepted a call to the Seventh church, Baltimore, and so leaves the Memorial church here without a pastor. His service during his three years in this city has been a notable one. His message has commanded attention and his usefulness outside his church in larger activities has been marked. Memorial's loss is a great one. Last of all we must report that Dr. Charles H. Dodd, who has for twelve years been pastor of the Second church, Germantown, has handed his resignation to the church and will retire from the active ministry toward the end of March. The gracious ministry of Doctor Dodd in this city, as in Baltimore and in Newark, has been one of marked effectiveness. No one can be near him without loving him. His friends deeply regret the ill-health that has made it necessary for him to retire. To an unusual degree he holds the affection and esteem of multitudes beyond his own church. We shall all miss him here.

The Non-Resident Member

By JOHN C. AUSTIN

One of the problems which confronts the conscientious pastor is, "What shall we do with the non-resident members?" There are various types of them in our constituency. There are those who, being away from their home church for but a brief period of time, do not feel like taking their membership to the place of their temporary residence. Others have not continued with the same ardor and loyalty with which they began. Still, others are wilfully and carelessly unmindful of their pledges and covenant. It would be helpful to both the church and visiting member if on going for a protracted visit to another place he should be given a fraternal letter, to present to the church where he expects to worship. The advantage of this arrangement to the individual is quite evident.

The Indifferent

The indifferent are perhaps the hardest to bring back to right church relationships. They may be sensitive because of some real or fancied slight given them while in the church. They may feel self-conscious because financial reverses make it impossible for them to continue either paying or pledging as was their former custom. It may be that they have become indifferent because the person or persons who constituted their social contact with the church have passed out of their lives. Winning these back is a problem.

Letters of inquiry as to their spiritual and material progress could well be addressed to them by their nearest friends in the old church. If this is done promptly through friendly interest rather than through church investigation a more natural response will be guaranteed. The pastor of the church where these non-resident members are located should be notified and urged to form their acquaintance and seek their enlistment in his church. Those who ignore their covenant obligations are not beyond the reach of faith and prayer. Courtesy must characterize our approach to them. When we fully realize that they have gotten away from the church life, many of them because they have gradually grown cold, it is only logical to infer that they can be reclaimed through a faith in them. Perhaps the method of approaching them would require the same tact and the same points of contact as with the approach the second group describes.

"Dear Friend: We are anxious to revise our church roll and keep a record of such members as are actively interested in the progress of the kingdom both at home and abroad. You are identified with this church although you have not worshiped with us for some time. Will you tell us if you are anxious to retain your membership here or do you desire a letter of dismissal to unite with a Baptist church in your city? You will be interested in knowing that the church life is going along harmoniously. Our current expense budget is $— and we have assumed $— as a benevolent obligation. We have put on an honest effort to secure the assistance and cooperation of every member whether active or non-resident to meet these obligations. In your reply to this letter will you state your decision about uniting with the church in your own town, which is most to be desired, or a pledge stating how much we can expect from you for these obligations during the next year? We are cordially yours." If the person written to, fails to respond to this letter a second letter should be sent calling attention to the subject matter of the former letter and asking if "a reply as to his desires could not be forthcoming within the month so his name

If the second letter is ignored a third letter should be sent calling attention to the two previous letters and attached to that letter should be a copy of the resolution previously adopted by the church stating the action of the church to drop the name of the person who fails to respond after three efforts have been made to reestablish active fellowship.

If the churches honestly set themselves to follow up the non-resident members in this manner and if the pastors will reciprocate with each other in the matter of furnishing information concerning the movements of their members and if less emphasis is put upon numerical strength and more upon real spiritual life, we shall take a long step toward the solution of this difficult problem.

DR. M. P. BOYNTON, pastor of Woodlawn church, Chicago, is spending a few weeks on the Pacific coast, principally at Seattle, where he is assisting Dr. Ambrose W. Bailey at the First church in evangelistic meetings. Mrs. Boynton is with him.

A UNIQUE WEDDING ceremony was performed by the pastor of the Delaware Street church, Syracuse, N. Y., Jan. 18, when Deacon and Mrs. Charles Foreman were remarried upon the occasion of the celebration of their fiftieth wedding anniversary. Mr. and Mrs. Foreman were charter members of the church and are the only living couple among the charter members of the church at present. Miss Ida M. Hay, bridesmaid of Mrs. Foreman fifty years ago, stood with Mrs. Foreman again for the ceremony. Rev. A. B. Sears, former pastor and now a member of the church, and Dr. H. Clarke Colebrook, New York state director, also a member of Delaware church, took part in the ceremony. Following the wedding ceremony a reception was given by the two sons of Mr. and Mrs. Foreman, who are both physicians in the city of Syracuse. The Adirondack League club, of which Mr. Foreman is a member, sent him $300 in gold, and the Delaware Street church presented Mrs.

Foreman with a mantel clock, and Mr. Foreman with fifty dollars in gold.

AT NORTH WOODSTOCK, N. H., Pastor George A. Smith has begun his work under very favorable auspices. While summer time in the White Mountains regions is the occasion for big congregations, even in winter time there are fine audiences and forward religious movements. An unusual undertaking is the formation of a men's club for the consideration of the live issues of the times—social, governmental, economic and religious.

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, 2320 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

"Tonight we invite everybody to join our little party. We surely have some fine things to pass around. Just listen a minute—no just half a minute, to Mark F. Sanborn, pastor First church, Detroit: 'The Survey Number was certainly wonderful.' Of course it was.

"And then here comes a letter from Frederick E. Taylor, First church, Indianapolis, with $30 and lots of love and prayers behind it for the boys in prison. You ought to hear what those fifteen prisoners are saying who are now getting the paper. We have a letter from them. Maybe we'll read you a little of it one of these times. Sounds good.

"And then there is Dan Bryant, pastor at Corvallis, Ore., who romps in with his eyes shining, as he sings out, 'It can hardly be avoided that THE BAPTIST will be the organ of education and development as well as the informative and inspirational periodical of the Baptist clergy.' Why we have believed that right along. But when Dan says it, we feel confirmed and comforted.

"Oh, radio fans. Get ready to shed your tears. Listen to this. 'Dear editor: We come down here to Florida to spend the winter and instead we spent all our money. Now we got to return home in the dead of winter. Please change our address from Coral Strand, Palm Gardens, Fla., to Frosty Lake, Minn., R. F. D. 2. Pray for us. We learned a lot.' But this is too painful.

"Steady now. We will let you in on a little office secret. We do not know whether to laugh or to cry over this next letter. Honestly now, what would you do? 'Deer editor: I got some worries. our corn only maid sixty-too bushels to the akar last fall. The price wuz fare but we run our otto twenty-three thousand miles throo this Ioway mud and only got twelve miles to the gallun. Our taxes is something feece. Interest on debts is eetin us up alive. This compels us to be more eckonomikal in the future than we bin in the past. So wood you pleze stop the Babtist. With awful sorrer,'—but we will withhold the name.

"We picked ourselves up however when A. P. Mihm, one of our German Baptist editors wrote us: 'I have been a close reader of THE BAPTIST since its first appearance and think it is a better and more valuable paper all around today than it ever has been. This is no mere taffy but straight goods and an honest opinion from the heart.' Now, in the classical words of the cartoonist, 'Can you beat it?'

"Well, another lawyer breaks in the other day with a nice letter and twenty-one brand-new subscriptions from a church out in the Illinois corn belt. All paid for by one good farmer. That helps Illinois to keep in the lead with the biggest subscription list in the Northern Baptist Convention.

"But, Secretary J. E. Smith of Michigan is on the job to give Illinois a good run. He has a little fund on the side for subscriptions for THE BAPTIST. The other day he duly warned us to look out for a letter with fifty new annual subs. And he told us that this was just a beginning of Michigan interest. With Detroit recently sending in around five hundred new annual subs, it looks as though Michigan means business. 'Well, why not? It auto.'

"Bouquets and brickbats keep us on an even keel. Last week we were handed an awful wallop about WCOY. Brother said it was the bunk. 'Cut it out,' he said. And while we were writing him our best answer, in comes another brother with $10 which his wife sent for the prisoners after reading WCOY. And then he laid another $10 b'll down with his wife's gift. One brickbat on the ear and twenty of our boys in prisons to get THE BAPTIST six months each as the healing bouquet.

"But we don't get sore when some one criticizes us. Doctor Brounger says that is what millions of people pay their money for—the right to criticize the umpire. Let's play ball. We're bound to win. We've got the greatest Captain in the world. THE BAPTIST is for Him.

recently received an offer of $300,000 for its property.

PASTOR E. L. BAYLISS of First church, Winchester, Ill., is specializing on the teaching of the Bible. He has formed a Bible readers' league with more than 100 members.

DUDLEY STREET CHURCH, Boston, received from all sources last year $47,587.97.

REGISTRATION AT THE Northern Baptist Theological seminary has already reached 170 this year with a prospect of reaching nearly 200 for the year. Of the students, representing fifteen denominations, 139 are Baptists. The average age is twenty-eight. Seventy-five of the men are married. Twenty-six women are enrolled. Fifty-six students had college work before coming to the seminary.

NORTH TOPEKA CHURCH, Kan., has called to its pastorate Rev. W. Harley Smith of Clay Center.

REV. B. J. LEHIGH has finished ten years as pastor at Barre, Vt.—not by resigning but by receiving fifty-six persons who expressed a desire to unite with this church during a recent campaign conducted by the director of evangelism, Rev. Raymond W. Cooper. Through a driving snow storm on the last night there came a crowd which filled the auditorium.

BETWEEN SEVEN AND EIGHT HUNDRED men and women from Baptist churches in Western Michigan gathered in Sparta Jan. 22, to hear Doctor Brougher deliver his lecture, "Play Ball." It was the quarterly meeting of the Kent-Muskegon associational brotherhood, enlarged to include the wives and also visiting delegations from many other churches in this part of the state. At the conclusion of the lecture strong resolutions were unanimously adopted by the twenty or more delegations comprising the audience, in which they pledged themselves to encourage their churches to do their very utmost in support of the whole missionary program of the Northern Baptist Convention.

REV. ERNEST J. CHAVE, pastor of the First church of Sioux Falls, S. D., resigned Jan. 24, to take the position of assistant professor of religious education in the divinity school of the University of Chicago. Doctor Chave will leave about June 1 and will begin his courses in the summer quarter. Since coming to Sioux Falls, October 1921, he has received into membership nearly 300 members and the church has conducted a constructive program of work. Mr. and Mrs. Chave are Canadians, coming to Sioux Falls from Vancouver, B. C., and he is a graduate of McMaster university, Toronto. Last year was the jubilee anniversary of the Sioux Falls church and throughout the year various events helped to celebrate the anniversary, chief of which was a very fine pageant with eight episodes recalling the history of the church. This pageant was written and produced under direction of the pastor. At the close of the year the church report showed a membership of 670.

MR. F. H. HOUSE, with the beginning of 1926 entered upon his thirty-first year as superintendent of the Baptist Sunday school at Galva, Ill. The event was celebrated at a fellowship social, at which Mr. House was presented with a bouquet of thirty roses on behalf of the Sunday school, and with an American Revised Bible on behalf of the church.

PASTOR EDGAR L. MULLINS, of Immanuel church, Fort Wayne, Ind., recently welcomed twenty-seven new members. Attendance in Sunday school has increased over 100 in last few weeks, and the attendance in the services of worship has increased more than 100 per cent in the past two months.

ON CHRISTMAS NIGHT all of the Indians of Winnemucca, Nev., consisting of twelve families, gathered at the church and saw the pictures and heard the story of "The Christ Child." Through the hospitality of the citizens of the town boxes of food, candy, oranges and nuts were given each family at the close of the service.

REV. SAMUEL G. NEIL, OF THE HOME Mission and Publication societies, left Philadelphia, Feb. 2, enroute to California. He will make stopovers in Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Texas, Arizona, California, Nevada, Utah and Colorado. He will have conference with many of the state convention secretaries and almost all of the chapel car and colporter-missionaries in the states visited. He is booked to conduct a series of evangelistic meetings with the First church of Pomona, Calif., Floyd I. Beckwith, pastor, Feb. 14 to 21.

MORE THAN 700 attended the first two popular lectures in the auditorium of the First church, Indianapolis, and the enrollment for the classes January 31 was almost 500. The night college activities are under direction of the educational committee of the church. Covers were laid for 230 attendants at the first session and 250 at the second session.

REV. J. F. TIFFIN, who is completing his studies at the Northern Baptist seminary, has accepted a call to Union Grove church, Wis., and has already begun his ministry on this field.

FIRST CHURCH, Youngstown, Ohio, finds that $56,000 has been contributed by the church during the year. Rev. A. C. Archibald, the pastor, has welcomed 150 new members by baptism. A director of young people's work and religious education is taking up his work on the field.

REV. S. W. PHELPS is spending the winter in California. His last work was in Dearborn, Mich., where, under his pastorate, a church of fifty-five members was organized and a fine church building was erected. Mr. Phelps has taken The Standard and THE BAPTIST since 1886. He has served continuously as pastor for over forty-two years in the Baptist ministry.

A "NEW MEMBERS RECEPTION" was held at the First church, Oakland, Calif., Jan. 27, in honor of those who had united with the church during the preceding six months. A unique program of "spicy" welcome talks with responses in behalf of the children, young men, young ladies, men, and women, interspersed with musical numbers, had been arranged by Mr. G. M. Thomas. Mr. V. S. Silke, director of religious education, was master ceremonies.

A REVIVAL WAS held at Shelby, Ohio December with eleven added to church. Since Rev. A. M. Stansel took charge in October, 1924, twenty-thirty have been added to the church membership, the Sunday school and church attendance has increased 30 per cent. A new parsonage has just been purchased and the pastor's salary advanced several hundred dollars.

PASTOR A. A. HOLMES of First church, Bismarck, N. D., since recovering from a break-down in health last summer, led over fifty into the church, thirty-four by baptism. There are conversions nearly every Sunday.

DR. H. A. SMOOT of Kansas City, Mo., closed a fifteen days' meeting with Rev. F. E. Cary at Dearborn, Mich., with several professions of faith and several additions to the church. There have been seventy-four additions to the church less than three years.

REV. HENRY CLAY MILLER of the Marion Avenue church, Aurora, Ill., who has been in Hollywood-by the Sea, Fla. since November, following a severe illness, is recovering sufficiently to be able to return to his work. During the past three months the pulpit has been filled by members of the men's forum and other organizations of the church. The usual large congregations have continued at all services. Since the destruction of the church building by fire, March 27, 1924, activities have been carried on in the Marion Avenue pulpit school and community house. Although without a home, this has been a period of remarkable growth in new members and in all of the departments of the church and Bible school. The partial finished new building of pure English Gothic design will be ready for occupancy in March.

HYDE PARK CHURCH, Chicago, sets its sights on a big enterprise. It will build an educational building to cost $250,000. It is able to realize $50,000 from its regular budget. On Sunday morning, Jan. 17, the congregation easily subscribed more than $50,000.

BY AGREEING TO MAKE liberal contributions toward the cost of additional insurance, the National Baptist publishing board, of Nashville, Tenn., has enabled its employes to double their protection. More than sixty employes ready have taken advantage of this offer and have increased their insurance $33,000, bringing the total in force more than $70,000.

THE Forum, is publishing each month this year an article by some leading member of the foremost denomination on reasons for being of that particular faith. The first article was by Gilbert Chesterton on "Why I Am a Catholic." President Edgar Y. Mullins has been invited to write an article on "Why I Am a Baptist." His article will appear in the May issue.

New Books

Sermons on Books of the Bible, Vol. II, Job to Daniel, by William Wistar Hamilton, Th.D., D. D. New York: Doran. $1.75 net.

A notable series of sermons on the books of the Old Testament. Each sermon covers an entire book of the Bible, and is prefaced by an outline. Dr. Hamilton not only tells about the books, but he forcefully points out the lessons they teach for the men and women of today.

—O. E. D.

The Epistle of Paul to the Romans, by Charles R. Erdman. New York: Westminster Press. $1.00.

An old fashioned exposition amounting almost to a paraphrase. The space of a little book is limited, thus confining the expositor to the briefest kind of treatment. However, it is helpful to see how well the author has caught the spirit and message of the great apostle in that letter of his which fittingly is called "the cathedral of the Christian faith."

—JOHN A. EARL.

Believe in God and in Evolution, by Wm. F. Keen, M. D., professor in Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia: Lippincott. $1.

An enlargement of a lecture delivered before the Crozer Seminary students. It is clear—neither academic nor technical, but a nourishing pabulum for the average distressed mind. We see no inconsistency or contradiction in the claim that we are a believer in both evolution and in angelical religion. We have not been able to see that any straddling or compromising is needed for that fact.

—H. O. ROWLANDS.

The Greatest of These, by J. D. Jones. New York: Doran. $2.

A volume of sermons based upon the thirteenth chapter of first Corinthians. In these sermons are found under four main divisions—the excellency of love, the realities of love, the permanence of love and the supremacy of love. It is difficult to write anything on this chapter in first Corinthians since Henry Drummond wrote "The Greatest Thing in the World" which has become a classic. But this eminent Congregationalist of England succeeded in adding another contribution of real worth to the literature of the enduring realities of the Christian religion.

—JOHN A. EARL.

Excellent Ministers, by Joseph M. M. Gray. New York: Abingdon Press. $1.

A volume of the Matthew Simpson lectures before De Pauw university for 1924. In the surging outflow of this type of literature there might seem to be a lack of freshness; for in Great Britain and the United States the greatest teachers in our pulpits have within a few years delivered a "course of lectures" to theological students. However, Doctor Gray in this "course" of five lectures has prepared and delivered a series of ad-resses that do not suffer in comparison with any we have read. The average homiletical professor would profit as much as the student in studying them.

—H. O. ROWLANDS.

Kathie's Diary, edited by Margaret W. Eggleston. New York: Geo. H. Doran Co. $2.

Mrs. Eggleston has edited the original diary written fifty years ago by a "pig-tailed little girl in crinoline," from 1876 to 1886, begun when Kathie was twelve years old; but the editing has not shorn the writing of any of the charm of childish ways and thoughts and loyalties. A book that old and young alike will enjoy.

The New Standard Bible Dictionary. New York: Funk and Wagnalls. Cloth, $7.50 net.

This is literally a key to the Bible. It is put up in one volume adapted to the use of busy people and fitted to the needs of the intelligent layman who is interested in Bible study as well as to the needs of the educated ministry. "The Approach to the Old Testament" and "The Approach to the New Testament," which constitute the introduction, furnish the student with a clear and interesting account of the principles upon which the dictionary was constructed. In approaching the Old Testament, John E. McFadyen, professor of Old Testament language, literature and theology in the United Free Church College, Glasgow, Scotland, has analyzed a situation which perplexes the ordinary student of the Bible. By approaching the Old Testament first on its literary side and then on its historical side which involves also the critical approach, Prof. McFadyen logically finally arrives at the religious approach and by the religious approach reaches the conclusion that unity of spirit and theme holds the many variations together.

Prof. James Moffatt of the same college does a similar bit of work for the New Testament. Frankly facing the problems involved in the language, text and canonicity of the New Testament, in the relation of the two Testaments to each other and in the fact that the New Testament writings belong to a particular age with its own special character, Doctor Moffatt finds that the New Testament is the Word of God charged with vitalizing power as it brings the believing soul into contact with the living God.

Among the outstanding articles found in the dictionary are "The History and Religion of Israel," "Exploration and Excavation," "Semitic Religion," "Disease and Medicine," "The Temple," "Palestine," "Jerusalem" and "Jesus Christ." Many illustrations in half-tone and several fine maps in colors add value and interest to the volume. The fifty-eight editors and contributing editors responsible for the dictionary are men whose reputation as reverent Bible scholars gives sufficient guarantee to the value and reliability of the New Standard Bible Dictionary. —JOHN A. The Just Weight and Other Chapel Addresses, by Francis J. McConnell. New York: Abingdon Press. $1.

Perhaps no man in America has made a larger number of addresses to college students or is better able to make them than Bishop McConnell. This little book contains thirty-one such addresses, every one of them a sermon with a regular text, and every one so short that it can be read in five minutes. They are not only readable but they are also usable. The preacher who finds in himself a tendency to become prolix, dry and sterile can find in them material, method and stimulus for his own improvement as a preacher and as a popular speaker. In fact every one of these addresses can be used to enrich a fresh sermon.

The Religion of Benjamin Franklin, by James Madison Stiffer. New York: Appleton & Co.

The product of a busy pastor who became interested in the subject and found special sources of help in a private library rich in Franklin material. Though busy every day with the multitudinous demands of a great church, Doctor Stiffer found the time to delve into original sources with the result that he has produced a book readable in every line, throbbing with human interest and yet reliable in its treatment of a subject hitherto beclouded and misunderstood. Franklin was a modernist of his day. He had religion, but it did not bear the imprimatur of the official theology and ecclesiology of his time. He was in reality 200 years ahead of his generation. It is refreshing to read the religious views of a great statesman, editor and man of affairs who anticipated a scientific age before it dawned.

Stranger than Fiction, by Lewis Browne. New York: Macmillan, $2.50.

The epic of Jewish survival is told dramatically. There are fifty animated or cartoon maps showing the endless treks of this Semitic group. The main effort is to state and explain the psychology of the Jew. The Old and New Testaments, the Talmud and other Jewish literature are all evaluated critically. There is no attempt to gloss over endless rewriting of Hebrew holy writings. The fiction of a pure Jewish blood is mercilessly exploded and the Jew is set forth as an age-lasting mixture. The tenacities, absurdities, and endless divisions are pitilessly set forth along with the ethnic elements of nobility, vision and service which the Jew has contributed to the race. It covers in a general way the status of the Jew from his emergence in Arabia, through every century, to date.

JESUS RAISES LAZARUS FROM THE DEAD

Lesson Text: John 11:1-12:11. Golden Text: John 11:25

This is the outstanding miracle of the New Testament aside from the resurrection of our Lord. Jesus rose to die no more. Lazarus died again. His resurrection was temporary. But John introduces the resurrection of Lazarus as one of the seven miracles of his gospel to prove that Jesus is what he claimed to be—the Resurrection and the Life.

Death

Death will never cease to be regarded as the enemy of mankind until it is swallowed up in life. Science may tell that death is as natural as birth, but common sense will continue to rejoice at birth and mourn over a death. Certain philosophies may deny the fact of death but that does not leave the spade idle in the cemetery. Religion may call death by a more euphonious name, but the word "sleep" does not disguise the grim reality of the grave. It was death in its naked ghastliness that drove the sisters of the stricken home into the shadows and wrung the tears from their eyes. It was the death of a young man, the only brother of Martha and Mary, that brought the mourners to Bethany and filled the house with impenetrable gloom. Into this atmosphere Jesus came after he had delayed his coming apparently without cause. The grave had closed upon all that was mortal of Lazarus and his body had begun to disintegrate. It was a hopeless situation. All the sisters could say was, "Lord, if thou hadst been here our brother would not have died. To them it appeared that Jesus had lost his opportunity to do something for Lazarus and for them in their emergency.

Life

But the sisters did not appreciate the fact that while death was the overshadowing present reality with regard to their brother, Life stood before them unrecognized and unutilized. The resurrection was to them a far-distant event in the dim future. What comfort they could extract from the old doctrine of a physical resurrection at the last of they leaned on in their sorrow. When Jesus said, "I am the Resurrection and the Life," they were so absorbed in the idea of a postponed resurrection that they could not appreciate the radiant and present Resurrection that stood before them in the person of Jesus. Jesus was ready right there to demonstrate the truth of his words that though Lazarus was dead he would live. In fact had the sisters believed in the broken immortality of Lazarus it is doubtful if they would have mourned so about his death or asked to have him back. Are we who live nineteen centuries later any closer to the tremendous truth that Jesus is now the Resurrection and the Life or are we postponing the utilization of the abundant life until some distant date in the sweet by and by?

The Saving Sense

During the world war one of the great steamships that was used as a transport for soldiers was on her way across when a torpedo boat was sighted. In anticipation of the danger they were in, all on board were lined up on deck.

There was a deathly hush for an instant, when suddenly from down the line a voice rang out: "Is dar ennybody heah who wants to buy a gold watch en tin?"—Everybody's Magazine.

France wants a strong man; but not too strong; not a Mussolini.—Philadelphia Record.

Where was Jack Dempsey born?" asked the boy of his father. "I don't know, son," was the reply. "Where was Boe Ruth born?" inquired the persistent lad. "I don't know that, either," said the father. "Well, then, dad," remarked the young hopeful, "will you buy me a history of the United States?"—Chicago News.

Ronnie had grown tired of blowing bubbles, so he asked his mother to read him the story about the city with the golden streets.

"Very well, dear, but have you taken all soap out of the water?" she asked.

"I'm pwetty thure I have," said Ronnie.

When she reached the words "And where shall in no wise enter into it any that maketh a lie," he slid from his knees and said:

"I fink I'll go and thee about that chap."

A few minutes after an alarm of fire was given in a hotel, one of the guests turned the group watching the fire, and clapped them on their apparent excitement. "There was nothing to be excited about," he said. "I took my time about dressing, didn't like the knot in my necktie, so I tied it over again—that's how cool I was."

"Fine," one of his friends remarked, "it why didn't you put on your trousers?"—Everybody's Magazine.

It was nearing election time. A man approached the Jones house at the end of a lonely country road.

"Is Mr. Jones at home?" he asked the raggy female who answered his knock at the side door.

"He is not."

"When will he be home?"

"I don't know."

"Will it be a matter of minutes or hours—or days?" asked the man.

"I don't know when he'll be home. What's your business?"

"I just wanted to know what party he belongs to—perhaps you can tell me."

"What party does he belong to? Sure I can tell you that all right. I'm the party he belongs to."

Jews, Protestants and Roman Catholics are said to be uniting in an effort to secure a by-law of the board of education of New York City which shall permit the reading of the Ten Commandments in the schools every week. Presumably the newly organized association of atheists will oppose the effort.

Almost all of feudalism that could die is dead. A law recently passed in England nullifies the ancient law of primogeniture. The first-born among the noble families of England will no longer inherit ancestral estates by the law of entail, but will share on an equal footing with other heirs, unless the estates be directly willed to them.

Prof. E. A. Ross, sociologist in the University of Wisconsin, expresses his judgment of the effect of the moving pictures thus vigorously: "Never has there been a generation so much in revolt against their elders as this. In my judgment this psychic revolt springs chiefly from the motion picture films, with some aid from the automobile. We have a generation of youth, sex-excited, self-assertive, self-confident and parent-critical. There can be no doubt that the arrival of overmastering sex desire in the boy's life has been antedated by at least two or three years, thanks to stimulation from the films."

Federal Judge Albert W. Johnson is quoted as having said in an address in Order from Our Nearest House

Philadelphia: "The constitution, the Bible, the Christian Sabbath and the home are all linked together in this country and he who is an enemy of one is likely to be an enemy of all these bulwarks of our nation." It sounds all patriotic, religious and homey, but trouble arises when one attempts to identify that enemy. For instance, many patriots believe that the constitution might be amended to advantage, lovers of the Bible believe that it can be better understood, church-goers think that there is no such institution as "the Christian Sabbath" and the home is undergoing a searching scrutiny. Are these beliefs and inquiries marks of enmity to any good thing?

Antioch college, Ohio, has its educational schedule arranged on the work-study basis, five weeks' work in some industry, alternating five weeks' study at the college. This is not primarily for the purpose of enabling a student with little money to work his way through school, but in order to develop a new standard of culture for college men and women and to prepare them adequately for real life. How the idea is spreading may be judged by suggestions which are coming from various parts of the country that branch Antiochs be started in Michigan, Tennessee, Missouri, Oregon, and even in the Philippine islands. A young woman who recently returned from a tour of European educational institutions reports that every great educator with whom she conversed asked eagerly about the Antioch idea in education. A constant stream of visitors at Yellow Springs includes committees and officials from leading universities.

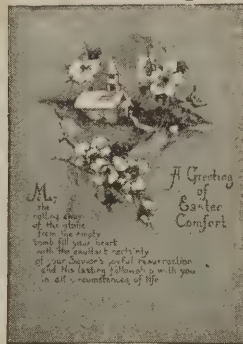

Founders' Day at the Baptist Missionary Training School, Chicago, was fittingly observed on Feb. 2. The program began in the morning with an alumnae chapel service which was followed by an alumnae luncheon. In the afternoon, following a business session, greetings were presented from the Woman's Home Mission Society by Mrs. R. R. Donnelley, from the Woman's Foreign Mission Society by Mrs. H. E. Goodman, from the Illinois Woman's Mission Union by Mrs. W. P. Topping, from the Central District by Mrs. George W. Taft and from the Chicago Union by Mrs. A. W. Charles. Other addresses were given by Mrs. Lewis C. Walker, Mrs. Washington Laycock and Mrs. John H. Chapman. Special music by Mrs. Edna West Grindon enriched the afternoon greetings. A vesper musicale preceded the reception given by the faculty and members of the Training School committee to the many friends who had come to the Founders' Day dinner and evening program. As a fitting close to an excellent meal Mrs. John Nuveen announced the anticipated retirement of Mrs. Clara D. Pinkham as president and at the same time introduced Miss Alice Brimson as her successor, presenting each with a bouquet of flowers as a token of love from the school. The address of the evening was a plea for the vital things of the Christian life and was delivered in the earnest and eloquent fashion which characterizes the preaching of the new pastor of the Austin church, Dr. York A. King. Preceding the address, greetings from the Chicago Association and from the Social Union were offered by W. R. Hibbs and Rev. Francis Stiffer. Rev. Norris Tibbets sang a group of songs. A nouncement was made by Mrs. Nuveen of a recent gift to the endowment fund of the Gray estate which will net the school $2500 a year.

Folks, Facts and Opinion

The cover picture for this week is a reproduction of Gilbert Stuart's Lansdowne portrait of George Washington, which is in the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. The photograph for reproduction was loaned by the Chicago Art Institute.

Efforts to unite all China in a national program continue to gain support. It is proposed to arrange for a truce among the militarists on the basis of the status quo; to reorganize the provincial assemblies and place the provincial governments closer to the people; to reconstitute parliament on a new basis of representation; to provide a method of electing a president and replacing the provisional government at Peking; to discuss a program of national recovery of rights which can be accepted by all sections of the nation and which will be supported by all parties.

If Hon. Arthur Meighen, Conservative leader in the Canadian parliament, is correctly quoted, he has experienced a remarkable political conversion on the subject of war. In 1922, when it seemed likely that Great Britain would go to war with Turkey, he demanded that the Canadian government promise to support the mother country with arms without even consulting the parliament. But according to the newspapers he recently announced at Hamilton and repeated at Quebec in deliberate public addresses, the Conservative attitude in these words: "We of the Conservative party believe that if another crisis should arise which might threaten our country—which we do not expect—this country should not send troops out of Canada without the people being consulted."

The Jewish Daily Bulletin reports that "an interdenominational pilgrimage to Palestine has been organized quietly throughout the United States during the last few months and the pilgrims embarked on the steamer Republic, of the United States lines. Almost 500 people are going, some of them after selling their farms to raise the minimum fare of $600. James W. Boring, former advertising manager of the United States lines, is directing the cruise. The announcements stated it was worth a little self-denial to tread the soil of the Holy Land where Jesus of Nazareth trod 2000 years ago; to view Mount Carmel where Elijah challenged the priests of Baal; to see the Sea of Galilee where fish abound, as they did when Jesus performed the miracle of the drought of fishes; to Jericho to see the ruins of what may be the very walls which fell at the blast of Joshua's trumpet. Many of the pilgrims took with them bottles which are to be filled with water at the River Jordan."

No; the American people have not yet exhausted their resources of stupidity. A proposal to make the raising of a religious issue in a political campaign a legal offense is under consideration in New Jersey. The constitutional principle that no religious test of office may be applied is sound, but a religious issue in a political campaign is quite another matter. Let the people make their own issues, even against Baptists.

"No one could listen to these students without concluding that, soon or late, our present denominationalism is doomed. Above all other issues, in the thinking of these youth, the obsolescence of our denominational divisions stood forth stark and unrelieved. They apparently felt that our existing denominational lines are characterized by no present-day reality. To quote the language of one of the findings, our denominational loyalties rest upon 'ancestor worship' rather than upon a facing of our real tasks in the modern world." Referring to the interdenominational student conference recently held in Evanston, Ill., so writes Dr. Samuel McCrea Cavert, general secretary of the Federal Council of Churches—an organization built upon the validity and permanency of denominationalism.

Corrections come from two apparently well-informed correspondents referring to a paragraph about the trial of Miss Anita Whitney in the issue of Jan. 30, page 1599. One of them thinks that whether the law under which she is accused is just or unjust, it ought to be obeyed until its repeal can be effected by constitutional methods. With this principle there is no dispute in these columns. The other objector is a trained lawyer and a leader in denominational work, who believes both that the law is just and that Miss Whitney has been fairly tried and is guilty of a felony deliberately committed. The information upon which the paragraph of Jan. 30 rests was taken from a survey of facts and a statement of opinions in one of the religious exchanges. These two counter statements are submitted as being not less authoritative. Concerning the general subject of laws against "criminal syndicalism" there is serious question of their legitimacy and value. Acts of crime can be objectively proved and are proper subject for legislative prohibition. But "criminal syndicalism" is so largely a matter of political propaganda, and its investigation in court so liable to be colored by political and economic prejudice, that the proper place to counteract it is the forum rather than the criminal court. To make political opinion, however indiscreetly expressed, a felony, is to subject all political freedom to a perilous hazard.

Word is received by the officers of the American Bible Society that General Chang Tze-kiang, one of General Feh's leading officers, has purchased from the society's China agency 8000 copies of Christian Scriptures for distribution among the officers in his army. This is reported to be one of the largest orders for Chinese Bibles and Testaments ever received by the China agency.

President E. Y. Mullins, trying to appease factional strife by mediatorial definitions, is saying a good many things, but not many wiser than the old saying, "I do not fully understand the Trinity. But I can easily see that God is revealed as Father and as Son and as Holy Spirit. They are of course not three Gods. God is one. But there is a threefold distinction in God, perhaps beyond our present ability to grasp."

The Federal Council of Churches, in its earnest protest against the Asiatic exclusion law of the United States, officially records its conviction "that the dicta of humanity and the welfare of the world demand the recognition by all governments of the brotherhood of man and the inherent right of all nations and races to treatment free from humiliation; that maintenance of justice, humanity, courtesy, and good-will between the people of the far West and the far East is essential to the permanent peace of the Pacific and of the world and that we have at present no better solution of the problem than the application to Japan, China and India of the quota law as it comes into force in 1927, which would result in the annual admission of 350 immigrants from those three sections of the Orient."

The following castigation of decadent wit at the expense of sacred things comes from J. S. Kirtley now acting pastor of the University Place church in Baltimore, Md. "It was a union meeting. The presiding preacher played the game robber and exhumed the buried skeleton of a decadent bit of humor about Baptist water. I love humor. Sam Johnson once said, 'If a man has plenty of religion, plenty of money and plenty of fun, what more does the fool want?' I almost applaud that. But I never smile at irreverent jokes about sacred things. The death and resurrection of our Lord is the spiritual experience of the believer symbolized by a resurrection and a final resurrection of all who die in Christ are the greatest realities in our religion. Yet all these realities are expressed in baptism. Why then should baptism be made an occasion of cheap and silly wit? Has not the time come again when we should do some very simple, elementary thinking about this expressive Christian symbol?"

The last horse of Chicago's surface trolley system was sold recently. The number has been dwindling since 1893, when electrification was commenced. At that time 10,000 horses were required to move the people of Chicago. Now it would require 575,000 horses to do the work of the electric motors, the management states. Since 1904, horses have been used only for emergency wagons or trucking in some of the yards.

A curious quotation from Lady Cynthia Mosely and comment thereon appeared in a recent number of the New York Christian Advocate, as follows: "Referring to the criminal mess which capitalism has made in England, the appalling waste, she indulges in this prophecy: Socialism will avert this waste and make Great Britain the most efficient commonwealth on earth. Mines, factories, banks must be nationalized. It will come by swift evolution instead of revolution. We do not advocate force in any way. Under national operation, mines and factories will not curtail production to create prices. Despite our present prosperity, it will come to us in time. The socialistic prophecy of the whole Englishwoman, whose mother was an American heiress, will not greatly alarm those who are familiar with the history of socialism, but it is significant of those who are in mortal dread of even socialistic whispers, but who are the very people doing most to make the socialistic scheme feasible or seemingly tolerable. How did Lady Cynthia get into this country?"

Have we fallen from grace or just stumbled into it?" So inquires Pastor James R. Shank of the First Baptist Church, Lincoln, Ill. "Editors are supposed to know," he graciously concludes. "Circumstances are these: This church has been accustomed to granting letters of dismission to churches 'of like faith and order.' But the church has voted to grant letters hereafter as indicated in the following letter addressed to the North End Methodist Episcopal Church, Pittsburgh, Pa.: 'It is desired by this church to certify that Mrs. Dwight F. Bracken is a member of this church in good and regular standing, and is at her request dismissed from us to unite with the Methodist Church. We wish at the same time to extend fraternal greetings to your church as well as to Mrs. Bracken, whom we regard as one of our daughters, and whose Christian character we commend to you. We trust that this our first 'church letter' to a sister denomination, will be received in the same fraternal spirit in which it is sent.—Done by order of the First Baptist church of Lincoln, Ill., Jan. 27, 1926.—Heman H. Henry, church clerk.' Solomon does not sit in the office of THE BAPTIST. If he did he would endeavor to know more of the facts in order to pronounce on the state of grace of Pastor Shanks and the church. He would be hopeful however in the light of present information. But he would be restrained as a consistent Baptist from trying to tell a Baptist church how it should carry on its own business. Did the letter do any harm?"

An attempt at creed making in the Southern Baptist Convention is developing some hopeful reactions. The Biblical Recorder remarks editorially: "The Southern Baptist Convention was organized to promote the work undertaken by the churches which cooperate with the convention, and has nothing to do with the formulation of creeds. Each local church has its confession of faith, and every member of a local church is amenable for his faith and conduct to the local church to which he belongs. The sooner we come back to that fundamental Baptist principle, the better it will be for our work."

Public ownership has been tabu in the religious newspapers until recently, but now it is breaking into their columns with increasing frequency. The latest reference at hand comes from Unity, which says: "The mines must sooner or later be taken over by the public and run not for profit but for service. Such a situation casts fresh light upon the issue of public ownership as we face it in this part of the world. Public ownership comes to the fore, as a matter of genuine interest and importance, only when an industry has gone all to pieces and is at the point of extinction. If an industry is powerful and prosperous, it is taken for granted that it must remain in private hands for purposes of public exploitation. When for any reason, however, profits begin to diminish and difficulties to increase, when capital gets so beset that it can no longer make large returns to investors, then, when everything else has become impossible, public ownership is resorted to. The business is turned over to the government, as the railroads were during the war, for the government to stand the loss. Then, because the government finds it difficult to do what private ownership found it absolutely impossible to do, we appeal to high heaven to bear witness to the failure of public ownership. Even under these conditions, as a matter of fact, government ownership isn't so bad, as see the parcel post or public express business. Give it any kind of a fair show, and it will be as efficient as it is just."

The mysterious organism causing sleeping sickness, which has hitherto kept its identity a secret, has been definitely tagged by Miss Alice C. Evans, bacteriologist of the United States Hygienic Laboratory, and Dr. Walter Freeman, pathologist of St. Elizabeth's Hospital for the Insane, at Washington. This is the first step toward conquering the disease which has caused thousands of deaths in Europe and America in recent years, and which leaves its survivors injured mentally.

More and more out of the southland are coming voices of returning denominational loyalty to the faith of the Baptist fathers. Hear the Florida Baptist Witness: "The convention is a missionary and not a law-making body. The creed-making business ought never to have been introduced. Our creed has long since been made and through the ages it has been the proud boast of Baptists that the Bible and the Bible only is their rule of faith and practice. It is the business of the churches, if it must be done at all, to formulate statements of what Baptists believe. Our last attempt (blunder) ought to teach us a lesson. The committee appointed relative to the matter transgressed its bounds. Its province was to report to the convention whether or not a credal statement was necessary. Instead they prepared and submitted a credal statement and there is where the trouble began. Alas, they could not agree among themselves and majority and minority reports were brought in. It came near of hopelessly splitting the convention. It has caused such agitation as the Baptist denomination had not known in a hundred years, has cost us millions of dollars, and not only made us ridiculous in the sight of the world but it has made thousands of people skeptical as to our polity and our policy if not about the religion we profess. Those of us who have concerned ourselves about the matter believe just what we believed before, while the rank and file have never taken pains even to read what the convention said and have been in no wise interested on the subject."

An Apology from The American Baptist Publication Society

Recently a false statement of doctrine crept into one of our periodicals through the oversight of one of our assistants.

It was utterly contrary to our belief and was acknowledged by both the author and the editor when their attention was called to it. We apologize for such a mistake.

We desire to teach the whole Gospel in our publications and to stand squarely against anything that would even seem to question the authority of God's Word or the Deity of Christ.

Beside the writing we do in the editorial department we receive an average of 60 manuscripts a day from outside sources. To select suitable articles from such a quantity and variety of material, and to edit them without a mistake for sixteen of our periodicals is no small task. But we are adopting a new check-up system in the details of our editorial work to make such a slip impossible in the future.

We are indebted to our critics whose reminders help us to improve our service, and we gladly acknowledge such indebtedness.

THE EDITORS

The wilderness is preparing to blossom in the Soudan. The great Sennar dam built by the British on the Blue Nile far above Khartoum will add 100,000 acres to the cotton-producing area next year and is expected ultimately to irrigate 3,000,000 acres of land. This means modern civilization in the heart of Africa on the scale of modern industrial magnitudes.

Last summer Dr. Len G. Broughton announced in the southern Baptist papers that at the next meeting of the Southern Baptist Convention he would offer a resolution definitely committing the convention to a denunciation of evolution. He has since changed his mind and so announces in a circular letter to the papers. He thinks that the southern Baptists have spent enough time, energy and temper in disputes over that subject, and that they may well turn their united attention to the main business of Christianity. Southern papers are divided in opinion. The Religious Herald, the Biblical Recorder and the Florida Baptist Witness are emphatic in approval of Doctor Broughton's action and of his reasons for it.

Educational standards for the ministry agitate Baptists, who may be interested in a statement of Dr. Alfred Inwood, registrar in charge of Methodist correspondence courses for ministers, as follows: "We do not now receive young men on trial (for the ministry) unless they have the A. B. degree. . . . Each conference can add to the minimum requirements, and we have done so in Southern California. This at first might seem a hard requirement, which would keep many out of the ministry. We have not so found it. . . . We feel that the day is past when we can afford to have untrained men in the ministry. The day is too critical for unprepared men. We must have men who are at home in the intellectual movements of the day; consequently we are urging men to get their full training before they begin their very important life work."

More power to the president would seem to be the motto of some Americans. Witness two bills pending in the present congress. The Johnson bill (H. R. 4800) would provide for drafting into service all persons between the ages of twenty-one and thirty (or such limits as the president may fix) in case of war "without exemption on account of industrial occupation." The president would also have power "to determine and proclaim the material resources, industrial organizations and services over which government control is necessary," to create agencies for such control and to take the necessary steps "to stabilize prices of services and of all commodities declared to be essential." The French bill (H. R. 287) is still more drastic since it provides for similar conscription of individuals and resources "in the event of national emergency declared by the congress of the United States to exist." It would fix the age limits for drafting "all citizens" as between twenty-one and forty-five, or such limits as the president may decide.

The chief theater of the conflict between modernism and fundamentalism at present is Canada, and the war is on in earnest. The Canadian Baptist and the periodicals of the Baptist Bible Union are at odds, the former insisting that as the term is being used in this controversy there are no "modernists" among Canadian Baptists, the latter declaring that McMaster university is a hotbed of modernism to be cleaned like the Augean stables. The strife seems not yet to have reached its peak.

General Pangalos the new Greek dictator follows the traditional form. He proposes to solidify his position by a grand military gesture. He will fortify Salonica. He has sent a commission of leading staff officers to prepare plans for the fortification of the city. This will involve a total expenditure of more than 1,000,000,000 drachmae ($13,000,000) in order to make Salonica an impregnable fortress. "I regard Salonica," said the general, "as the national acropolis of the future, and its existence is bound up with that of Greece as a nation."

Dr. Franz Spunda has been exploring the archaeology of Crete. He finds it "a land of darker and more fascinating riddles than Egypt." Knossos, the capital of ancient Crete, has revealed itself as a city built upon many other cities and settlements, and a section from the disinterred upper layer down to its deepest roots is like a cross-section of time, for the lowest levels have brought to light tools and weapons belonging to the Stone Age. Thus, there was a settlement of men of the Stone Age dwelling in this spot at a time when the Stone Age men of Europe were still living singly in caves like bears and wolves.

How far the earth is from being subdued in Russia is indicated in a recent paragraph from the London Morning Post that wolves and other wild beasts are attacking Russian villages under broad daylight. In cattle breeding areas the damage inflicted by the wolves is estimated by Soviet authorities as 25 per cent of the young cattle and 15 per cent of the cattle generally. In two months wolves have destroyed more than 100,000 head of cattle. All along the banks of the Volga and as far west as Moscow province, the damage from these castles is increasing. Villages are abandoned at sunset like camps in the wilderness; children have been attacked on their way to school.

How long were the days of creation in Genesis? Dr. J. Boyce Taylor has a positive opinion on the subject. An article of his appearing with editorial commendation in the Baptist New Mexico affirms that the creative days were ordinary days of twenty-four hours each and gives ten reasons for his opinion. Among other reasons he adduces facts that creation days had evening and morning, were of the same kind as sabbath was, had night and day, were ruled by the sun and moon; that the word "day" when used with a numeral never means anything but twenty-four hours; that there was no death in the world till man sinned, but without death animal life in the course of ages before man would have overrun the world; that if the days were long periods Adam must have lived perhaps millions of years, since he lived through at least ten of them; that the Bible was written for the common people who would not naturally understand it to mean ordinary days. It makes interesting reading.

It is not an easy matter to gather up a miscellaneous mass of news and views an actual statement of facts in controversy. The Baptist Standard of Texas supplies an example: In a long editorial survey of the current discussions among northern Baptists it makes several statements which there is no space to quote but which in material items miss the precise facts. Corrections following will sufficiently indicate the errors: (1) The proposed amendment to the laws of the Northern Baptist Convention were not introduced by Judge Freeman. (2) So far as known, Park Avenue church has not agreed to accept a form of baptism other than immersion. (3) There was no debate between Dean Shailer Mathews and President Taft before the Chicago ministers' union. There was a statement made by each in the most fraternal terms from their different personal points of view, and there was no conflict between them in regard to either facts or conclusions. In every material point to which both gave attention they were in agreement. (4) Although in the most positive terms, both stood for the principle of the baptism of believers only and by immersion only. Dean Mathews (named in particular) did not concede the right of a church to modify baptism; he expressly denied that anybody has such a right.

The Baptist Youth Movement

IT MAY not be generally known that the Baptist Young People's Union of America under the creative and inspiring leadership of Edwin H. Phelps and his associates in the executive work of the organization is forging to the front with accelerated movement and taking time by the forelock with a determination to anticipate the future in the most practical utilization of the present. It was a great forward step in the efficiency of the organization when the life work department was organized under the direction of Miss Emma Umstot, who is so eminently fitted for such a vital responsibility. Altogether too many Christian young people drift for want of guidance in selecting their vocation. The consecration pledge of the Baptist Young People's Union is designed in a general way to commit individual young people to the search for definite vocation as Christians. It would be difficult to improve the pledge. Here it is: "I will live my life under God for others rather than for myself; for the advancement of the kingdom of God rather than for personal success. I will not drift into my life work, but I will do my utmost by prayer, investigation, meditation and service to discover that form and place of life work in which I can become of the largest use to the kingdom of God. As I find it I will prepare for it and follow it under the leadership of Jesus Christ, wheresoever it takes me, cost what it may." That is a tremendous pledge, potential with heroism and adventure. It is the duty of the life work department to transmute the pledge into actual fulfillment by every means suited to that end. And it is being done every day, without blowing of trumpets or waving of banners, under the steady guidance and by the creative genius of the splendid young woman who leads this department.

And now, with the characteristic vision of youth and with the courage to follow the vision to realization, the executive committee of the Baptist Young People's Union of America has recently mobilized another department and provided in its budget the means necessary to finance it. This is the department of evangelism. We have just read the outline of the program which this department has adopted and it fills us with hope and enthusiasm. Evangelism is preeminently a youth movement. Young people have always made the best evangelists. They respond most readily to the appeal of evangelism and embody all the elements that fill evangelism with the dramatic interest of the personal quest for souls. For the purpose of yoking young people up to an evangelistic task suited to youth the department of evangelism has been projected. The program is thoroughly worked out and it is enough to say that when this department becomes active in the field of evangelism under the direction of an able and enthusiastic leader, every church in the denomination will feel the thrill of a new energy expressing itself through the local young people's societies which will function in harmony with existing agencies. One part of the program calls for special emphasis. It is to be known as "The Judson Circle." Since thousands of foreign youth have come to our shores and are still coming, an organized attempt will be made by the department of evangelism through the circle to reach these young people and lead them to Christ. Any Baptist young person giving evidence that he has led one such soul to Christ will be given a certificate of membership in "The Judson Circle." The department of evangelism will not confine its work to Baptist Young People's Unions, but every young people's society by whatever name known and all young people in our churches will be enlisted in this new crusade.

We are delighted with the evidences of the practical cooperation of the Baptist Young People's Union of America with the Board of Cooperation. As we write, exhibits of successful cooperation lie before us. "Money Talks" is a one-act play written by Margaret L. Clague, the headquarters' secretary. The play is designed for young people, the lines are peppy and easily learned, the costumes and stage setting are simple and the object of it all is to develop the sense of stewardship among youth. It is in reality an intelligent attempt on the part of the Baptist Young People's Union of America to promote the work of the Board of Cooperation. We might call it a back door approach to the Northern Baptist Convention. The young people are probably unconscious of such an approach and the officers of the society have no such object in mind. None the less it may be the initial step in a providential and natural way toward a closer articulation of the Baptist Young People's Union of America with the Northern Baptist Convention. This suggests potential lines of activity and sources of energy which we dare not follow at this time for want of space. But when the Baptist Young People's Union of America is lifted out of its segregated isolation so far as activity and membership in the Northern Baptist Convention is concerned and when by some wise method the energy, vision, courage and good-will of youth can be geared up to the council and work of the convention, we have a feeling that this will give the spiritual resilience necessary to lift the convention out of its chronic controversies and start it on the way to harmony and enthusiasm in the prosecution of the work which God expects the convention to do.

Prohibition and a Pandering Press

THE silent forces of the universe are tremendous. The noisy forces are negligible. We take comfort in this fact when we read the noisepapers which are committed to a wet policy. Recently these noisepapers have seized upon every clanging cymbal and sounding brass within reach and with more vigor than vision they have beaten their tom-toms in token of their exuberant pleasure over an alleged change of front with reference to prohibition on the part of the Episcopalian Brotherhood. It turns out, however, that all the noise is a bit of misspent energy because the great Protestant Episcopalian Church in the United States, through the voice of a large majority of its bishops who speak with the authority of the facts, repudiates the inference that the vote of the brotherhood commits that church to the overthrow of prohibition. This great religious body stands with all the other evangelical churches of the country for the perpetuation of the eighteenth amendment and for national prohibition of the liquor traffic.

Wet propaganda is a good deal like crime. A small amount of crime can crowd out of the columns of the newspapers a large mass of constructive news. One automobile in an accident on the highway will create more interest in a few minutes than a thousand automobiles which keep the road normally all day. This rule holds for everything and especially for wet propaganda. Hence when an officer of a great church body of men falls from his former position as a defender of prohibition to the level of an insurgent against the law, the whole noisepaper fraternity hails him as a prophet and endows his questionnaire with an authority which it does not possess. People are slowly learning to take the noisepapers with a big margin of discretion. Only the uninitiated swallow without question all that such papers print.

And now the latest as we write is the widespread report in the noisepapers that a great prelate of the Roman Catholic Church has come out defining the position of that church on prohibition. He asserts that the Roman Catholic Church stands for temperance as against legal prohibition. This of course is nothing new to well-informed people. As a great religious organization with headquarters in Italy and doing business with practically all western nations on a large scale, the Roman Church is slow to join in any general crusade which has to do directly with legislation and especially legislation which is regarded as summary. But in spite of the attitude of the church toward legislation, thousands of good Catholics in the United States have exercised the franchise in voting for prohibition and in sustaining the law after it was passed. The noisepapers would give the impression that the Roman Catholic Church has changed front recently with regard to federal prohibition in the United States but when the Boston cardinal speaks on this subject he is simply running true to form and voicing the consistent attitude of his church toward the liquor traffic.

We do not write this to lull anybody to sleep or to relax the vigilance of a single soul. The fight is on. We cannot blind ourselves to the fact that a reaction against federal prohibition is in evidence. That reaction is being capitalized by the wet interests and every shred of encouragement for a return of the saloon and legalized liquor-selling is seized upon with avidity by the forces having a speedy repeal of the present prohibition laws in mind. The public hangs between repeal and enforcement. Talk of modification of the present law as a relief from violation is only sugar-coating on the pill of repeal. Prohibition laws can be enforced with as much success as all other laws. If federal prohibition enforcement agencies can be placed under civil service rules and thus freed from political control, a long step will be taken toward a higher respect for the prohibition laws and a fuller enforcement of the same. In the meantime every believer in the cause of prohibition must keep awake and with true evangelistic zeal do his utmost personally and in cooperation with approved organizations to lift the moral of public opinion up to a fresh respect for the eighteenth amendment.

Church and State in Mexico

THE old conflict of powers between the church and the state seems to be coming to a head in Mexico. Mgr. Moray del Rio, head of the Catholic church in that country, regards certain laws of the government inimical to the activities of the church and to what he calls "religious liberty," and intimates that he as head of the church will disobey and resist them. Minister Tojeda, representing the government, regarding the utterances of the archbishop as "open rebellion and an attack on the fundamental laws and constitution of the country," has entered criminal proceedings in the courts against the prelate. He says: "The government permits the church full liberty of worship and the church is functioning up to the point where further liberty in this direction would be opposed to the development and uplifting of the Mexican people." When one recalls the persecutions of Protestants instigated by the Catholic priests in Mexico within recent years, one wonders just what is Mgr. Rio's idea of religious liberty. The state would seem to have done its full duty where it has placed all religions on an equality before the law. What are the Protestants in Mexico saying and doing about this question?

The World in Transit

BY THE ASSISTANT EDITOR

Some Ecclesiastics Join The Hue and Cry as Usual.

Headlines regale the public with stories of church leaders who express themselves in favor of a weakening of the Volstead law. The story is a familiar one. At every stage of the temperance movement there has been a group of ecclesiastics who stood aloof in moral superiority just far enough to count on the side of the vicious and lawless. In the "Blue Ribbon Crusade," in the local option movement, in local and state prohibition, as well as since the eighteenth amendment was adopted, their symbol has been the figure of a balking horse, and their hoary arguments of liberty and moderation have served to protect the hog-wallows of society. In the present instance they happen to be useful to the confederated vultures which are trying to break down prohibition. The weakening of the Volstead law will not satisfy them. If that is achieved they will find its remaining restraints too much for their moral dignity. Simply reckon them for what they are and go ahead with the enforcement of the law.

Who Expected More Than Prohibition Has Achieved?

If there were any Americans who thought that the passage of the eighteenth amendment was the final battle of war against alcoholism, they have probably already discovered their mistake. Those veterans who have served in this war for a half or even a quarter of a century, knew better from the beginning. To achieve the adequate enforcement of prohibition involves at least another twenty-five years of struggle. Vast business and political interests will still join hands to nullify and discredit the law. The technique of enforcement must be learned by experience, with the probability of blunders and failures in particular cases. The enforcement organization itself will be infested to a greater or less degree with political parasites whose elimination will absorb time and effort. Many features of the law must be tested by appeal after appeal to the courts. Human misunderstandings and factions are likely to arise amongst the prohibition forces themselves. Yet, by almost common consent, a wonder has taken place: the saloon system is gone. There is vastly less of drinking and of drunkenness than formerly. We are learning by actual experience what to do next to make prohibition more effective. An obvious increase of industrial efficiency and of general economic welfare has ensued. The beneficent results of prohibition are already impressing the other nations. Who was so ungainly as to expect greater achievements within six years? Who that ever understandingly believed in prohibition, can find a sufficient reason now for turning back, slacking hands or losing heart? Rather, it is a time to stand firm all along the line.

This Proposal Is Fringing, What Is Right?

Wrongs quiescent are none the less real, and they still hold dangerous possibilities. So thinks the Federal Council of Churches concerning the discrimination against Asiatics in the immigration law of the United States. In its latest utterance on the subject, adopted December 11, 1925, it calls such discrimination, in the words of Ambassador Woods, "an international catastrophe," and says, "We see at present no better solution of the problem than the application to Japan, China and India of the quota law as it comes into force in 1927, which would result in the annual admission of 350 immigrants from those three sections of the Orient." And some day when the people of the United States shall have recovered their faith, their courage and their sense of kinship to humanity, they will undo that blunder.

Taking Account of Shop Imponderables

Under the head of "shop imponderables," the Inquiry, congratulating the friends of industrial democracy upon the gains of representative government in organized industry, says: "All this is progress. It means that untoward incidents are settled not by threats of strikes or of forfeited jobs, but by declarations of principle. The law of the shop becomes not the boss's law but the law of the situation." But goes on to ask: "Is democracy enough? Does this new process for settling differences further morale, magnanimity, fellowship, or does it merely canalize the spirit of strife through channels of law and order?" Of course democracy is not enough. The best that can be said for it is that it is the best discovered substitute for war where oneness of mind is lacking. Whether in industry, politics or religion, it merely suspends strife to give opportunity for finding a way to a good understanding of facts and folk. It gives a chance to put unity into the community.

Cigaretts for Women and Sentimental Ethics

Is conduct which is sinful for a woman lawful for a man? Bryn Mawr woman's college is said to have permitted its students to smoke and to have fitted up for them a comfortable smoking room. Thereat the Florida Baptist Witness moralizes. It says: "All of the southern schools canvassed in this connection are pronounced in their attitude to the question of women smoking. In not one of these schools, according to the authorities, would smoking be tolerated, but in a number of them, the penalty for smoking is expulsion. This is as it should be, and we trust evermore will be." But this rule would have expelled many a mother from good old southern homes. When the old-fashioned father and mother lighted their pipes together by the old-fashioned fireplace, which was sinner more than the other? Likewise, when a boy and a girl smoke cigarettes together, is it likely that God discriminates against the girl?

Will Englishmen Please To Avoid Unseemly Hilarity

Complaint is made that the British have got control of the rubber market and have run up the price on American users of rubber. Surely our British cousins ought to have a heart. Can they not remember how in the world war we held prices down upon the supplies they bought from us, and how disinterestedly we refused to profit by their necessity? Do they not remember? We fear they do. If they remember, and if they are not indeed destitute of a sense of humor, how they must laugh at our outcry about the price of rubber. What are the qualities of a good sportsman? An answer would be useful to the United State at the present juncture.

Washington, a Christian Patriot

He saw his country's need and in his conscience heard the very voice of God

BY ROBERT GORDON

AT THE national capital recently, the novelist Rupert Hughes, in an address before the Sons of the American Revolution, said, "George Washington was a card player, a distiller of whiskey, a champion curser, and of course he never prayed." However, his distinguished hearers, on filing out, were not greatly surprised to find the Washington monument still standing against the sky. Hughes is said to know something of everything from numismatics to Hollywood but, so far as I can learn, he is not recognized as an authority on anything. He writes fiction fairly well. His slanderous statement was sufficiently answered when Doctor Cadman remarked, "This is only another illustration of the old saying, a cat may look upon a king."

Washington has suffered at the hands of extravagantly eulogistic biographers. Idealizations have been set up in flawless marble by some who foolishly sought to have us forget he was a real man sprung from the common dust. Let historical criticism cut off every apocryphal anecdote. After searching scrutiny has swept away the last shred of the last adulatory adumbration, we may rest assured this God-given man will still tower above his contemporaries, mountainous and magnificent. It is not necessary to come to his defense. Let it be acknowledged he did use lurid language when Benedict Arnold betrayed his country. Despite the calm composure of that impassive countenance, he had a temper that on occasion could leap hot and high in scorching flame. But none knew better than did he the difference between strong language and language that has strength in it. His opinion of profanity is on record. "This is a vice," he wrote, "so mean and low that every man of sense and character detests and despises it." As to his manufacture or use of strong drink, it remains only to be said that no eighteenth century man can be judged by the standards of our day. All sensible readers will resent the futile, fantastic effort to put him in a class with Schlitz, Pabst and Gettelman. And for the rest, we have the scholarly volumes of Lodge and the high estimates of Webster, Emerson and Gladstone. The conclusions of a century and a quarter will not be overturned. Passing time but enhances Abraham Lincoln's glowing tribute, "To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible." We shall not attempt it. Instead, we shall simply try, if possible, to add a little fuel to the fires of true patriotism by recalling how passionately he loved and served his country.

Pseudo-patriotism

All are familiar with the story of that eventful career. Yet parents and teachers need to be urged to read it often that they may the more vividly portray that character and relate those sacrifices and achievements that for so long have moved thoughtful men to speak his name "in solemn awe." A prevalent confusion of thought on the subject of patriotism makes it all the more necessary now to direct attention to Washington, the great Christian patriot. Some indeed are saying no patriotism can be described as Christian. It is called an evil, provincial spirit that should be deplored rather than fostered. Much may be said to support that contention. The most sordid purposes have been promoted under the guise of patriotism. Flags of course waved over the plant of that munitions manufacturer who declared, "I don't care how long this war lasts so long as I get my money." Conceptions of nationalism are held with which no thoughtful Christian can agree. If unbounded ambition, or windy pride, or provocative flapping is patriotism, then the church will more and more hesitate to give approval. The time is past when earnest Christian men could sing with gusto and good conscience,

"We don't want to fight, but, by Jingo, if we do We've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money too."

"My country right or wrong" is the cry of a pseudo-patriotism, a blind passion that is neither good Americanism nor good sense. Those who deny our obligation to any higher law than our own sovereignty are defending an inflated nationalism that cannot be called either moral or Christian.

But George Washington loved, defended and served America! He did, and so may we. There is nothing in our Bible to rebuke one who loves his homeland above every other spot on earth. Indeed we would suspect a man did Scott, any man "who never to himself hath said, this is my own, my native land!" We are glad Maud Roydon has passed on for us the thoughts of that British sailor at the battle of Jutland. Finding himself ready to die for Britain, he was distressed because "that great Heart of Bethlehem died for men he never knew." But that seaman followed fundamental truth when he added,

"And yet I think, on Golgotha,
When Jesus' eyes were closed in death,
He saw with a most passionate love
The little streets of Nazareth."

We have obligations to humanity but clearly he thought careth not for his own is worse than the most parochial patriot.

Peace-time Patriotism

So adventurous and thrilling were the eight years Washington served as commander-in-chief we are inclined to slight the more significant peace-time patriotism that sustained his public service for almost half a century. Four times bullets winged with death passed through his uniform. Twice his horse was shot under him. But the mettle of his manhood and the high quality of his patriotism were far more severely tested through the long trying years in which he gave up personal ease, pleasure and gain that the public weal might be conserved. We have often lost in peace all that war has won. That we might have happened here had the young nation not been guided by one so self-denying, sane and far-sighted as was Washington. It took sixty years and the bloodshed and waste of the awful Civil war finally to convince America of the wisdom of his plea for a strong central government.

But was not his patriotism altogether too provincial? Did he not refuse the calls of France for aid? Did he not counsel attention to affairs at home? He did. But they misunderstand his whole attitude who use his name in defense of isolation. He fought the small American of his time. The arguments he had to overcome in widening the thoughts of his opponents were strangely like the arguments now offered by those who would keep America from assuming larger obligations. The strong federal government for which he contended was a new idea but he saw that "new occasions teach new duties." Thirteen states stood apart, jealous and afraid. They acted toward continental government precisely as if they were dealing with a foreign power. Each insisted upon all the rights of sovereignty. What reservations they wrote! Each specifically reserved to itself the right to put up with, to strike money, to levy taxes, to open and close ports. Congress had no real power. It was little more than a debating society. Men of no mean ability mocked and argued against federation. They were supported by that natural repugnance of parties to any relinquishment of powers. Then there was the natural fear of the abuse of power in other hands than their own. But the greatest hindrance was the prevalent pessimistic opinion that Congress could never hope to depend on the voluntary compliance of so many independent communities, each consulting its own particular interests and convenience.

Not until ships lay rotting in the harbors and business stagnation brought general suffering did the need for a central government win recognition. History is repeating itself. And are not they right who insist that Washington, if here today, would be foremost among those now striving for some larger federation? Would not the man who saw the essential interdependence of those thirteen separate sovereignties see today the fact that our world is so interrelated politically, economically and every other way that some corresponding world organization is necessary to peace and prosperity? Certainly those who turn against entangling alliances in the name of Washington are doing him an ill service. He changed with a changing world. Conditions are not now what they then were. In that day we were thirteen poor colonies struggling for life. Today we are a nation of forty-eight great states, a hundred million people, the most prosperous on earth, and our flag respected round the world.

What moved this man to battle against such odds and to give himself to his country's service for so many years? You say the joy of leading cheering armies urged him on? In the snows of Valley Forge soldiers cursed him and the government, and deserted at the rate of a hundred a day. But he stood firm. You say the Continental Congress was back of him. They were often so far back of him that he did not know just where they were. With their papers in a single wagon, the Continental Congress fled from Philadelphia to Baltimore, to Lancaster, to York, to anywhere, and still he stood by his task. Do you say the praise of a grateful people sustained him? It is doubtful whether any man in our whole history ever suffered more from vitriolic vituperation. Of course there always have been those who say he fought and held office for what he got out of it. Instead he served at financial loss. But, you say, he was a rich man. Yes, and that makes his attitude all the more remarkable. Many other such men took ship for safety across the sea. He was perhaps the richest man of his time. He loved his home and great estate. "Mine own vine and fig tree" is a phrase that echoes pathetically through his private papers. No place was more dear to him. Nothing gave him greater pleasure than his home life and the care of his herds and crops and the business of his estate. What do you think moved him to set aside his own preference for privacy and accept the uncongenial responsibilities of public office? What kept this rich man away from that attractive home and at the disagreeable work of a public servant through almost fifty years?

There can be just one answer. He saw the need and in his conscience heard the very voice of God. If proof of that be sought, turn to his private correspondence. What he there wrote cannot now be gainsaid. That glorious life was rooted in this great faith—"I, believing that man was not designed by the all-wise Creator to live for himself alone . . ." Your "peace-time patriotism" is needed now. Read again "If America Fail," the last warning of the late, lamented Dr. Samuel Zane Batten. Note the evidence of an ominous increasing social pressure, the growth of an industrial proletariat, the decrease of the American stock, the waste of our resources, and the dominant mammonism of our time. If we fail! No wonder he said, "The words tremble on our lips. If we fail, the most splendid experiment of the ages has failed. If we fail, men will question whether Christianity is really potent enough to redeem any nation. If we fail, the progress of the kingdom may be delayed a thousand years."

Where you and your children can often see it, hang up the picture of George Washington on his knees beside his war horse. A nation that has had the sacred privilege of overhearing this strong man offer humble petition to the Almighty ought not to need any poet-prophet's warning, "Lest we forget." And surely no Baptist will feel any essential conflict between the most passionate patriotism and the deepest concern for the welfare of mankind. It was a Baptist who wrote, "My country, 'tis of thee." And it was the same American Baptist who gave us that world-encircling song, "The morning light is breaking." It was that type of loyalty to native land and that high regard for the interests of all mankind that makes it possible for us now to lift our hearts in gratitude to God for Washington, the Christian patriot.

The Glory in the Grey

BY A. CHESTER MANN

THOUGH sighing, sobbing winds may chant unrest,

And solemn dirges in the tree-tops play—
Yet I may still have music in my breast,
And catch a glint of glory in the grey.

Though hills may hide the crimson-fretted west,
And stand in somber, adamant array;
Yet need I fret not 'neath each shadowing crest,
If shafts of glory glint but in the grey.

The seas may moan beneath a leaden sky
Of fear and death, of loved ones borne away;

Yet I, within my soul rejoicingly,
May catch the glint of glory in the grey.

The night may tell of questionings I've hurled
Into the dark—of days when none could pray,
Yet I may still—to cheer my soul-chilled world—
Have gleams of glory shining in the grey.

The road I tread, may dip down into night,
Where purple shadows close the gates of day;
Yet still, at evening time, I may have light,
As radiant glory pierces through the grey.

Death and the Life Beyond

II—The Fundamental Question—Body and Soul

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

THE nearer question of survival which presses upon us in moments of anguish, reposes upon the great fundamental fact of man's nature, and it is this that we must now consider. It is necessary to insist upon this, since rationalistic philosophers generally assume that they who believe in the life immortal are inspired by nothing more substantial than their own vanity. "Man is of no more value for the universe at large" wrote Doctor Haeckel in his "Riddle," "than a fly on a summer day." Yet this insignificant mite dreams of continued and fuller life—the preposterous egoist! But the fly on a summer day has no conception of anything beyond its ephemeral existence in the moment of its gaiety, and man, rational man, has. There is a reason for his belief. We shall not, at the bidding of a few pompous persons, brand the entire human race as a collection of vain imbeciles. Man has always believed himself to be more than material. He has always spoken of his "ghost," his "soul," his "spirit," and it is on this account that he has cherished a belief in the survival of that spirit when the material frame has fallen to pieces. It is not his vanity that has urged him to this, but his nature. At a later stage we shall see how impressive is the testimony he has born, in many ways, to the reality of this belief.

There have been always those who, on one ground or another, deny the existence of any soul or spirit. The way is always open to doubt since the demonstration offered can never be of the same character as that with which we are familiar in the laboratory. The existence of the soul is not capable of a physical demonstration; it is none the less real for all that. It is only within the last few decades that the existence of the soul has been denied in the name of positive science. But it is important to observe that science as science offers no such denial. Those scientists, eminent in their various departments, who have lifted up their voices against the commonly accepted belief in the existence of the human spirit, have not been compelled by their science to utter their protest. Physical science can neither affirm nor deny the existence of spirit. It can merely report on things which come within its ken. Beyond that it has no jurisdiction. We are not to imagine that those aggressive men—great enough in their own sphere—who dogmatically declare that the soul is a myth, do so because established facts demand that they should. If science had established the nonreality of the soul, then every man of science would be compelled to proclaim its finding. But many of the greatest scientists of the day refuse to make any such proclamation. Physicists, biologists, astronomers and chemists such as Kelvin, Wundt, Virchow, du Bois-Reymond, Lister, Ramsay, Crookes, Lodge, Macalister, Horsley, Wallace, Duckworth, Thomson and Flammarion, with hosts of others, are acknowledged great men of science. They have never in the name of physical science sought to prove the existence of the soul, but for other reasons they held and hold a belief in spirit. When Vogt declared dogmatically that there was absolutely nothing in man which could not be accounted for chemically, he spoke, not in the name of science, but in the name of his own philosophical prejudice. There were fields of human investigation and knowledge he had never entered, but which others had entered.

We may admit freely that materialism has a great deal to say for itself when in the name of physical science seeks to tear the crown of immortality from the brow of man. On the one hand the telescope has revealed to us a boundless universe, so vast and terrible that our poor little globe is seen to be but a mere speck in space. From the point of view of size we are of no account whatever. It is hardly surprising that persons who weigh and measure everything with physical apparatus should regard man as little more than a microbe in the whole scheme of things. Yet they overlook the simple fact that it is the who measure a universe which cannot measure itself. "The physical universe is great" says Pascal, "but man is greater for the universe does not know that it is great and man does." Size, therefore, ceases to count when the mind comes into play. Follow this thread of thought right through and see where it will take you. On the other hand the microscope has revealed to us the basic structure of the physical world, and of our own physical nature. We are now aware of our kinship with lower forms of life. The chemical elements that are found in us are found also in other creatures. The chemist discourses to us of the lime, sodium, potash, phosphorus, iron, etc., of which the human body is composed. The physiologist points out that slight physical changes can seriously affect our mentality and our morals. The introduction of thyroid extract into the organism of a backward child can work almost a miracle and restore his feeble mind to a normal condition. Injury to the brain may involve loss of speech or of movement. Pressure upon a certain section of the brain may add a new "criminal" to the population. The physiologist perceives that consciousness disappears under the influence of an anaesthetic. Brain and mental activity are closely related. What more natural then, than to assume that the "mind" is nothing more than an effect of brain activity, since the two never act apart from each other. From that it is easy to infer with Carl Vogt that "free will does not exist, neither does any amenability or responsibility such as morals, penal justice, etc., would impose upon us. At no moment are we our own masters; any more than we can decree as to the secretions of the kidneys. The organism cannot govern itself, it is governed by the laws of its material combination." And then the further deduction follows, there can be no other destiny for man than a material one. "Death dissolves the elements which have bound man together. He returns to the dust from which he came. The personal being called man ceases to be. His body goes to enrich the soil. His influence, if it has been good, goes to enrich the race."

Materialism Tells Less Than Half

It certainly seems as if materialism could give a good account of itself. Its fatal weakness, however, is that it tells only one half of the story, and that the lesser half. Obsessed with the imposing display made in the laboratory it has closed its eyes to a whole world of facts which are even more impressive than those with which it deals. Two of these will occupy us for the present. They are the large facts of life itself, and the larger facts of mind.

Men have been so absorbed with life as organized that they have often enough failed to allow for the organizer. Modern science demonstrates two things from which we have the right and the obligation to deduce a third. First shows that life is the cause of organization while it differs from it. Secondly, it shows that life transcends organization. Given these two things we are entitled to deduce a third thing, namely, that life which precedes and transcends organization can and must survive organization, and is equal to the task of preparing further organizations in different conditions of life.

The first thing then is that life creates organization while it differs from it. Man's life is revealed to us here below as physically organized. The organization begins in the very simplest manner. Examined under the microscope the naked bioplast is the merest speck, resembling jelly, very much alive, and wholly without organization." This is slowly built up until it attains the dimensions we find in the fully developed man or woman. The physical organization starts in the humblest way and reaches the most amazing goal. "The body is composed, organically, of particles extracted from food and air, and woven together by the process of digestion and assimilation." The most wonderful and delicate part of the organization is the brain. Now the whole of this physical organization, brain included, is in a state of continual flux. It is always changing. Our bodies are continually wearing out and are as continually being repaired. Old particles disappear, being replaced by new ones. One day there will come an end to this process and further repair will be impossible.

The "Mysterious Weaver"

Concerning this physical organization, which starts so simply in the mother's womb and attains such marvelous proportions we can say two things. First, that it creates nothing, but on the contrary, itself is created. Behind it is the "mysterious weaver"—to use Mr. Huxley's word—that we call "life"—that great mystery which ever eludes us and which remains invisible. This "weaver" never commits an error. Operating with the same basal stuff all the time it produces here a fish, there a bird, yonder an insect and here a man. To type it ever remains true. Life is the grand mystery, the grand reality, the mother of all things. No man has ever seen it; we behold only its manifestations. Beneath and behind organization there is that creative and elusive force we call life. What is the relation of this organization to that which causes it? An organ is simply an instrument—but of what? Behind the organ there is the living performer who remains unchanged. The instrument changes; not so the performer. The particles of our bodies are ever in movement, but the real self lies deeper than the body as manifested at any one time. The last body we carry no more represents the essential self than did our first body." (Sir Oliver Lodge). The body we possess today is wholly different, so far as its particles are concerned, from that of ten years ago, but the underlying self—the personal being—remains unchanged in essence. Unchanged in essence, but when life is normal ever growing in richness and depth. What is this unchanging thing? Men name it differently. Some call it "soul," some "spirit," some "self," some "personality." It matters little what we call it, but we must say, with Sir Oliver Lodge, "we do not know what it is, but it is ridiculous to say it is nothing." Shall we agree to say that the "soul is that controlling and guiding principle which is responsible for our personal expression under the conditions of our physical ancestry and environment?"

The unity of that self or ego is preserved intact amid all the changes which pass over the physical organization. We continue to say "I," although the brain of today is not the brain of a decade ago. We can trace our personal self right back to the time when we commenced to think at all. Memory supplies all the necessary links. Further, while it is demonstrably true that while physical and mental conditions act and react upon each other, it is also true that portions of the brain may be removed without interfering in the least with the identity of the self. A half brain removed by a surgical operation does not involve the removal of half the personality. Further, the personality remains intact even when the organs through which it expresses itself are not normal or are dulled. Who has not been thrilled with the magical music of Beethoven, which has in it the music of the storm, the fall of the cataract, the laughter of children and every note of which nature is full? Yet the great musician was stone deaf and heard none of the sounds which he gave to the world. Partly sealed to the world through a defective physical organization, yet he heard within his soul those marvelous harmonies with which he ravished the world. The most striking instance in modern times, however—perhaps the most striking in the history of the world—is the case of Helen Keller. When an infant she became blind and deaf and dumb. Her physical organization was sealed up on three sides. For years she lived in an enclosed world. She never heard a sound from the material world that her brain could resolve into figures and images and ideas. She was sealed, almost entirely, to the physical universe. Yet what happened? Deep down in her soul she had fought her own personal battles, and when one of America's greatest men spoke to her—through Miss Sullivan, her teacher—about God, he discovered that she knew him already. That blind, deaf and dumb woman came to "speak" several languages, she plays beautifully on the piano, she has written books and poetry, she is no mean philosopher, and yet organically she was handicapped more heavily than perhaps any other woman. Yet, despite the organic defects, her personality remained intact.

Soul Develops as Body Decays

Further, it is a fact that the self—the soul, the personality—often grows richer and more beautiful as the physical organism through which it acts falls into decay. Old men and women whose physical powers are failing, not only maintain, but continue to develop beauty of character. They develop within to the very end. Their outward man decays, but the inner man is renewed day by day. If it were possible to provide them with a physical organism capable of expressing their advancing selves, they might exhibit a vivacity which would astonish all. It is not the self that fails, but only the physical medium through which they express it. Here then are indisputable facts concerning life and its organization. These facts justify us in assuming that as life has created this physical organization, it is equal to the task of creating a further organism of another order to meet a different set of conditions when the occasion demands it. Further, if our real self has already survived numerous physical changes it can surely survive a final one! Again we are entitled to say that when the "organ" wears out this does not in any way involve the annihilation of the performer. When an organ breaks down we are not entitled to say that the living performer has ceased to exist any more than we can say that New York and London have ceased to exist as cities because the cable by which we communicate with each other has suddenly been cut. And when a body "dies" we have no right to assume a priori, that the personal life which has manifested itself through an ever-changing organization has ceased to be.

The study of life, however, takes us much farther than this. Life not only creates organization, it transcends it. If the old materialistic dictum were true that "the brain secretes thought as the liver secretes bile," and that man at the highest is nothing more than "matter in a certain disposition" then we should be limited by that which has produced us. Nothing can rise higher than its source, and if we are the product of matter then we cannot rise higher than the limits of the material. But every day of our lives we do rise above the material. The "soul" can create. Out of sound we can create harmony. Out of spectacles we can create art. We meditate upon certain facts and from these we can deduce principles. Chief of all we can rise to the notion of the ideal. In the presence of conflicting duties and demands we can choose; and the highest type of man will often choose to do things which are against his interests and his feelings. The doing of them will cause him pain and inconvenience, yet he does them because he is urged by a sense of right—a great "ought" which becomes to him a final imperative. The Christ chose Gethsemane and Calvary rather than fail to accomplish the work of human redemption. The highest things to which we can, in thought rise, are not capable of being measured or expressed in any material way. Who can weigh honor or virtue or love? These are spiritual conceptions and pass beyond all material boundaries. We can rise to the conception of the highest of all and think of God. All this means that the essential self is spiritual or it means nothing at all. There is an inner self which links us to the eternal. This soul or self is not demonstrable to the senses, but this is no argument against its reality. There is in the universe an element without which there would be no light or life for us and no unity for the world. It is known as the ether of space. Yet it is not directly demonstrable to our senses. With difficulty many people have persuaded themselves that it exists at all. Yet, as Lord Kelvin said, there is nothing more certain than its existence. It explains the phenomena of light and color and much else and it alone explains them. So is it with the soul. No man has ever seen it, yet it alone explains the phenomena of our life. Suppress the spiritual explanation of existence and life becomes an insoluble enigma before which humanity must eventually break its heart.

Powers of the Mind

The larger facts of life are one of the fundamental bases upon which belief in the hereafter supports itself. The other fundamental base is the larger facts of mind. And here we are in the highway to the laboratory, for the whole processes of the mind have been subjected, during recent years, to rigorous scientific investigation. It would not be possible today for Doctor Haeckel to return and to repeat his gibes against his former confreres at Jena who deserted his materialistic theories in favor of a more exact psychological and spiritual explanation of the nature of man. It is now known that the mind is a far deeper and more marvelous thing than was suspected a decade or two ago. It is infinitely greater than a mere "registering machine." It can create and dominate. It is one of the main factors in promoting physical health. It aids powerfully in banishing certain diseases from the human body. It can be far more potent than drugs in its effect upon nerve and tissue. Now if mind be a product of unreasoning matter how comes it to pass that it can perform what is little less than a miracle upon the substance that has produced it; in a word, how can the effect be greater than the cause? But grant that mind is superior to and wholly different from matter, the explanation of the various phenomena is simple even if the process be not understood. The dominance of mind is a fact which must be set over against the other fact—that mind, as it operates in human life, is generally associated with some department or other of man's physical life. But it is unwarrantable to draw the conclusion that it can act only in this way.

There is more than this, however. There are the facts of hypnotism which open up a new and mysterious region of activity, and disclose the operation of a mental force which cannot be forced into the framework of the old materialism; the facts associated with prevision in which events not yet upon the horizon are perceived long before their appearance and rehearsed in advance in startling detail; the facts associated with telepathy, that amazing communication of mind with mind over vast spaces between which there is no visible or material medium; the facts associated with the clairvoyant power of the dying who see and describe persons long since "passed over," in such a way that it is impossible to doubt the reality of their mysterious experience or to refer it to mere memory or to any "material" cause; the facts associated with inspiration, that invasion of the personality by a power which exalts the whole being and raises it to an altitude which it could never reach if left to itself. These are facts which the old materialism either would not or could not consider, but which the new sciences dealing with mental and spiritual processes are forcing to the front. The discovery of the "subconscious" or "subliminal" mind has revolutionized modern thinking and banished forever the easy explanations of the mental life which a few decades ago were regarded as finally settled. Personal identity can no longer be expressed in terms of the contents of the mind, since these continually change. The roots of the personal self have to be sought in a larger sphere, beyond the material and beyond the mental. They can be found only in the spiritual. Man has a threefold manifestation of his essential life, physical, mental and psychical, but the life itself is spiritual, drawn from the Eternal Spirit—God.

"We Are the Sons of God"

No other account of man covers all the ground and completely explains man as he is. The way is open as never before to a full belief in the spiritual nature of man and in his consequent survival of the event we call death. "We are," says a Christian apostle, "even now the Sons of God and we shall be . . . like Christ." The "are" always carries the "shall be," even as the oak is carried in the acorn and the man in the infant. The promise of complete life is found everywhere and is everywhere fulfilled where things are normal. It will not fail in man who is the masterpiece of God here below. For him there must be reserved a finer body than that which at present hampers him while it only partially expresses him; and a finer society in which the gains of the age-long struggle and pain of earth will be perfectly conserved. When Christianity speaks of the life everlasting it does not employ the language of poetic illusion, but the language of spiritual science which affirms the completion of the "end" for which man was made in a spiritual comradeship beyond under the direction of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Nothing that positive science has discovered invalidates this truth of the Christian gospel. On the contrary, where positive science carries forward, with courage, its central doctrine of evolution it finds itself one with the Christian faith. We may ask with Professor Richet "Why should not intelligent and powerful beings exist apart from the worlds of which our senses inform us? By what right can our limited senses and our defective intelligence warrant us, after a bare three centuries of scientific thought, affirming that in the immense Cosmos man is the only intelligent being and that all intellectual reality implies nerve cells nourished by oxygenated blood?"

Some Civic and Social Imperatives of Discipleship

"Shame and disgrace will be ours if we trail in the dust the golden hopes of men."—Theodore Roosevelt

BY OLIVER C. HORSMAN

THE Apostle Peter in the second chapter of his first epistle regards the Christian as a citizen of two kingdoms, an earthly and a heavenly. "Ye are a holy nation, a people for God's own possession," he says. There he is speaking of the heavenly and eternal kingdom to which they belong. "Be subject to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether to the king as supreme; or unto governors, as sent by him," he continues. There he is speaking of the earthly and temporal kingdom, to which they belong. A Christian is born by nature into the one, and born again by grace into the other. Each kingdom has its own advantages and responsibilities, and the Christian, as long as he lives in the world, may enjoy the privileges and must discharge the obligations pertaining to both kingdoms. While he walks with his head in the clouds, he should keep his feet solidly on the earth. There are still Christians who hold the mistaken idea that political activity is incompatible with saintliness. But Peter said, "Be subject to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake," that is, as a part of the duty you owe to Christ—and he bade his brethren "by well doing to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." There were those who claimed that some good Christians were bad citizens, and Peter was anxious that such an accusation should never be true.

The relation of a Christian to the Roman government under which he lived in the first century was profoundly different from the relation of a Christian to the American government under which he lives in the twentieth century. When Christians were only subjects of the government. Now Christians are the government itself, for they elect their own representatives to make and execute the laws under which they desire to live. A big burly violator of the law once exclaimed to a diminutive constable who was serving a summons upon him, "Clear out or I'll shake you in pieces." "Do as you please," returned the constable, "I remember, when you shake me, you shake the whole State of Massachusetts." So Christian citizens are the State itself, and they must identify themselves with all its interests, institutions and activities. The duties they owed the Roman government were purely negative. The duties they owe to the American government are both negative and positive.

Negative Duties

First, among negative duties, the Christian should submit to the laws and statutes of his city, state and country. It is wrong for me to violate a law because it does not please me personally and is pure anarchy. If I may choose what laws I will obey and what laws I will disobey, then every neighbor of mine may do likewise. That way lies chaos and ruin. I commend the attitude of Lieutenant Blaney of the Atlantic Avenue police station, Brooklyn, who, when his own son, twenty-three years of age, was brought in for fighting on the streets, promptly locked him in jail. The boy had boasted that he could not be arrested because his father was a police officer. His father taught him that even a policeman's son must obey the law. The New Testament writers repeatedly insist upon submission to governmental authority.

Second, the Christian must submit readily to the demands upon his time and service which his community or his country may legitimately require of him. In time of war, he must give himself for the defense of his country's integrity; in time of insurrection, for the preservation of law and order; and in time of peace, for jury service. One very conspicuous weakness in the enforcement of prohibition has been the failure of juries to convict after officers of the law have done their duty and have produced overwhelming evidence. Christians should covet the opportunity to put their wisdom and moral strength into jury service.

Third, Christians should submit with good grace to the payment of taxes. "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's," "Tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom." The Bible makes tax-paying a religious duty. Rebuke and punishment fell from God upon Ananias and Sapphira when they entered a false return to the minister of God representing the church. What kind of punishment, think you, will fall from God upon men who enter a false return to the tax-collector, a minister of God representing the state?

Positive Duties

There are three positive duties owed by the Christian citizen under our American form of government that were unknown to the Roman.

First, he should think through the problems that belong to our social and political life. They are the problems of all of us, and we must all help solve them. Our country was founded by Christian men upon Christian ideals and principles. Not all of our laws, customs and institutions are perfect. Some are bad, some foolish, some antiquated. When the capitol at Albany, N. Y., was being built, not enough granite of the right color and quality was available. In order not to delay the work, wooden blocks were cemented into one of the walls at various points. These were later replaced by the required granite. So whatever is bad in our community or national life must give way to something better. We, the Christian citizens, must think out the solutions for crime, child-labor, bootlegging and every other evil thing.

Second, the Christian citizen must vote for the best measures and the best men. The privilege of the ballot is "the fruit of long, arduous and costly experiment. Let us esteem it highly. Evil-disposed men vote early and vote often, if they can get away with it. Law makes election day a holiday; the Christian ought to make it a holy day. I read that 8000 persons in our country, eligible to vote at the recent primary election, failed to go to the polls because it rained. The judgeship was won, or lost, by 1500 votes. Shame upon every citizen who allowed the weather to deter him from a civic duty so vital and precious. No Christian should vote for a candidate as a matter of friendship or personal favor, or for any selfish end whatsoever. The greatest good of the greatest number is the sole criterion by which to determine one's ballot for both men and measures.

Third, the Christian citizen should volunteer for public service. If he possesses any talent, moral or intellectual, that can be invested for the social and political welfare of his country, God will hold him accountable. There are school boards, health boards, trade associations, civic clubs, charity organizations and numerous other groups where volunteers are imperatively needed. All honor to the men who give their best to the community or the state at salaries less than they might earn in personal pursuits. Let every Christian say, not "my country owes me a living," but, "I owe my country a life." Then will the kingdom of God be near.

It should be the unwearied ambition of Christians to infuse the spirit, the ideals and the principles of their Master into governmental conditions and arrangements. There have been three stages in the development of democracy. The first, when political power was taken from the few and given to the many. It was supposed that if the masses could vote, they would vote for their own good. But an ignorant citizenry wrought injury to itself with the ballot. Then it was thought that universal education would save democracy. But increasing crime has gone hand in hand with increasing enlightenment. Education does not make men virtuous. Now we know that the greatest need of democracy is the Christian religion, that men and women may have the disposition of Jesus Christ in the conduct of their social and political life. This is the task of the church, to enthrone Christ in the state, not name only, but in fact.

Said Theodore Roosevelt in Carnegie Hall, 1912: "the long fight for righteousness, the watchword for us is spend and be spent. It is of little matter whether a one man fails or succeeds; but the cause shall not fail, for it is the cause of mankind. We, here in America, hold in our hands the hope of the world, the fate of the coming years; and shame and disgrace will be ours if in our eyes the light of high resolve is dimmed, if we trail in the dust the golden hopes of men."

Four Great Americans Speak

GEORGE WASHINGTON: "This government must have support and respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. But the constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government."

Abraham Lincoln: "Let every American, every lover of liberty, every well-wisher to his posterity, swear by the blood of the revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of the country, and never to tolerate their violation by others."

"As the patriots of seventy-six died to support the Declaration of Independence, so to the support of the constitution and laws, let every American pledge his life, his property and his sacred honor. Let every man remember that to violate the law is to trample on the blood of his father, and to tear the charter of his own and his children's liberty."

"Let reverence for the laws be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in schools, in seminaries, and in colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling-books, and almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in the legislative halls, and enforced in courts of justice. In short, let it become the political religion of the nation."

Warren G. Harding: "There can be no issue in the land paramount to the enforcement of law."

"I do not see how any citizen who cherishes the protection of law in organized society may feel himself secure when he himself is the example of contempt for law."

"I am convinced that they are a small, and a greatly outnumbered minority who believe the eighteenth amendment will ever be repealed."

"I am convinced that whatever changes may be made will represent the sincere purpose of effective enforcement rather than modification of the general policy."

"The issue is fast coming to be recognized, not as an issue between those who believe in prohibition and those who do not, not a contention between those who want to drink and those who do not—it is fast being raised above all that, to recognition as an issue of whether the laws of this country can be and will be enforced."

"Ours must be a law-abiding republic and reverence for obedience must spring from the influential and the leader among men, as well as obedience from the humbler citizens, else the temple will collapse."

"Whatever satisfaction there may be in indulgence, whatever objection there is to the so-called invasion of personal liberty, neither counts when the supremacy of law and the stability of our institutions are menaced."

The Devotional Life

Fear and Faith

"What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee."—Ps. 56:3.

BY GEORGE H. MORRISON

PEOPLE who are highly sensitive are far more apt to be fearful than their neighbors. There are a hundred fears that never touch the man of stolid, unimaginative nature. That is why for a certain type of person to be brave may be comparatively easy, and for another infinitely hard.

The worst thing about the fear rooted in the imagination is that reason is powerless to allay it. You might as soon allay a fire with good advice. Argument is cold. It cannot banish the spectres of the soul. It has no brush that can obliterate the pictures of the imagination. But there is another way, more powerful than reason, to overcome imaginative fears, and that is the way of this inspired psalmist. Faith is the antidote to fear. It quiets fear as the mother quiets her child. The child still dreams, but the dreams are not reality. It is the mother's arms that are reality. So we, his children, dreaming in the darkness, and sometimes much frightened by our dreams, find "underneath the everlasting arms."

The Microbes of Misery

Another common source of fear is weakness or frailty of body. Everyone is familiar with that. When we are strong and well it is not difficult to keep our fears at bay. Fears, like microbes, do not love the sunshine. They need the darkness for their propagation. That is why, when the lights of life are dim, we readily become the prey of fearfulness. Burdens we can bear without a thought when we are strong and vigorous and well; tasks we can meet with quiet, equal hearts; difficulties we can bravely face. These seem insurmountable when we are worn, and often plunge us into the lowest pit. We must never forget how the temper of the mind is affected by the condition of the body. Health is not alone the source of happiness; it is one of the perennial springs of hope. Many of our vague uncharted fears which haunt us and rob us of the sunshine, are rooted in the frailty of our frame.

There are very few of us who could be described as physically perfect. And to all such, whatever their condition, I want to give these noble words of Scripture: "What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee." He knows our frame. He remembers we are dust. He made us and he understands us. He alone can perfectly appreciate the inter-actions of body and of mind. And when we trust him, in a childlike faith, nothing is more evident in life than the way in which he disappoints our fears. His grace is sufficient for us. Often when we are weak then are we strong. Drawing from him we find we have our fulness, given us daily as the manna was. Until at last the "body of our humiliation" shall be fashioned like his glorious body, and then such fears will be laid to rest forever.

Conscience and the Cross

One other source of fear is the faculty of conscience. A guilty conscience is a fearing conscience—conscience doth make cowards of us all. Could we get rid of conscience, what fears would go whistling down the wind! But God has so created us, that that is the one thing we cannot do. We may drug and dope it, we may silence it, we may sear it as with an iron, but, like the maiden, it is not dead, but sleeping. It awakens in unexpected seasons, sometimes in the stillness of the night, or when our loved ones are removed in death, or when we see our sins bearing fruit in others; perhaps most often in our dying hours, when the flaming colors of time no longer blind us, and we draw near to the revealings of eternity. All the fears of our imagination, all the fears that spring from weakly bodies—all these, however haunting, are nothing to the fears of conscience. And the tremendous fact, never to be gainsaid by any theory of its evolution, is that God hath put conscience in the breast.

Pardon and Peace

But he who has put conscience in the breast has done something more wonderful than that. To minister relief to fearing conscience, he has put his only begotten on the tree. There, explain it how you will, is freedom from the hideous fears of conscience. There, explain it how you will, is release from the terrors of our guilt. One trustful look at the Lord Jesus Christ, dying upon the cross of Calvary, and the fearfulness of conscience is no more. There is now, therefore, no more condemnation. Pardon, we have joy and peace. God is for us on the cross, and if God be for us, who can be against us? Blessed Saviour, who didst die for us, and whose blood cleanseth from all sin, "What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee."—The British Weekly.

"What My Father Meant to Me"*

BY GENE STRATTON PORTER
(Concluded from last week)

I think the next thing for which I would make my acknowledgments is the fact that my father had a deep sense of obligation to his children. He believed that no man had a right to bring a child into the world unless he intended to make himself responsible, so far as lay in his power, for its physical growth, for its mental culture, and for its loving and careful rearing.

No matter how badly he wanted to read, or to study for the thoroughly prepared sermons which he delivered in our church and the neighboring churches—for he was an ordained minister of the Northern Indiana Methodist Conference—no matter how exacting the work that must be done on the farm in order to give comfort to his large family, no matter how much time was needed when he was filling the office of a member of the church board, a supervisor of the schools, a county commissioner, or occupied with the affairs of his political party, he always had time to give loving and careful instruction, both moral and educational, to his children.

All the money he could possibly afford he spent for books and papers. From these things he read aloud at night; and the performance ended by the reading and expounding of a chapter from the Bible. Then all of us knelt before our chairs while father prayed; not at us, but for us.

I have always thanked God that father used the Bible as a lure, as an enticement, not as a menace or a threat. When morning came, before we had our breakfast, the reading of a chapter and the word of prayer were repeated; and three times a day, before we ate our food, he asked God's blessing.

He had time to love us. He could tie up our fingers expertly, carefully trim the broken nail of a stubbed toe, and with a stout waxed thread extract a loose tooth. He could doctor us in the common ailments of childhood, and did crude surgery.

Every winter night of my memory, up to the time that I was big enough to go to school and to take my place at the table with my slate and pencil, I went to sleep in my father's lap.

He could repeat the entire Bible, barring the books of the generations, which he said were a waste of gray matter to commit to memory. I have heard him quote Wilson and Gibbon and Macaulay and Hume on the same point in history; and he loved Tyndall on "The Forms of Water," and scientific books, and works on astronomy. Everything he gathered, from any field in which he could glean, he brought home and passed on to mother and to us children.

"First firesides, then neighborhoods—that is the order in which life works itself out."

He always had time to explain what kind of fruit he set in the orchard, and why. It was my job to hold the trunks of the small trees while he tucked in their toes, wetted fine sand, rolled it in, and carefully packed the soil to keep out the air. Before I was ten years old I could set a tree as expertly as he could.

I knew how the grain was cut and threshed and measured; how the sheep were sheared and the geese were picked; how the wool was washed and dried before it was taken to market. Down the long rows of the cornfield I went with him many a spring, dropping the corn which he covered with his hoe; and as I went I chanted the lines that he had taught me:

One for the blackbird,
One for the crow,
One for the cutworm,
And four to grow.

It was from him I learned that he did not lay down his hoe and start to the house the instant the dinner bell rang. No matter how hot the sun was, nor how tired and hungry he might be, he worked on to the end of his row; then he set his hoe up, so that the blade was out of the reach of stock or of the small bare feet of children.

When I was near the age of ten, my mother went on her long journey. And then, with an older brother and two sisters, I was turned over completely to father. He must have had all sorts of annoyances with our attempts at house-keeping, and with the inferior work of women who were hired for that purpose. I know he must have been exasperated ever find yourself in the quandary of the advertising copywriter who used the word "judgement" in a sign that was painted all over the signboards of a big city in red letters a foot high on a blue background? Later the signs were all repainted and the word had lost its "e"—judgment. The generally accepted rule in this country is that words ending in "dge" drop the "e" when the syllable "ment" is added, as judgment, lodgment, acknowledgment.

with the food he was supposed to eat because he had been accustomed to highly expert cooking of the freshest and most delicious food in all the world—fruit straight from the trees; vegetables fresh from the garden; the finest of milk, butter, and lard; and meat of his own curing. But he never uttered a word of complaint. He made the best of every thing. He taught us patience, and he taught us, as nearly as he could, how our mother had done things about a home.

The first stroke I made in my own behalf was when I found that the price Mrs. Grant charged for teaching the other girls to paint on satin, canvas, and china was out of the question for me. Yet as I watched the work they did I saw that in almost every instance they did not know how the stem of a flower, the coloring of a petal, or the shading of a leaf should be managed to be right. My fingers itched and my brain fomented with desire. So, at last, I stood between father's knees and, with my hands on his shoulders, I told him all this as diplomatically as I could; for at no cost to myself would I purposely have hurt his feelings. I asked him if there was any possible way in which he could help me.

He thought for some time; then he said: "This Mrs. Grant has a family?"

I could name at least five children in the Grant family.

The next question was as to where the Grants lived; and that noon, when I went to school, father walked with me until we came in sight of the Grant house, and then I went on alone. That evening, when I raced home from school and stood before him, he told me that the following Saturday morning I might go to Mrs. Grant at eight o'clock for my first painting lesson and remain until twelve. And I learned that potatoes, apples, turnips, and beets had to be bought in the Grant family; that fresh vegetables straight from a big farm would be considered a great luxury by them. Vegetables would pay for the painting lessons and for material with which to work.

It was to my father that I carried the first line that I ever wrote—a line that awoke in me the feeling that I might ultimately be able to paint a picture with a pen as well as with a brush.

I had been assigned a paper on "Mathematical Law," and faked it, because my subject was out of the bounds of my comprehension. I do not know why such a beastly subject ever was assigned a sophomore. What I knew was how the flowers bloomed and seeded how the birds lived their lives, and the

An Explorer Who Took a Gentleman's Word

HEAVY clouds hung over the African forest. It was a dark night and the buds hid even the light of the moon and the stars. Suddenly the roar of a thunderclap sounded. In the gleam of the next flash of lightning a party of men with thirteen oxen could be seen making their way between the trees of the forest. They were all black except one whose skin was white. He was David Livingstone. By his side was Sekeletu, the eighteen-year-old African chief, who had learned to love the white man as a father.

For about fifteen years David Livingstone had been in Africa, teaching the people of the true God, fighting slavery, and discovering new country. Now he was trying to find a way down the Zambezi river to the east coast.

His friend, the young Chief Sekeletu, had chosen more than a hundred of his best men to go with his "white father," he called Livingstone.

Livingstone was deeply touched by the love of his young African friend, but Chief Sekeletu was not yet through.

"And I myself will go with you part of the way," he said, "to lead my father to see the Sounding Smoke."

On their way they came to a patch of forest filled with tsetse flies which killed horses and oxen. Some of the older men were sent ahead to pitch camp for the night while Livingstone and Chief Sekeletu waited with the younger men, bringing the oxen through the forest at night when the flies would not trouble them.

As the rain poured down after the thunder and lightning, Livingstone saw he could not get through to the camp that night in the storm and when he came to a deserted campfire in a sheltered spot he turned aside with his friends to spend the night.

There were no beds, and after the intense heat of the day the night was cold. Livingstone lay down on the ground shivering in his wet clothes. He looked up as he felt some one touch his shoulder. Chief Sekeletu was bending over him to wrap him in his own blanket. Livingstone tried to make the young chief keep his blanket for himself but Sekeletu's strong young arms trapped it around his "white father" in spite of protests.

One day as they journeyed they heard a mighty roar. Looking ahead, Livingstone saw five columns of smoke mist rising in the air in the distance.

"It is Mosi-oa-tunga (Sounding Smoke)," said Sekeletu.

The waters of the Zambezi were getting more and more swift. The men paddled the canoes carefully into the quiet eddies and Livingstone landed on an island. The river, which was more than a mile wide, disappeared as it rolled over a precipice four hundred feet high. Five tall columns of spray rose so high that they hid the sun, reflecting its rays in a great double rainbow which stretched from one bank to the other. The waters dashed over the precipice with a deafening roar.

Livingstone was the first white man to see "Sounding Smoke" with its falls that are much larger than the great Niagara.

"'Victoria Falls' shall be its name," he said, "in honor of England's great queen."

He spent several days there learning more about the falls. On a trunk of a tree on the island above the cataract he carved his initials to show that he had really reached the falls, and, after saying goodbye to his friend, Sekeletu, who had to return to his people, Livingstone started again on his journey.

When the party came to the place where the Loangwa river runs into the Zambezi, a fierce chief met them. Some time before, a party of men who were half Portuguese and half African had passed through this country and angered him. When the chief saw Livingstone he thought he was of the same race as that party and that now he would have his revenge.

Livingstone stood up fearlessly before the angry chief. The African sun had burned his face until it was brown but he tore open his shirt and showed his white skin where the sun had not touched it.

"Do the Bazinka look like that?" he asked.

"No," said the chief, "the Bazinka are not white as you are."

But Livingstone could see that the chief was still suspicious. He knew that in the morning when he was to cross the river orders might be given that he should be shot with poisoned arrows or knocked on the head and killed.

The great missionary explorer was very tired. Along the way he had had a fight with an angry elephant. Another day a savage man had rushed at him swinging a battleaxe. Now he was in the country of an angry chief who might kill him at any moment.

"Shall I cross the river secretly during the night and get away?" he said to himself.

He was not afraid for his life, but he knew that in his tin box were the valuable records of all his discoveries, and that if he were killed and the box destroyed the world would not have the benefit of them.

He opened the box and took from it the Bible he always carried with him. Turning to a page that was worn because he had studied it so often he read, in the flickering light,

"Go ye therefore and teach all nations . . . and lo, I am with you always."

"That," he said, "is the word of a Gentleman of the most sacred and strictest honor. I will not slip away to cross the river in the night as if I were put to flight. I will take observations for latitude and longitude tonight, though they be the last."

In the morning he borrowed a canoe to cross the river. As his party went toward the banks, the subjects of the angry chief gathered around them armed with spears. It seemed as though they planned to let some of the party escape by crossing, and then kill those who remained. First to cross in the canoe were the men who carried the burdens, then the oxen were taken over, and after them, the other men, leaving Livingstone until the last.

As the canoe went back and forth and the armed savages gathered about him, he took his watch from his pocket. He showed them the moving wheels, and, motioning them to come closer, let them listen to the ticking as he explained how the wheels made the hands move and keep time.

He took from his pocket a magnifying lens and showed how it gathered the sun's rays until they burned.

When he had finished, the last load had been taken across the river and the canoe was waiting for him. He turned to the savages all about him, who had come to the river bank expecting to kill him, and not a spear was raised to strike.

"I wish you peace," he said, and stepping into the canoe he was taken across the river.

"Meeting Helps" on C. L. P. Topics for Mar. 7

Note: All references hereafter made in these "Meeting Helps" will be to the following books: "Modern Discipleship and What It Means" by Woods; "Twelve Tests of Character" by Fosdick; "The Man Nobody Knows" by Barton; "Gates and Keys to Bible Books" by Robinson; "How We Got Our Bible" by Smyth; "A Short History of the Christian Church" by Moncrief; "Peasant Pioneers" by Miller; "God's Dynamite" by Lerrigo. The entire set of books may be had from the American Baptist Publication Society. A few others may be added later.

On pages 143-161 of Fosdick's "Twelve Tests of Character" you will find a great deal of helpful material. Also read the last chapter of Barton's "The Man Nobody Knows" beginning on page 193 and on to 220.

In presenting the lesson at meeting, have a vacuum cleaner or carpet sweeper on hand. Scatter on the floor pieces of dust and paper, and some very heavy objects—perhaps silver dollars or chunks of lead. Then, using the sweeper or vacuum, take up these pieces of paper and dust. Try also to take up the heavy objects which will no doubt remain where they are.

Have on hand, also, two flowers (white if at all possible). One of these should have a porous stem (such as the aster) and the other a very "close" stem (such as the rose). Place these flowers in a glass of water which has previously been colored red, black or blue, with ink. You will notice that soon the porous-stemmed flower becomes the color of the water, while the other remains unaffected.

If you cannot get the flowers, a whole carrot and perhaps a bean may be used. After a short time, the carrot may be cut in half lengthwise and it will be noticed that the inky water has spread through the whole carrot, while the bean remains unaffected.

Then the parallels may be drawn. Just as some people are like paper and dust and become easily the victims of their environment—so some are like the heavy objects and will not be "swept away" by circumstances, but rise above them.

And, as some people are like the porous-stemmed flower or carrot and become tainted and impure because of environment, so others are like the rose or bean and in spite of circumstances, remain pure and beautiful.

Perhaps a few illustrations, gathered either from your reading or from personal experience, may be cited. The conclusion should be the resolve to make better our own environment, not only for our own good but for the good of others with whom we come in contact and who must live in that environment.

In the Meantime

"One unified church substituted for the denominational organizations beginning by having the young people's societies immediately join forces regardless of denominational lines, preferably under the Federal Council of Churches." Thus decreed the student conference at Evanston recently. Yes, it was a decree—a sort of mandate. No method whereby even these young people's societies might proceed was suggested.

Many good people have become almost panicky about what is to become of the present machinery, tomorrow. Other folk are "laughing up their sleeves," so to speak, at such unregulated optimism of youth, saying to themselves, probably, "Oh, well, they're inexperienced, they don't understand how things are—or how they have to be."

While this and other youth meetings have been "decreeing" what ought to be, other youth agencies of the church have actually been bringing to pass things which, if not actually fulfilling the spirit of these decrees, hold promise of setting up a more united front in the church's approach to the problem of meeting the spiritual needs of youth.

Leaders at Work

Two groups—interdenominational and international in make-up—have for something over a year been at work on the matter of how the program of study and activity for young people ought to be revamped. Both groups are thinking and working in terms of a correlated all-round program for the young people of the local church; a program built in terms of needs of the local situation rather than the adoption of material handed down from "these sky-scraper Sinais", to quote a leader in one of these groups.

These two groups are the Interdenominational Young People's Commission and the Committee on Christian Life Program for Youth of the International Council of Religious Education. And, as noted above, these groups are both interdenominational and international—at least to the extent of representing the entire North American continent.

The Commission

Something over a dozen of the denominational national young people's societies are represented on the commission—the United Society of Christian Endeavor, Baptist Young People's Union of America, Epworth League of the Methodist church, Young People's Alliance, etc. Topics for the weekly meetings of the young people's society have, perhaps, in the past been the major function of this commission. And it still is. However, that work is now paralleled by study of programs, standards and service activities. A sub-committee of the commission made its first report at the annual meeting of the commission at Columbus last December. It was based upon a survey of a rather limited number of churches of different denominations and varying sizes covering, however, rather wide territory. Incomplete though the survey was, yet it revealed recognized need and tendency toward rather unified program for young people, a program unified in its principles, however, rather than its details.

This commission committee is continuing its study in an attempt to find a surer and larger measure of unification of the principles of young people's work. Moreover, it is seeking to work hand in hand with this other committee of the International Council.

The Council Committee

To refer to "committee" again is like not to register distinction. However the other group above referred to is a committee also, but it is a creation of the International Council of Religious Education. Hence it may probably be called the "council committee" and thus be distinguished from the other—the commission committee.

The council committee represents even a larger constituency than the commission committee, for it has on it representatives of agencies that are working more largely with the young people—the Sunday or church school. Yet, it has also representation from the young people's society agencies. Moreover, it has representation from the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A.

This council committee likewise is seeking to find a basis for building a somewhat uniform program of study and activity for young people. And it is to be a program unified in its principles rather than its details. And what more, it is searching for that program with a view to its being comprehensive in its make-up but flexible enough to be adapted to the needs of any local church regardless of denominational relationship or local conditions.

A Worthy Promise

Is there not hope in these two enterprises? It takes time to get out of "ruts." If these two groups can have the sympathetic assistance and counsel of workers with young people, we may expect movement in the right direction. Whether it will result in a condition fulfilling the decree above quoted cannot be foretold. Nor is that important. It has the promise of something better. Accordingly it merits encouragement.

Among Ourselves

Boston Letter

BY CHARLES H. WATSON

Samuel Macauley Lindsay

The gifted Brookline pastor was the speaker at the first joint annual meeting of the Backus Historical Society and the New England Baptist Library. It was an ideal deliverance for such an occasion. It had the flavors of history and learning, the finish of a careful manuscript, yet was given with the perfect freedom of an unconventional talk, on a theme that so absorbingly interested the speaker that none of us ever saw a scrap of paper, or thought of it. Pastor Lindsay is much given to that sort of thing, and does it well.

His theme, "John Wesley," was evidently a favorite one. He could hardly connect with such a dynamo of conviction and action as John Wesley was, without reaching his own utmost in thought and expression. By the way, speaking of historical discourse, what is there that smacks of inerradicable record like the living biography of a man who did little else than make history? So, with Wesley in view, the speaker took us to the roots of things in eighteenth century England, and described what was picked up and what planted. Like Prometheus, Wesley was "small of stature." He did not "climb a tree," but he planted one, and the branches thereof spread over the world. God has an amazing method of thus compacting in a little seed the germ of a great matter, and giving him with all the pith and courage of it.

An Expositor

That is what Pastor Lindsay of Brookline chooses and loves to be. The writer heard him give the seventeenth morning sermon on the parables of Jesus, "The barren Fig-tree." Another long course of morning expositions on biblical characters preceded this one. To see the large church compactly filled, hundreds of students and visitors sitting in grateful silence just to get the sense, meaning and lesson of the parable, without shrieking preannouncement or vaudeville expectation, was a refreshing experience. The worship, the graphic, faithful, close-fitting exposition, the baptism, the Lord's Supper, the hearty hand-shake to the close with minister and deacons, hundreds coming up to participate, all fittingly completed the picture of a gospel church. It was good to be there. Pastor Lindsay is drawing from an inexhaustible well. True, there are "itching ears" and much tickling of them. That there is heart hunger, many an expositor may also prove.

Outstanding Events

A recent event informing and inspirational, was the address of our missionary to Osaka, Japan, Rev. J. A. Foote. Mr. Foote is a Brown and Newton man, and clearly showed his training in his thoroughly intelligent grasp of the entire situation in Japan. But the best feature of all was his ringing appeal for an advance in Japan, and his delineation of the opportunity, and the evident heart-pang of the man because enforced "economy" may jeopardize what has been won by sacrifice and labor. It is good for the churches to hear Missionary Foote—he has a message.

Tremont Temple church has been much quickened and enlarged by a series of evangelistic services which have brought in over a hundred new members. In such special effort Doctor Massee is an awakening and convincing preacher, and resourceful spiritual leader. Always, winning souls is with him a ruling passion and purpose, and a perennial joy. This accounts, in great part, for his enduring freshness and kindling power. With him to preach, and bring and persuade people to a decision, a professional evangelist, with his sometimes elaborated machinery, would be a superfluity or an impediment. Doctor Massee proves that pastoral evangelism is the ideal arrangement.

A Great Rally

It is too late to more than mention the notable missionary rally of the two women's missionary societies held in Tremont Temple on Jan. 21. Everything went off with the usual strength and precision that characterizes all that our Baptist women do when they are not interfered with by the men. They covered the whole New England district, and included in their program not only a full line of missionary information that took in the whole world from center in the cities to circumference on the foreign fields, but added many kindling inspirations in their report of mission strength and extension, and especially in the rolling up of special golden missionary funds by queenly gifts.

All the well-known leaders were present and were heard from and some of our strongest men in kingdom activities were called upon to add a masculine accent to mission energies and enthusiasms. It was voted in every way one of the most successful assemblies that our New England women ever had.

Et Cetera

Doctor Rosselle has been well reenergized by the coming of Rev. David W. Witte of Detroit, whose experience and training gives him unusual equipment for an assistant minister of the First Church, Malden. His enthusiasms have been for evangelizing and education among the young people, and he bids fair perfectly to fit into a fine opportunity in that great church.

First Church, Lynn, has just completed a job of complete renovation inside and outside. They have also rebuilt the shapely tower which went down in a storm a few years ago. That is a good church, where strong ministers and laymen have long wrought together. Pastor Eben F. Francis is six years deep in their confidence and affection, and is one of the best of us.

The removal of Rev. F. W. Peakes from the West Newton church to East Poultny, Vt., after a five years' pastorate, adds the Lincoln Park to the list of pastorless churches. That is one of the choicest sections of Newton, and though in close proximity to some of the strongest churches of other faiths in the state, Lincoln Park offers a challenge to a leader with pluck and initiative.

One of the constantly fruitful fields in suburban Boston, is that of the Blaney Memorial church in Dorchester, where for four years Pastor E. D. Dolloff is the wise and spirited leader. They are always ingathering and growing there, and are kindled by the Christian spirit and devotion of their minister, and beautifully responding to it.

Dr. O. C. S. Wallace of Baltimore gave us the joy of his face on the eighth. Of course it was benedictory. Years of high-minded occupation and interest, a warm, ripe brotherliness that comes from living in the spiritual sunshine these many years, make him stronger and better than ever. His chief errand

To All the Days

BY ROBERT WHITAKER

WHAT if we waited not for special days

To word our love, and wing our gifts of cheer?

What if we kept glad Christmas all the year?

And every morning sang the New Year's praise?

If we but dared to walk uncrowded ways,
Far from the multitude's conforming fear?

To voice, on any day, in any ear
Just for ourselves, our own memorial lays?

How would the money changers cease their cries;

And everywhere the courts of love be cleared:

And word and token would be more endeared,

Gemmed in unscheduled motive and surprise.

There would be joy enough for every day,

If love were given love's unfettered way.

was to heighten the centennial celebration of his old flock at Lowell, the First church. Of course he could do it, and the rest of us got the incidental blessing.

Linfield Trustees Meet

The semi-annual meeting of the board of trustees of Linfield college was held at McMinnville on Wednesday, Jan. 27. Of the thirty-four members, twenty-six were present including State Secretaries A. H. Bailey, W. A. Shanks, J. F. Watson and O. C. Wright; and Pastors C. Oscar Johnson, W. B. Hinson, C. L. Trawin and T. J. Villers. Among the four lawyers present was Honorable O. P. Coshaw, associate justice of the supreme court of Oregon. For the first time since his election, Marshall N. Dana was present. Mr. Dana is one of the number President Coolidge has under consideration for appointment to the United States shipping board. The fact that all these men come such long distances to these meetings at their own expense is evidence of the interest Baptists of the Northwest have in Linfield college.

The reports of the officers indicated that the first semester of the current year maintained the high standards of last year. For a year and a half Linfield college has not had a single case of discipline. The treasurer's report indicated that all bills were paid and that, for the first time, all the expenses of the first semester would be met without drawing on the tuition fees of the second semester. During the half year covered by this report there was a total gain in assets of $8005. The total receipts amounted to $37,679 and the disbursements, to $37,273. The board, as usual, was greatly pleased with our treasurer's report. Since his election Jan. 31, 1917, expert auditors have not found an error in his accounts.

The new members of the faculty have proved acceptable and have entered fully into the spirit of Linfield. Faculty and students are working together in a most effective manner. Life on Linfield's campus is a source of joy to all who participate in it.

Election of Trustees

For several years past there has been some agitation in the Northwest over the method of electing the trustees of Linfield college. This problem for Linfield is made more difficult of solution because four conventions constitute its field rather than one as in the case of most of our colleges. One of these conventions has insisted on directly electing twelve trustees, two others ask the privilege of nominating a certain number and the other apparently is satisfied with the present situation. Under these circumstances the board could not meet the desires of all. Very serious consideration has been given to the matter and in this meeting the board decided to reduce the number from thirty-four to twenty-eight. The president of the college is a member ex-officio. The alumni elect three approved by the board. Nine others are to be elected by the board upon its own nomination and the other fifteen will be elected from nominations made by Idaho, Oregon and Washington conventions—Oregon to have six, each of the Washington conventions three and Idaho three. The conventions will nominate three for each one to be elected. This plan, it is hoped, will prove satisfactory to all concerned.

The board carefully considered the plans laid for the raising of the $500,000 for new buildings. This is now the great task before them. They are enthusiastically lined up for the promotion of this campaign. The next few months will mean much for Linfield college. A united effort will provide the new equipment which is so greatly needed on our campus.

Church News

Dr. Melbourne P. Boynton of the Woodlawn church of Chicago, on Jan. 24, began special meetings with Dr. A. M. Bailey at the First church, Seattle. This series continued through Feb. 7.

During the calendar year of 1925, 209 new members were received by the First church of Portland, Dr. Thomas J. Villers, pastor.

During the two years Rev. E. H. Shanks has been pastor of the First church at Salem, Ore., 267 new members have been received, the net gain being over 200.

During the three years of the pastorate of Rev. W. E. Henry at the First church, Yakima, Wash., 272 members have been added to the church membership, sixty-seven of whom came during the year 1925. This church raised a total of $14,126 for the expenses of 1925, and $4343 for benevolences. During this year the pastor, his assistant, Miss Bessie L. Carmichael, and the women of the church made 2888 calls in connection with the work of the church. The missionary reading contest of this church is proving much more effective than in previous years.

Rev. C. E. Dunham has conducted a two weeks' meeting on his new field at Prosser, Wash., which resulted in twenty-five conversions, six of whom united with the Baptist church.

In December, Rev. J. M. Nelson assisted Pastor A. C. Rickel at Opportunity, Wash. As a result, six were baptized and two received by letter.

At Juliaetta, Idaho, on Dec. 15, Rev. A. E. Janes was ordained to the work of the Baptist ministry. Rev. W. E. Monebeck preached the sermon, Rev. John R. George gave the charge to the candidate and Rev. Edkar Burton offered the ordaining prayer and gave the charge to the church.

Rev. R. B. Shoun at Aberdeen, Wash. had sixteen conversions and five baptisms on Sunday, Jan. 18.

In response to a desire expressed by some of his people, Dr. J. Newton Gars of the First church, Spokane, has printed in booklet form his sermons on "The Foundations of the Church," "The Place of the Church in the Heart of Christ," and "The Contribution of the Church to the World." Copies of these sermons may be had at 20 cents each.

The annual meeting of the First church of Tacoma, Rev. C. Oscar Johnson, pastor, was held on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 13. On this occasion Dr. and Mrs. J. F. Watson and Rev. and Mrs. Frank B. Matthews were the speakers.

A Bit of Fun

"A little nonsense now and then is relished by the best of men." The best of us mix our metaphors occasionally, and thus provoke a pleasant smile. No long since, a speaker in our college chapel thus urged our students: "Be rock in that desert of barrenness, square your shoulders and try to stem the tide. This recalls a similar utterance on another occasion. A splendid new building was being dedicated by an institution which has had a most remarkable growth. A certain brother invited to offer the dedicatory prayer evidently appreciated the honor of so doing: "Lord God, we thank thee for this institution which was conceived in faith, brought forth in prayer and which has been going forward by leaps and bounds—(pause on its knees." After the exercises were past, doubtless many had a good laugh over this utterance, even the president of the institution remarking, "Can't you see it go?"

NEW EDUCATIONAL AND COMMUNITY BUILDING AT ENGLEWOOD

Englewood, Chicago, Celebrates Expansion

MR. W. G. BRIMSON TURNING THE FIRST SHOVELFUL OF DIRT FOR THE NEW CHURCH HOUSE

Englewood, Chicago, in celebration of the completion of the building and improvement project that has occupied several months past. The heart of the project is a new educational and community service building connected with the original house of worship. There is also extensive redecoration and re-furnishing. The cost of the whole project was $220,000.

When Dr. Charles A. Brooks turned from his world-wide service of missionary supervision and promotion, his friends wondered whether he would be able to settle down to regular and prosy pastoral work again. Englewood is his answer. It is one of the most notable pieces of constructive leadership and of church achievement in the history of Chicago Baptists. This celebration comes at the close of two years of pastoral work on the part of Doctor Brooks at Englewood. Dr. Myron W. Haynes, former pastor, and other notable teachers assisted in the program.

This triumph crowns the thirty-second year of service of Mr. W. G. Brimson, superintendent of the Sunday school. The church enrolls over 1600 members and the Sunday school 1340.

Mr. R. E. Akin has been secured as educational director and executive.

The whole budget of the church for the coming year has been fully subscribed, and the outlook glows. Look at the pictures.

The Judgment of Those Without

Some Legends Concerning Baptists

By J. H. RUSHBROOKE

GOODWILL, the organ of the British Council of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches, has in its issue of Jan. 15 an article on Roumania.

The writer refers to the "political and material difficulties under which the Roumanian churches, more than any others, are laboring" and states that in addition there are "internal troubles, especially those aroused by the sects now spreading everywhere, which originally came over from America, especially the Baptists and Adventists." Of the Adventists I know little; but the Baptists I do know, and the reference to them is simply perverse. In more than one country of Europe their critics (disturbed by their energetic preaching and the popular response to it) are trying to fix upon them the stigma of a "foreign religion" or an "American sect." The facts refute the legend. In the smaller Roumania of pre-war days Baptists were few, but the few did not originate from the States. Most of the Baptists in the enlarged Roumania live in territories acquired after the war. During the period of Hungarian rule, German-speaking and Magyar-speaking Baptists had influenced men of the Roumanian race; and when the change of frontiers came about many thousands of Baptists were transferred. The great majority were in organized churches of Roumanian membership and under Roumanian leadership; nor had these people ever seen or heard a Baptist from America. A few Americans of Roumanian descent have explain the success of Protestant propaganda. So far as Baptists are concerned, the explanation fails. Bulgarian Baptist origins are due to German colonists from Southern Russia, to Russian Baptists expelled during the czarist period through the influence of the Orthodox church, and to a spontaneous movement among Bulgarians themselves due to their reading of the New Testament. Some fraternal aid has been furnished by American Baptists, but the driving force of the movement is Bulgarian and its leading preachers are natives.

Other articles reveal conditions curiously at variance with British and American ideas. Of Lithuania, for example, Superintendent Yokubenas tells—with appreciation—that "the clergy of every religious community—including even the Jews—all receive as civil servants the same pay from the state." Again I remark that Baptists are few in the land—Superintendent Yokubenas has perhaps not heard of them—but they are a "religious community"; and the all-inclusive since come over and worked for a short time, but such could be counted on the fingers of one hand. American post-war assistance has been the fraternal help of fellow-believers offered to a definitely native movement, whose autonomy has been carefully respected. The article (by Dechant Pfarrer R. Honigberger) contains otherwise much valuable information, and it is peculiarly interesting as a revelation of the way in which practically all groups except the "sects"—the writer cannot allow to Baptists the name of "church"—value state connection and support.

In the same review Professor Stefan Zankow writes on Bulgaria. Baptists again come under the lash. There are few of them in the land, but evidently they count for more than their mere numbers suggest. (With them are named Congregationalists and Adventists.) The assumption of Professor Zankow is that "exceedingly generous monetary assistance from the United States" and "missionaries (who are even today of exclusively American origin)"

"every" becomes inaccurate through their presence. However few, they are bearing a necessary witness to the fact that the church of Christ is not a department of the state, nor its ministers "civil servants."

Norway is considered by another correspondent, who is warmly appreciative of the Free Churches, including the Baptists. "The relation between the State church and the Free churches is friendly. What the Free churches are missing compared with conditions in England and America is that complete freedom and consideration which the Free churches in those countries enjoy." It is a little surprising that a writer on Poland (who even names the town of Lodz) should apparently know nothing of Baptists, unless a reference to "the agitations of the numerous sects" is intended to cover them.

Goodwill is the organ of a movement in which British Baptists participate, the aim of which is to enlist the churches on behalf of international friendship. There is some risk that the movement may be manipulated in other interests. I was council was formed in Rou-nath the Baptists were simply ignored, n. ave they been subsequently in- r. I earnestly hope that the ten- to use the influence of the Alli- and the columns of its British gan, against them, will be promptly and effectually checked. They cannot be acknowledged as a "church" in some lands where their support is valuable, and gibbeted as a "sect" in others where they are relatively weak.

A British Causerie

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

Our Educational System

January is the month when our chief educationalists meet in conference and discuss matters of vital importance in education. We generally get a shock or two, but this year the shocks have been particularly stunning. The public school system has more than once been seriously challenged on the ground of its ineffectiveness. Doctor Lyttelton had a great fight, when he was headmaster of Eton, to obtain a few reforms. He found himself opposed by a mass of conservatism which lived wholly upon the past and refused to face a new situation. Boys were set to learn subjects for which they had no aptitude. They were compelled to take Latin and Greek, the mere rudiments of which many of them mastered, and nothing beyond. And so with other subjects. This meant a purely superficial education of little use for creative work. Now Professor Armstrong enters the lists against the whole idea of "exams." "Under this examination system," he says, "intelligence is being absolutely sterilized. An 'exam,'" he said, "stresses the memory too much and tends to suppress creative effort." This great authority repeats what many know to be only too true. I know the case of a French boy who was educated in one of our public schools. He spoke his mother tongue beautifully and correctly, yet he failed in the French examination. The boy who took the honors knew the grammar, but could not speak the language. Surely an examination of this kind is a farce. Some of the world's greatest men were failures at school—Gladstone, Darwin, Spencer. They took their own way afterwards and rose to eminence. These and thousands of other examples seem to have been lost upon conservative teachers who are bound to a system which holds them in an iron embrace. When will educationalists learn the first principles of a true education?

The Anglo Catholic Controversy

The controversy in the Church of England between the Anglo Catholic section and the modernists and Evangelicals is assuming grave proportions. The storm center at present is this city of Birmingham, whose bishop, Doctor Barnes, has set himself resolutely against "the magical ideas" associated with the Lord's supper in Anglo Catholic teaching and worship. The bishop frankly labels these as "pagan." Dean Inge associates himself fully with the bishop of Birmingham. It looks as if a battle royal would soon be upon us, and much as religious controversy is to be deplored, it will probably be a good thing to fight this thing out. There is no wavering on the part of the Anglo Catholics. They say unequivocally that they are out to "undo the work of the Reformation and to re-establish the mass in the English church." The Evangelicals are preparing a monster petition to be signed by a million people, Nonconformists included, and presented to government, urging the government not to permit certain alterations in the prayer book. I do not think, however, that Free church people will interfere in the matter. We do not belong to the State church; we have no voice in its councils, we are not welcome to its "altars"; why then should we interfere in its quarrels? We are out for a much bigger thing, namely, complete religious liberty and the autonomy of each church, with no state patronage or interference in the case of any. Certain Protestants are fearful that if this should happen Protestantism would be in deadly danger. Our reply is that if truth is so infirm that it cannot stand on its own feet, without the support of a state made up of all sorts and conditions of men, it had better fall. It can then go to the hospital to be treated. Besides it is overlooked that already the patronage of the state has failed to prevent the very thing that so many dread.

Meanwhile a most illuminating article from the pen of that great scholar, Dr. Carnegie Simpson, appears in the current number of the Review of the Churches. The writer draws a parallel and a contrast between two great movements which have been contemporaneous; namely, the Anglo Catholic movement, and the struggle for freedom in the Scottish church. These movements started within a year of each other—one in 1833, the other in 1834. But how differently they have progressed and how differently they have ended! Both were genuine revivals of religious life; protests against prevailing deadness. But Anglicanism took the sacerdotal way, and the Scottish church the spiritual way. The one stood, as Doctor Simpson puts it, for high clericalism; the other for High churchism. The difference is worthy of note. The keynote of the one was "our Apostolic descent"; that of the other "the crown rights of Christ in his church." Doctor Simpson will not allow the Catholic to call himself a High churchman; he is not that; his main interests are in an office, not in the people of God. The end, says the writer, is that the Scots churchman has achieved liberty; the other has taken liberties. And he terminates by saying that peace in the English church cannot come until truth rather than tradition is loved and followed. The whole article is brilliant, as is everything that Doctor Simpson writes, and it is very timely.

The Dearth of Preachers

A few months ago the Archbishop of Canterbury delivered at the Church Congress a provocative sermon on the decay of preaching in his church. It was this, he alleged, more than anything else, that was emptying the churches; and incidentally preventing desirable men from entering the ministry. Now a similar law comes from France. A piquant article the Figaro deals with the dearth of priests in that country. In the diocese of Amiens there are only 400 priests more than 800 communes; while in the sauvages there are 300 churches with "curés." The reason alleged is a financial one. It is stated that in England as well as in France, well-educated young men prefer one of the settled professions to the hazardous adventure of the ministry. That there is some truth in this I do not doubt, but it is not the whole truth. Ministerial stipends have fallen and are still in many places, a disgrace to the church. It is impossible for a man to maintain himself and to see the books necessary for his work in the beggarly pittance he receives from his congregation. If he be a married man his life and that of his wife, become an agony. The Church of England, trying to mend matters, but it has a long way to go before anything like the old is in sight. Our Baptist people are struggling to some extent their problem on the line by means of the sustentation fund. A new fund is about to be raised for securing retiring allowances for old and disabled men. If the financial question, however, were solved tomorrow, the difficulty would remain. Why is the dearth of Catholic priests in France, and of Protestant ministers in the Church of England? I believe the radical reason is a slackening of the grip of vital religion upon the minds and hearts of thinking men. Three or four decades of disintegrating criticism, of questioning of new discoveries; the new orientation of thought, the emergence of the sciences of psychology, and the clamor for social justice—all these have left their mark upon the minds of men and tend to create disquiet and uncertainty. Added to this is the growth of practical materialism, the increase of the means of pleasure and the like. For my part I believe these things to be but transitory elements in the religious situation. A period of readjustment is bound to come and with it there must be a great spiritual awakening. This will, as it has always done hitherto, give us men money. Under the impulse of a great love for Christ the best men will offer themselves for his service. When a passion possesses the soul men do not place money considerations first.

A Great Book

Since the war ended we have been waiting for the appearance of a great book dealing with the doctrine of divine providence. The war itself raised in the minds of innumerable people the whole question of God's action in human life. Thousands who went to the front returned to their homes with a wrecked faith. The rock upon which they were to pieces was that of the providence of God. How could a good God, it was asked, have permitted that bloody shambles which disfigured Europe during more than four years? Apart from war, however, and chiefly as the result of new views of the universe, vast num-men and women have lost all belief in the old views of the providential order. A new justification of the ways of God to men has become necessary. At last a really great book dealing with the subject has appeared. It is from the pen of Dr. Griffith Jones, principal of the United College, Bradford, and it bears the title, "Providence, Divine and Human." Doctor Jones' previous book "The Atonement through Christ" has passed through ten editions—proof of the hold it has upon thinking people. Doctor Jones accepts the general principle of evolution, and in the most skilful manner he turns it to a Christian account. The point to which he works is stated in summary at the end of the volume in these words: "Only a religion of redemption can save such a world as ours. We can only slough off our sinfulness and return into the ideal pathway from which we have wandered, by entering into the new relation with God whereby we cry, Abba, Father, which has been made possible by the atoning sacrifice of his dear Son on the cross, whereby our sin was condemned in our humanity, and forgiveness was made possible for all sin; and by receiving into our hearts a helpful grace, whereby, through his Spirit he will give us power to become one with God and to rise into newness of life." The ring of that evangelical note is unmistakable, and it permeates the entire volume. The approach to the subject is quite new and modern, but the final conclusion is that which the church of God has always believed and proclaimed. I commend this fine work to all ministers and teachers, especially to those who are seeking to preach the gospel in terms of modern knowledge. The argument is sound and solid and cumulative. To many the book will prove to be a gold mine. It has taken years to write, but it has been worth waiting for.

The Turning Tide

At the annual meetings of the Metropolitan Free Church Federation held at the City Temple a week ago, a new note of optimism was struck by nearly every speaker. The wave of depression which has been so marked during recent years is passing, and the religious tide is beginning to turn. Ever since the war officially ended the churches have been working time. There has been practically no advance. The necessary work of readjustment has been long and often painful. The bishop of London, in a most unwise speech, counselled youth to "shut their feet off." There was no need to urge men and women to further pleasure. The bishop's advice was certainly followed, for dancing has become a mania in the country. But there comes a time when the mind awakens and demands its satisfaction, and we seem to have reached the beginning of that time. It is highly significant that the secular press devotes more space than ever before to the subject of religion. At least the leading newspapers, since October, have opened their columns to special articles and to a voluminous correspondence upon the Christian faith. The articles have varied in value and some of them are worthless; the same is true of the correspondence. But it is a remarkable thing that for these four months the most vital subject of all has been ventilated in the columns of the secular press. It is proof that men are keenly interested in the whole subject. This gives to the church a fresh opportunity for teaching and for evangelism. I never remember a deeper seriousness amongst our leaders than there is at the present time. All feel that the hour is ripe for a new movement. What form it will take is problematical. We can leave that to God, whose Spirit fulfills itself in many ways.

Personalia

Doctor Rushbrooke is busy preparing his presidential address for the Baptist Union. The National Free Church Council has issued its program for the March meetings. Amongst the speakers are Doctor Keller of Zurich and Doctor Adolf Deissmann, the famous German scholar. Mrs. George Cadbury, the first lady president of the National Free Church Council broadcast to all stations on Sunday last. Her message was a most searching and inspiring one. It was a real "preaching of Christ."

Mr. Aubrey meets his council next week to present the final draft of the Baptist Union program, to be held at Leeds in a few weeks' time. Doubtless I shall have a good report to give you of these meetings.

Frank L. Miner

An Appreciation

By W. C. BITTING

In 1912 the Northern Baptist Convention met in Des Moines, Iowa. Mr. William E. Lincoln, of Pittsburgh, had been the treasurer, but declined to continue in service, as his duties had increased beyond his strength.

The nominating committee of the convention that year reported: "On motion of Rev. A. B. Sears it was voted, That the nomination of a treasurer be referred to the executive committee to be reported upon at a later session of the convention."

This action proved to be exceedingly wise. Mr. Frank L. Miner, of Des Moines, was chosen treasurer, and annually since has been unanimously re-elected to serve in that capacity.

When the board of education of the Northern Baptist Convention was formed, it also selected Mr. Miner as the treasurer of that organization. He has served in both these capacities ever since.

No officer of the convention has ever received any compensation whatever. Mr. Miner was glad to give his great business ability to the convention. During fourteen years his interest, fidelity and skill have been enthusiastically given to the convention and the board of education. His personal characteristics of modesty, thoroughness, promptness, unselfish service have shown themselves in his discharge of this high trust. In the aggregate probably more than a million dollars has passed through his hands.

When the convention needed money and had no ability as a corporation to borrow, he generously pledged his own personal credit for money which was sorely needed to serve the convention. Like all officers and members of the executive committee, he attended the sessions of the convention at his own expense. He was present at all meetings of the executive committee between the convention sessions. His quiet manner, inherent gentlemanliness, business ability and unfailing fidelity were always at the service of the convention. As is always the case when men and women together seek to serve our Lord, there grew up between Mr. Miner and those with whom he was associated, strong personal friendships, deep regard, and a sweet fellowship in the work of the kingdom. The spirit of Jesus Christ was in our faithful treasurer, and drew all who knew him and had relations with him into the tender bonds of Christian love.

In his specific work he was accuracy incarnate. With unfailing promptness he attended to his duties. The most rigid compliance with business ethics dominated his daily service. Underneath all of it was his sense of service to Jesus Christ and to his fellowmen. It was this that made these fourteen years of service to our brotherhood essentially religious in its nature, joyful in its performance, and full of the fragrance of fellowship in its attitudes. From intimate and close association with him throughout these fourteen years this incomplete tribute to his worth as a man, to his faithfulness as a denominational servant is most gladly given. He had many qualities of soul and life, which both in their detail and in their grouping made laurels of appreciation to be at home upon his brow, and kind words of love no strangers to his ears, and the memory of his devoted ministry a joy in the hearts of all who knew him.

Burma

By J. HERBERT COPE

When the British government turns over to the people the government of India there is going to be trouble. It will be growing pains. And the Christian church will not escape the same experience. The Indian and Burman Christian is about the same as the Christians in England and America. An example of this difficulty has been seen in Rangoon. The Indian Anglican church was in a very bad location. It ought to move; but it is the dear old church where they have worshiped for years and the fond associations were very tender. The people refused to move. The bishop urged and urged, but to no purpose. He then dismantled the church of things which he controlled. He went in person. There was a fracas and in the mixup some one was knocked down. In true Indian fashion this one rushed into court and accused the bishop of assault and battery. An attempt was made to quash the proceedings at the hearing but with no success. The bishop must now stand public trial for his supposed misdeed. It is a bitter pill for the British officers, almost all of whom are members of the Anglican church. Nor have the Baptists escaped unpleasant experiences. But our organization saves us from any experience like this. For the next few years the missionary must be wise and harmless and be able to meet the aspirations of the national Christians in the spirit of John the Baptist.

As I picked up the missionary monthly sheet the first thing that attracted my eyes was a headline declaring Darrow had had a breakdown and has gone home. He has carried heavy burdens since coming out alone a short time ago and not being willing to shift them to some one else has found them too heavy and he is on his way home. May he soon be sent back once more. He has been the unofficial mission builder for years and is willing at all times to lay aside other duties when it is imperative that he lend advice to others putting up expensive buildings. He has been the only Talain missionary for a number of years and the work among that people has been about as difficult as among the Burmans.

There are a million Indians in Burma, half Hindus and half Mohammedans. This means 7 per cent of the population. And still they come. In one day 3000 sailed from Madras and this in spite of a law imposing a tax on all entering the country. We have but one missionary for all this number, although the Roman Catholics and the Anglican churches are also working for them. But the needs of this community are crying out. Burma is the America of Asia and people are going to continue to pour in where they believe they will find milk and honey.

I attended an association last week where they held an examination in the book of Matthew which had been their Sunday-school study for the year. Most of those taking the examination were unlettered; they had been taught week by week. I was surprised at the knowledge shown by all and especially by those who were unable to read. Prizes were given for the best marks and all received some remembrance.

With the Board of Missionary Cooperation

"Something New Under the Sun"

BY FRANK W. PADEL FORD

EVER since the New World Movement began, and in fact long before that, the task of adjusting the budgets of the various cooperating organizations of the Northern Baptist Convention to each other and fixing the total limit, has been an annual problem. Moreover it has been a problem involving a large amount of work on the part of officials, great patience and wisdom on the part of the finance committee of the convention, and more or less disappointment and heartache on the part of many, since no organization could ever secure enough funds to meet the demands for work which the denomination persisted in making upon it. The apparent necessity of an annual reduction in the budget, owing to our diminishing returns since the glorious year of 1920, has added greatly to our perplexity and our difficulty, at a time when the cost of missionary work has been steadily advancing, and the demands for increased service have been more and more insistent.

It is no secret that this has created an unhappy frame of mind in our boards and societies and conventions. This has frequently been voiced not only in board meetings but in open convention sessions. In many quarters the question has been presented in one form or another, "How can we get a larger share of the missionary dollar?" This is not to be wondered at when one city organization after another faced the rapidly extending horizon of its territory with diminishing funds with which to meet the obligations; when state conventions faced problems, old and new, which could not be met without increased funds; when some schools were face to face with bankruptcy; when the increasing cost of living was making harder the lot of incapacitated ministers; when one national society (the Woman's Home Mission Society) had actually recalled eighty missionaries; when the foreign societies met the necessity of abandoning whole fields of long established work. It is not strange that misgivings, misunderstandings and even jealousies arose; and this not on the part of the secretaries primarily, but of board members, interested contributors and an increasing number of our constituency.

When Doctor Bowler became executive secretary of the Board of Missionary Cooperation, he faced all these facts and saw at once that a new situation must be created and a new morale established before we could hope for better days. Toward the attainment of these ends he set himself assiduously. His plans matured in a large conference of official representatives of the cooperating organizations which he called in Chicago just before the Christmas holidays. It was a propitious time, for the spirit of generosity was in the hearts of all attendants.

There have been secretarial conferences, and conferences of the official representatives before. They began long before the New World Movement. In some of these conferences we studied budgets and tried to make adjustments. But this conference was, by common consent, "something new under the sun." We were called together, not to study our own problems, but to study the problems of the other man and to see ourselves as others see us. It was a most wholesome experience.

For two days we met in groups: representatives of the state convention in one group; those of the cities in another; and those of the national organizations in a third. In these groups "laid all the cards on the table"—if Baptists have used that phrase long enough to understand it; we presented our budgets to one another and explained in detail why we needed the money which we asked. We asked all sorts of questions of each other; we voiced our criticisms; and by actual experience we found that "confession is good for the soul." We discovered how much better and also how much harder, it is to stand to a brother's or a sister's face just what we had thought behind his back if only we say it in the right spirit. Then we tried to bring the budgets of the various members of the group into harmony with each other.

After these most profitable days spent in group meetings, we all came together in one large meeting. Here we spent two more days viewing each other's problems. Representatives of each group, in extended statements, set the work before the whole company, explained their problems and difficulties and answered questions.

When we had spent nearly two weeks in this study we brought our various budgets together to see what the total was. We decided that with this new spirit in our midst, with the rising tide of benevolence and with some new plans, we could hope to raise in the convention year of 1926-1927 the sum of $6,360,000. But we found that our combined budgets considerably exceeded this amount. Then we began our readjustments. So anxious had we become for "a happy issue out of all our troubles" that some of us, despite the pressing burdens upon us, made reductions in our askings—two very large reductions we made—that the total might be brought within the sum of $6,360,000, and that some organizations, which we felt had too small budgets, might have more. In a short time the adjustments were made and the state secretaries, who had the most difficult task of all, had allotted the total sum to the various states. Then we waited to present our results to the finance committee.

The presentation of the budgets to the finance committee has usually been a hectic experience. The representatives of each interest have presented the case and tried to prove to the committee why their full askings must be granted. The experience of the finance committee has been even more hectic, as they have tried to balance the claims, to do justice to each cause, and yet derive a total budget that should be within reasonable limits. The task has usually consumed several days.

When we appeared before the finance committee this time, we simply stated them the results of our work, told them how we had united upon a budget which we believed we could raise and expressed the hope that it might commend itself to them.

Within a very short time they called before them and told us with what satisfaction they had received our report and with what gladness they had unanimously approved our action. Then we had one of those rich moments in life which we never forget, when Mr. Amos Swasey, a member of the finance committee, our "grand old man"—no one ever thinks of Mr. Swasey as old, it is simply our term of honor and clearment—told us with what longing he had waited for this day, with what he had seen its dawn, and with what assurance he looked forward to the large results which this day must usher in. There were tears in his eyes and in our eyes as he spoke. We sang the Doxology and then returned to our several duties, feeling that we had really seen something new under the sun" and that a new day was coming in our kingdom work. Its full significance can be appreciated only by those who shared in the experience, but our entire fellowship will surely realize that we have come to a new day.

It would not do to close this sketch of this wonderful new experience without saying how much we felt we all owed to the wise statesmanship of Doctor Bowler, whose unobtrusive leadership was always evident, and in whose leadership we are having more and more confidence.

Just a word of assurance to the churches. The budget to be allotted to the churches next year, if the convention approves our action, will be the same as this year, $5,360,000. The Board of Missionary Cooperation plans to raise the difference, namely one million dollars, in individual gifts from those who are ready to give more than they care to subscribe through their churches. The preparations are already being made.

Here, There and Everywhere

THIS WEEK INDIANA has the front page reports of evangelism. Pastor J. R. Dick at River Avenue, Indianapolis, received four; C. G. Roadarmel at Central Church, Marion, nine; W. C. Polson, West Etna, nine; I. C. Overman, Shelbyville, eight; Newton E. Blackwell, Morocco, twenty-three; C. H. Thomas, Louisville, eight; S. E. Hamilton, Marshall, eighteen; C. D. Garner, Northampton, forty-four; S. A. Gordon, Liberty (near Greensburg), fifteen; Donald J. Dunkin, Aurora, forty-two; Elmer Street, Terre Haute, H. B. Owens, fifty-six; O. A. Cook, Linton, twenty-two; Joseph Belcher, Columbia City, sixteen.

THANKS ARE DUE TO those pastors who, in response to a request in these columns, have begun to send in the church bulletins and short news items. Will others please to do so? The readers enjoy them.

SAINT PAUL

Station WCOY

THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You) broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, 2320 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

"Tonight we will have a specialist propound ten intelligence tests for our diversion and profit. Here they are:

* * *

I. GRASSHOPPERS: If a man thinks of himself as a mere grasshopper, isn't he likely to act like one? What trait indicates hopper mentality?

* * *

II. MOURNING or MORNING: Does it make any difference? If a man is only sincere, isn't he all right? Isn't pessimism painful? Is optimism a painkiller? Does it matter what a fellow reads?

* * *

III. DYSPEPSIA: Is it a state of grace? Will mental indigestion prevent a man from getting interested in a good book or THE BAPTIST? Why do dyspeptics crave highly seasoned food? Do people with brains have dyspepsia?

* * *

IV. ELASTICITY: What is low visibility? Is feeble mentality a prerequisite to spirituality? Check your mind by the following test: What type of mind have you? Township? County? State? National? Worldwide? What makes you think so? For proof, give three reasons. How apply the scripture: "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he."

* * *

V. ANGER: Is anger a part of your mental equipment? Do you go off half cocked? Why? Do you get holy joy out of roasting others, especially editors? When people get mad at a paper because it says something they don't like, what is the scientific term to describe them? What is the difference between an angry man and a mad woman?

* * *

VI. PREJUDICE: What is prejudice? Would a normal mentality say, "I'll never read that paper again"? Is prejudice due to brain tissue or bone tissue? Would you employ a blind chauffeur? Why not? Give four reasons.

* * *

VII. DIFFERENTIAL: If an auto requires a differential to enable it to turn a corner and still keep both drivewheels pulling, wouldn't a mental differential help some people? What is a one-track mind? Illustrate. What is the difference between a grave and a deep rut?

* * *

VIII. ARTERIO-SCLEROSIS: Which will bring on a stroke of paralysis quicker, hardening of the arteries or "hardening of the heart"? What is the mental defect of the man who gets red in the face and raves about "the continuous appeals for money," in THE BAPTIST? Are stinginess and low mentality first cousins? If not, what is the relation, if any?

* * *

IX. FAITH: If faith is the ability to see things that are hidden from others, why remain blind? THE BAPTIST is a stimulator of faith. Reading it regularly is an evidence of cultured mentality. What is your score here? Please check. Does your brain fiber seek affinity with gray matter or with the blues? If a man sees "red" all the time, what kink has gotten into his cranial cavity?

* * *

X. LOVE: If love is the quintessence of life, why not develop that streak? Testing your mentality by the "love that never fails," what is your rating? What makes you think so? "Love is the doorway through which the human soul passes from selfishness to service and from solitude to kinship with all mankind," and THE BAPTIST builds on that ideal. Does the decay of love presage the perpetual brainstorm?

* * *

"The office boy says that in his opinion the man who subscribes for THE BAPTIST, keeps paid in advance, and then lets Love have the steering wheel shows positive proof of a highly developed mentality. He prays that his tribe may increase and every son be like his father, only more so.

"WCOY now signs off. The proof of a paper is in the reading of it."

FOR LACK OF DATA for a fuller notice, a brief mention of the fact of the death of Mrs. E. A. Hanley appeared in a recent issue of THE BAPTIST. Fuller data are now come to hand, as follows: Sarah Hanley, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Foster, of Indianapolis, Ind., was born in 1874. She was married to Dr.
Mah A. Hanley in 1903. Two daughters came to bless the home, Frances Hanley, now in the University of Redlands, and Ruth Elizabeth, in the first year of high school. Mrs. Hanley had been in failing health for a year and during the last few months the decline was marked. She passed away at nine o'clock in the evening of January 7, 1926.
She is survived by her husband, the two daughters and three sisters. Mrs. Hanley's life has been vitally joined with that of her husband in his pastorates in Cleveland, Ohio, Providence, R. I.,
Manchester, N. Y., and also in the presidency of Franklin college, Franklin, Ind.
In all these fields of labor and the church

MR. HUGO KIRCHHOFFER, director of music for the Temple Church, Los Angeles, has a greater name than THE BAPTIST gave him credit for. We spelled it "Kirchoffer."

UPON THE RESIGNATION of Pastor Walter B. Goodsall at New Britain, Pa., the church passed warm resolutions of regret and esteem, with which THE BAPTIST is in accord, but following a standing rule is unable to print.

PASTOR W. H. ROGERS of First church, Wichita, Kan., is carrying on a class in evangelism to run six weeks.

ENROLMENT OF THE Sunday school at Central church, Bloomfield, N. J., has reached 289.

THE CHURCH of the Redeemer, Yonkers, N. Y., made a net gain in membership last year of thirty-one and has now a total of 538.

AT A BREAKFAST at 11:30 a. m., at Ashland Avenue church, Toledo, O., the guests were invited "to find the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow," with what success is not reported.

AN "OPEN BIBLE CRUSADE" was a feature of the January program at the First church, Bridgewater, Mass.

PASTOR FERDINAND F. PETERSON was greeted by an audience of 287 on a recent Sunday morning at Central Square church, Portland, Me., and 267 in the evening. There were 267 in the Sunday school.

CHURCHES IN IOWA are passing resolutions against any attempt on the part of the general organizations of the denomination to fix standards of ministerial ordination or standing, holding that these are matters entirely within the competence of the local churches.

MORNINGSIDE BAPTIST CHURCH was constituted in Sioux City, Iowa, with forty-eight members.

REV. ARCHIBALD A. CAMERON died Dec. 30, in Ottawa, Can., at the age of eighty-five.

EAST SIDE CHURCH, Pueblo, Colo., has a new edifice nearing completion to cost $40,000.

REV. CHAS. H. UTTLEY has resigned at Boone, Colo.

THIRTY ADDITIONS are reported from Grand Junction, Colo., six from Judson church, Denver, and twelve from Mount Olivet.

AT SHARPSBURG, Pa., seven additions to the church were welcomed on a recent Sunday evening, and ten at Charleroi.

FIRST CHURCH, McKeesport, Pa., has elected and will soon ordain three deacons for life.

DUQUESNE CHURCH, Pa., dedicated its enlarged building Jan. 31.

AT SUNNYSIDE CHURCH, Los Angeles, Rolla Earl Brown, pastor, forty-one new members were received in 1925; current expenses were more than met by contributions; the church's quota for missions was paid, also $79.51 for the golden anniversary fund, and a 15 per cent larger quota approved for this year. A school of missions held six Sunday nights had an average attendance of fifty-seven and a training school. Christian workers had about twenty-five. Additions to the church building have provided more rooms. The Bible school had the largest attendance in its history with an average of over 350.

EVANGELISTS MR. AND MRS. McKEE have closed revival meetings in eleven Canadian churches. The meetings, withstanding severe weather conditions, were well attended. Christians were led to a fuller consecration, and a number of young and old brought to a knowledge of Christ. Mr. and Mrs. McKeeg may be addressed at 159 West Chestnut street, Chicago, Ill.

REV. WALTER A. KING has begun the second year of his second pastorate at the First church, Ashtabula, Ohio, and enjoyed the privilege of burning notes on Sunday morning, Jan. 31, for $400 and one for $5000. Mr. King was pastor of this church from 1904 to 1911, and was called to the second pastorate in January, 1925. Early in the first year of his present work, $1200 was raised to pay the balance of the $5000 and at the 101st anniversary of the church, held Jan. 5, over $2000 was raised to pay off the floating indebtedness, some of which has existed since 1911. Through the generosity of one of the members a gift of $1000 reduced the building fund debt to $8700.

MRS. MARY A. (BANKS) HOWLETT passed away at the home of her son, Frank Howlett, Middleboro, Mass., Jan. 1. Another son, Rev. Hinson Howlett, pastor of the First church, Atlantic City. The services for Mrs. Howlett were conducted by Rev. G. Raymond Chappell, of the Central church, Middleboro, and her son, and held in the parlors of the Winthrop Street church, Taunton. To this church she had brought her children thirty-five years ago, from Canada, after the sudden death of her husband, David Howlett. She was a woman of devout life and strong faith. At the funeral, her son spoke of the simple, but sublime, quality of her trust in God, which enabled her to leave the Canadian home, and bring her young children to New England, where they might enjoy the advantages denied to her. She was 74 on Christmas day. Her son, Frank L. Howlett, is an active member of the Central church, Middleboro; and her daughter, Mrs. Arthur W. Livermore, of the First church, Mansfield, Mass.

AFTER THREE YEARS as pastor of the First church at Oroquieta, Calif., C. Aaron King has accepted a call to the First church at Tulare, Calif., starting March 1. During his ministry at Oroquieta Mr. King witnessed a steady growth which more than doubled the membership of the church. Two years ago a mission Sunday school was organized in Cutler, a neighboring town, which is now supporting and a movement is on foot to secure building property to care for future development. Four months ago an out-station work was launched.

Treading the Winepress, by Ralph Connor. New York: Doran.

A story of the war in Gordon's best vein. All human moods and tenses are incarnated in the subjects who make up the caste. The title of the book indicates that suffering is the chief problem of the story and the glory of suffering merging in the discovery of the larger and richer life. There are characters in the book as stern and unrelenting as the Scotch granite of their native quarries and there are other characters who reveal the finer feelings. It is difficult for an author to beat his best, but Ralph Connor in "Treading the Winepress" almost reached the height of "The Pilot."

Unchanging Quest, by Philip Gibbs. New York: Doran Co. $2 net.

In "Unchanging Quest" Philip Gibbs poses a mammoth canvas and paints with no uncertain strokes the Europe before and after the World War. Obviously it is the story of Katherine, mother of Michael, told by the devoted mother whom she never married—but Katherine, Michael, and all the other stirring English, Russian and German characters that are realistically delineated are but a part of the story of the turmoil of Europe. This work shows that the author was close to the heart of the war and that he has made a study of its social consequences since. When you have read the book, you are not through with it. It has given you food for serious thought—and it will keep you thinking.

—DELLA ROBERTS.

Fanny Crosby's Story of Ninety-four Years, by S. Trevena Jackson. New York: Revell.

A fascinating record of a woman of international fame whose name and influence ran like threads of gold through the revival movements of the last third of the eighteenth century. Her hymns are as much if not more than those of any other hymn-maker to stir the hearts of the souls of men. She was born in 1820 and died Feb. 12, 1925. She lived during the administration of every president; Washington alone excepted. She was educated in a school for the blind in New York where she became a teacher at twenty-three years. The rhythm and spirit of poetry pervaded her whole nature from childhood. She was blind from the sixth week of her life. Her career as a hymnist began when Wm. B. Bradbury set on her for a hymn. She wrote the well-known lyric: "We are going, we are going to a home beyond the skies." That was in 1864. She said the hymn which first won for her a world-wide reputation was prompted by a request of Wm. Howard Doane: "Pass me not, O little Saviour." This memorial volume contains a goodly number of her best hymns. She wrote in all over 8000 hymns; 5000 were published. Fanny Crosby was a member of the Methodist church and her hymns are the outflow of a deep and consecrated spiritual nature.

Four-Wheel Brakes and Other Essays, by Roy L. Smith. New York: Revell. $1.25.

This is in the racy, epigrammatic style of the author who syndicates sentence sermons in the daily press. It is a rare gift that some men possess of concretizing eternal truth in the language of business and of every-day affairs. Jesus followed this method and the crowds followed Jesus. In "Four-Wheel Brakes" Doctor Smith is at his best in moralizing on the frailties, follies and forgetfulness of mankind. Self-control, self-respect, self-expression and self-realization are some of the big individualistic things dealt with under the catchy titles of the essays.

Osman Pasha, by William Jourdan Rapp. New York: The Century Co. pp. 145. $1.25.

Americans of the old school—Gladstonian Americans, let us say, with a vivid memory of the horrors of Armenia—have found it difficult to appreciate the resurgence of Turkey as a sovereign state. Mr. Rapp, in a four-act play, depicts a tragic episode which suggests a possible justification for the strange tolerance of the European powers; his dramatic story shows Moslem Turkey disintegrating, undergoing transformation, through the conquering spirit of Jesus of Nazareth, greatest of all the prophets, and the Hope of the Moslem world. The ambassador of the Turkish Republic one year ago, when he presented his credentials at Paris, recited the passing of the old Ottoman Power in the following remarkable words: "The Ottoman Empire has disappeared, not only geographically and politically, but it no longer exists as a moral entity. In place of it is the Republic of Turkey, a popular Government of the Turkish people, restricted to the ethnical frontiers of Turkey and determined to become in European society an element of peace and a factor striving for international fraternity." Less than a month ago the Turkish Assembly adopted the Gregorian Calendar, and henceforth the birth of Jesus displaces the Hegira of Mahomet in reckoning time. This amazing act of submission to Him to whom an ancient pagan Emperor, dying, cried, "O Galilean, Thou hast conquered!" finds in part its explanation in Mr. Rapp's "Osman Pasha", which is not a "missionary tract", but a dispassionate account of an irresistible spiritual leaven at work in Asia Minor.

American Writers and Compilers of Sacred Music, by Frank J. Metcalf. New York: Abingdon Press. $3.00.

Genealogies, biographies, correspondence, and the publications of authors have been the sources for the compiling of this volume during the past ten years of research by the author who has made the history of sacred music his specialty. Nearly every one of the composers whose work was done before the year 1800 appears in this book chronologically. The fact that Mr. Metcalf owns a library of over 4500 volumes including 1500 hymn books and 150 reference volumes on the writing, composing, and compiling of sacred music, attests to his inexhaustible materials for this work.

How to Enjoy the Bible, by Anthony C. Deane. New York: Doran. 219 pp. $1.25.

The writer is in violent protest against the common attitude of reading the Bible from a sense of duty. His contention is that the right perusal of the reading of the Word can bring an enjoyment in and of itself. We should read through a whole book of the Bible at a sitting, leisurely and unhurriedly in order to realize the soul of the book. It should be read with some thought and knowledge of its background—the purpose and occasion of its composition. For the better exposition of this principle the author treats in more detail the Epistle to the Galatians. He recommends that one should begin, not at the beginning of the Bible, but with the Acts of the Apostles and then the Gospels. He would have us read the Old Testament as biography rather than history, and omit passages that break the thread of the story. "There is nothing more fit to end the pettiness of religious strife than the larger vision, the true sense of values, which the Bible gives."

—HERBERT W. HINES.

The Wooing of Rebekah and Other Bible Plays, by Rosamond Kimball. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

People who are interested in the growing practice of dramatizing religious teaching will appreciate this series of twenty Bible plays from the time of Abraham to the resurrection of Jesus. Not only is each play developed in a form for use just as it is written, but the introduction discusses the principles and method of the religious drama in a luminous fashion.

Church School Improvement, edited by William E. Chalmers. Philadelphia: Judson Press. 170 pp.

The director of Religious Education of the Publication Society has edited a manual of study and work for the workers' conference, or church school conference, in which manual there are ten chapters, each written by a different field worker of the society. The subjects of the ten chapters are the ten factors that Sunday-school workers are coming to agree upon as those of prime importance in a standard church school. This manual of the fundamentals of Sunday-school organization and method will be found useful for study and discussion at the monthly meeting of teachers and officers. The chapters are of varying worth, those on "Worship in the Church School" by Morgan L. Williams, and "Finance and Stewardship" by Ben T. Leonard being of particular competency.

—HERBERT W. HINES.

Seven Professions and the Teaching of Jesus, by Matthew Hale Wilson. Philadelphia: Westminster Press. $1.50 net.

The general thesis is that as the physician, the lawyer, the clergyman, the banker, the editor and the teacher have developed a professional code of ethics which is essentially conformed or conformable to the teachings and ideals of Christianity, and have thereby become Christian professions; so the pursuit of business, considered as the administration of the economic life of the community must develop for itself a similar code of ethics, and must become a Christian profession. Chapter VII, which develops the theory of "The New Profession" of business, is worthy to become a classic. The book ought to be in the study of every pastor and on the desk of every business man, so that these two classes may learn to think of the subject in common terms.

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for Feb. 28

JESUS TEACHES RESPECT FOR LAW
Temperance Lesson

Lesson Text: Matt. 22:15-22. Golden Text: Matt. 5:17

This lesson text does not teach respect for law so much as it teaches respect for honesty. The question of the Pharisees was inspired by the desire to ensnare Jesus in his answer. It was a little plot to make Jesus out to be a traitor to Rome if he answered the question in the negative, and if he answered the question in the affirmative it would be evidence that he was untrue to his own country and people. There was no honest word in the question, "Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar, or not?" In his answer to the question Jesus did not intend to teach respect for law. It was his aim to teach his interrogators a lesson in plain honesty and at the same time to rebuke their poorly concealed hypocrisy.

The Question

It would be an interesting and profitable study to go through the gospels with a view to collecting and classifying the many questions put to Jesus. Never having made the study, I have no idea how many questions were put to our Lord during his earthly ministry. But memory registers quite a number. There were questions asked by sympathetic friends and questions like this one shot at him by designing enemies. His disciples asked him about a good many things. But there was really no question put to him that has a direct bearing upon the temperance situation today in America. The eighteenth amendment and the Volstead act are wholly modern and American, and must be defended upon their intrinsic merits and good results and not upon categorical Bible statements. Bible principles may be applied with telling effect to modern questions but not Bible texts. The writers of the Bible did not anticipate the eighteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States.

The Answer

The answer of Jesus to nearly all the questions put to him reveal a wonderful knowledge of human nature and express an uncommon measure of common sense. Jesus seldom gave categorical answers to questions. In almost every case he showed that the question contained its own answer if the one asking the question would only be honest and think the thing through. This question illustrates the point as well as any other question. The current coin with Caesar's image on it circulating among the Jews in their own country was the answer to their question. Tribute to Rome was paid in money of Roman mintage. Therefore as long as that coin was current in Palestine as legal tender the question of paying tribute to Rome was settled. The Palestinian Jew might not like the foreign coin but that was no excuse for not paying tribute to Caesar. So with the Volstead act. It is the law of the land and ought to be obeyed.

THE FIRST CHURCH, Centralia, Wash., John G. Grace is closing his first year's work. A new church home built of brick under the leadership of Rev. Edgar Burton, has been paid for. Previously to the conducting of revival services by Rev. John M. Currie of Grose, Mass., the pastor had received 1/2 members into the church by baptism, letter and previous experience. With the coming of Mr. Currie renewed efforts resulted in the decision of seven-ty-three to live the Christian life.

VANGELIST EDWIN S. STUCKER, of Ottawa, Kan., will lead a two week's revival campaign at the First church, Washington, Iowa, beginning Feb. 14. He has dates following this meeting. Rev. D. Kern is pastor at Washington. CROWDS OF HUNGRY, lonely, discouraged are coming to Immanuel church, Chicago, every day at two o'clock for lunch. They are incompetents for the most part. It may be that they are worthy, but they are hungry. Many of them walk three miles and stand in cold waiting for the doors to open. The number of good looking, intelligent among these who have met with fortune is surprising.

Obituary

Mrs. Mary F. Skinner, widow of Deacon A. Skinner, for many years members of the First Baptist church of Bridgeport, Conn., passed away Nov. 14, 1925, of pneumonia and heart failure. Mrs. Skinner was one of devotion to her Lord and faithful service in his work. A large circle of loving friends inside the church and outside her and mourn her loss. Possessed of a mild sunny disposition and many amiable qualities, she endeared herself to all who knew her. She was much interested in the work of missions and in her will left $500 to The American Baptist Foreign Mission Society and also $500 to the American Baptist Home Mission Society.

The Saving Sense

A man of the world had slipped and fallen on the icy sidewalk. A deacon came along and remarked solemnly, "The wicked standeth in a slippery place."

"I see that they do, but I can't," replied the fallen man.—The Continent.

"I would not for the world cast any reflections on your ability as a cook, my dear," said the young husband, "nor on your ability to read—so would you mind bringing me the cook book and letting me see what it says. I am positive that this er-er concoction must be the fault of a misprint in the book."

An old story is going the rounds. A minister was caught in a thunder shower on the way to church and got dripping wet. He sat in an unheated ante-room, trying to dry off a little before he appeared before his congregation. An old deacon found him there.

"I'm hardly a fit object to stand up before the people, am I, Brother Brown?" he said.

"Oh, I'd go ahead in," said Deacon Brown. "You'll be dry enough when you get in the pulpit."

"A caterpillar," defined a small boy, "is an upholstered worm"—overstuffed at that.

Jimmy: "You look worried, old man. What's the matter?"

Charlie: "I called on Sylvia last night, and her mother met me in the hall and demanded my intentions."

Jimmy: "I say! That must have been embarrassing!"

Charlie: "Yes; but that wasn't the moths and butterflies reproduced, and the seasons ran, and Nature conducted herself; and so from an old book I had revamped and made personal the telling of Santine's "Picciola," the history of a flower, the darling of the exiled Italian count of Charney, who, through his barred window, watched its growth from a faint hint of green to an exquisite bloomful maturity between the cobblestones of his prison yard.

I had read one page of my paper when my teacher stopped me and called in the superintendent from his office to hear me. Suddenly I realized that when I was being asked to go back to the beginning and read my paper again, something was happening that never had happened in our school before. There was a reason. My father never lifted his head higher when he tried to tell an audience his conception of the uttermost glory of God, than I lifted mine when I went at the job of telling the four assembled years of the Wabash high school and the superintendent, the principal and the assistant, about the exiled count and the flower that was his only interest in life.

When I had finished my paper, I slowly swept that entire assembly with one long look; and in that hour I realized that I had something in my heart, something in my fingers, something in my brain that, through the help of my father, would bring to me lovelier dresses and fancier shoes, and a finer method of conveyance than any of the other girls had or would possess.

And—a wilder vision than that—I might be able to bring to others beauty that I had learned for myself; I might teach to others what I had been taught of persistence, patience, and sane, economical marching straight ahead, with my head high, as my father's always had been, toward any goal I sought. I would reach my goal through the satisfaction of a something in my soul that would make things possible to me through my own effort.

worst. Just as the old lady finished speaking Sylvia called over the banisters, "Mother, that isn't the one!"

A cheeky person asked a bishop who possessed a gift of repartee, "Can you tell me, my lord, the way to heaven?" "Certainly," was the bishop's instant reply, "turn to the right and keep straight on."—Christian Register.

News Notes

During the last three months of 1925, Dr. James Whitcomb Brougner visited thirty-one centers in twelve eastern states. In these meetings 1000 churches were represented and the aggregate attendance was 35,000. During the same period forty-nine every-member-plan conferences were held, under the general direction of Secretary Bowler, besides many local conferences, five pastors' institutes, and the work of deputation speakers in fifteen states.

According to a report just received at the headquarters of the Foreign Mission society from the mission in South India, 6700 converts were baptized on profession of faith in Jesus Christ on that field during the calendar year 1925. This compares with 5725 for the year 1924 and 3617 for the year 1923. This is the largest number ever reported in a single year in the history of the mission with the exception of the year 1878, when the great ingathering took place under the ministry of Dr. John E. Clough.

At the last meeting of the administrative committee of the Northern Baptist Convention it was voted on motion of Mrs. C. D. Eulette that a committee be appointed "to consider the findings and resolutions adopted by the interdenominational student conference at Evanston, Ill., Dec. 29 to Jan. 1, and to make recommendations: concerning the significance which the idealism and genuine concern over the church's responsibility for bettering world conditions there exhibited may have for the efforts which we, as a denomination, are making for extending the kingdom of God through individual, social, industrial and educational movements for evangelism throughout the world."

Rev. S. F. Bawden, missionary at Kavali, has a full share of human experience in dealing with the natives in the industrial and reformatory settlements. A recent case was that of a boy who wanted to run a motor car. Mr. Bawden tells the story: "Monday morning I was busy in the monthly meeting of our Kavali Field association when Miss Holman and Miss Ferguson had to go to the train, so I let him drive them over. The next I knew the car was wrecked and the engine still racing, which the boy did not have sense enough to stop. I hurried over and found that he had taken a narrow path between the trees faster than I had authorized, and at the last minute a woman appeared in his path and he lost his head, and bent the left mudguard, radius rod and the front axle. Nothing very serious, as we got things all straightened up again yesterday. But the serious thing was that he had disobeyed my instructions and had tried running in high without knowing surely how to stop, hence the smash. I was very thankful he had not run over anybody, for I should have been responsible, of course."

Folks, Facts and Opinion

Evidences of primitive man in Egypt are among the most interesting and significant things brought back to the University of Chicago by the university's famous Egyptologist, Dr. James Henry Breasted. They consist in part of a thousand pieces of flint, chipped by the hand of prehistoric man, which have recently been classified for the department of anthropology and been found to date back at least to the paleolithic era from 50,000 to 100,000 years ago.

For the last two years the Baptists of Massachusetts have held a three-day Bible and missionary conference in Cambridge with remarkable success, both in regard to numbers and the high quality of the addresses and conferences. One difficulty in these conferences has been that of securing representatives from the outlying sections of the state. This year instead of holding a conference for the whole state the Massachusetts Baptist Convention has arranged a series of one-day Bible and missionary conferences that will cover the entire state.

"Shoot first, investigate afterwards," is a motto not merely for policemen in emergencies, but also it would seem for excited heresy hunters. One Baptist editor with ready valor, pledges his editorial voice "in the struggle against modernism, which is the parent of scepticism, immorality, anarchy and religious bolshevism." What then is this foe which is to be resisted as the mother of several undesirable kinds of progeny? The best authoritative definition available is that it is the use of the scientific method in investigating the facts of religion. And some people recognize a divine call to fight it first and possibly to discover afterwards what it is.

"The surplus wealth for the common good," is a slogan of the British Labor party which is appropriated by the Methodist Federation for Social Service. To this end the official bulletin of that church organization proposes the nationalization of railroads and coal. It reasons this way: "The transportation crisis precipitated by the war made necessary the temporary government operation of the railroads. Recurring coal crises of which the present anthracite situation is an acute example force to the front consideration of the possible coming necessity of nationalizing coal. Many even among the more conservative students of public policy believe that the time is not far away when the government will have to take over these facilities permanently. To those who think of the instruments of production and distribution as means of human service, their collective ownership seems appropriate and desirable."

Road building to the amount of $1,000,000,000 a year is a note of the swift material change now going on in the United States. On nearly 3,000,000 miles of highways 21,000,000 motor vehicles are flying back and forth. Presently one can drive from Alaska to Patagonia, crossing the Panama canal on new bridges already projected. Before the close of the year 100,000 busses, most of the de luxe type, will be carrying millions of passengers.

European armies have been invading America since the beginning of the sixteenth century. One of the latest invasions is that of the corn-borer. Against this enemy American science has set up a curious defense—the Habracon Brevricornis, a little parasite which stings the borer, lays its eggs and hatches its brood in the wound it has made and thus insures the sucking of the life out of the borer. The University of Illinois is breeding these little defenders of the country by wholesale and distributing them in different parts of the corn belt.

In Atlanta, Boston and Pittsburgh business men are forming clubs and giving money and spare time to the task of getting other business and professional men to join churches. Atlanta is the home of a real estate operator, Martin Thrower, who is president of the Men's Evangelistic Clubs of America. In that city teams of men have been formed, each consisting of one expert and one beginner, who go out, after the manner of people who secure gifts of money. In Pittsburgh Protestants have inaugurated what they call retreats, which are held after the manner of Catholic retreats.

"Birds of a feather" will of course follow their natural preference as may be gathered from a comment by the American Israelite on a decision of the Argentine government to restrict the immigration of Nordics on the ground that they are "undesirable." It says: "A swarthy mass of people from the Argentine, Latins, inferior Latins, challenge the Nordics. Argentine, too, has studied the immigration problems. Argentine, too, desires to admit only the best. Argentine desires to exclude the unfit, the inferior races, and Argentine has decided to exclude the Nordics. Italian, Spanish and French immigrants are to be welcomed. They represent the desirable races, who will produce superb citizens, while the Germans and English, the Nordic races are to be excluded. The worm has turned. No longer are the Nordics the chosen people. In Argentine the Latins have usurped their places. All of which proves that the superior race in every country is the race which can marshal the most votes. Not quality, but quantity is the criterion."

Senate bill 291 to provide for a federal department of education, introduced last December by Senator Curtis, is recommended and urged by the National Education Association. It proposes not a centralized control of the educational system of the country, but an assembling of the several national agencies engaged in one way or another with the subject of education, and to constitute of them so assembled a department of research and information for the benefit of the school administrations in all of the states.

Were witches burned in New England? A paragraph whose contents were taken from the Southern Baptist Handbook so stated in THE BAPTIST of Jan. 16, page 1525. But Rev. D. L. Esterline challenges the statement thus: "Sufficient investigation some time since showed me that all competent historical students agree that no witch was ever 'burned' in New England, though nineteen were hanged at Salem. I recognize that the statement is in a quotation, but as many of your readers will fail to recognize that it is not given on the authority of THE BAPTIST, and as THE BAPTIST is responsible for using the quotation, it seems to me that you will naturally wish to correct this repetition of an old, old slander as soon as you satisfy yourselves of its falsity."

Among various accounts of the fascist movement the Baptist Message of Louisiana offers this one: "The fascist movement in Italy is nothing more nor less than the Roman Catholic church in arms. It has not attempted to overthrow the national government of Italy as yet because the leaders of the movement realize the time is not opportune and that it would be disastrous to their cause to do so, but they have gone far enough with their plans to show beyond a doubt that the 'little papa on the Tiber' is the real head of fascism. The pope had long been watching for an opportunity to regain the temporal power in that country which he lost fifty years before. Fascism offered this opportunity. The communists were dealt with forthwith and order was restored in a short time. Had the pope been at the head of this movement, fascism would have died when the emergency was past. However, after the restoration of order and the communists had been routed, the fascists turned their attention to the Masons, Protestants and Baptists of Italy and began a persecution the like of which the Roman Catholic had not sponsored since the days of the Inquisition. Moreover, they have made it dangerous for any man to speak against the Catholic church in Italy."

"I am only a layman, but I listen and think," writes a reader from Maine. And here is one of the results of his thinking: "We saw in yours of Jan. 31, the announcement made at Seattle that it is purposed to define a Baptist church. Please let that definition die 'aborning'. We have trouble enough in the world without deliberately making more. No man living today can see the end of what might happen if that definition should be accepted."

A scientifically trained man, Mr. Simon Benson, with degrees in philosophy, arts, and science, has been added to the staff of the department of physical culture and athletics at the University of Chicago. The new trainer has been especially interested in the study of the action of ultra-violet rays on the human body, and his treatment of the athletes of the University of Chicago will include the use of the ultra-violet ray equipment in Bartlett gymnasium, the results of which will be reported to the chemistry department.

Pres. Clifton D. Gray of Bates college, chairman of the social service committee of the Northern Baptist Convention, has called a meeting of the committee to be held in the Immanuel Building, 2328 South Michigan boulevard, Chicago, Wednesday, March 3, 1926, at 11 a. m. in order that there may be full conference concerning the future program of the committee, a general invitation is given to all Baptist pastors, laymen and women, who are able to attend, to be present throughout the sessions and participate in the proceedings. Also, the committee would welcome letters from any who cannot attend, giving such information or suggestions as the writers may be able to offer as the basis for a definite and adequate denominational policy for the social expression of our Christian and Baptist faith. Communication concerning the meeting with the secretary, U. M. McGuire, 2328 South Michigan boulevard, Chicago.

According to official information received the date of the Washington Convention is fixed May 25-30, 1926. Mr. Grimson, the manager of transportation, advised by the manager of the Western Passenger Association that it is impossible to put summer tickets from the Pacific coast to the East on sale earlier than May 22, on account of inability to arrange for the equipment necessary for the summer travel. They will need to gather the sleepers and rolling stock. There are not to be any special rates to conventions. There were none last year. These rates, when they existed, did not serve as cheap transportation as the summer rates in existence last year. It will be possible for delegates from the Pacific coast to leave on the morning of May 22. This will allow seventy-two hours of travel to reach Washington on the morning of May 25. Probably those from the extreme Pacific coast could not reach Washington on the morning of May 25, but delegates from states east of the coast certainly could reach Washington by that date.

Capital is leaving France. Capital is leaving England. Capital is leaving the United States. Capital has left or is leaving Germany. It is emigrating in a steady stream in hundreds of millions of dollars. Where is it going? It is going into foreign countries wherever it can find larger profit and lower taxes. What does it leave behind it in the homeland? It leaves the people subject to penury and unemployment and with the burden of the war debts to carry. Owing to unexampled plenty the people of the United States, excepting the farmers and possibly the miners, have not felt the grind of these results. In other lands they feel it. America will feel it later.

Now it is reported that German missionary societies have recovered 80 per cent of their pre-war strength, and it is estimated that by 1927 they can realize their old position in world mission support in foreign lands. American Lutherans have to date contributed $567,400 to the support of these German foreign missions. Their budget is compelled now to carry no more than $75,000 a year. It is an unfinished task, but likely to conclude, so far as American support is needed, by another year. The salvage consists of 500 stations, 200 missionaries of German birth, 1500 native workers, very large populations and very valuable properties.

Hearts Are Opened When People Sing

Preaching is always most successful when supported by soulful Gospel singing. The message of Gospel singing is still needed to create and deepen a religious spirit and to heighten the message of the hour. Religion has always flourished best when men have sung most.

My Church is

is a combination of the greatest standard hymns of the Christian Church and also of carefully selected gospel songs.

While less cumbersome than the larger and heavier volumes, its 402 numbers furnish sufficient scope to meet adequately every requirement of divine worship.

One of the nationally known churches in Chicago whose services are broadcast every Sunday has just placed a very large order for The New Church Hymnal. The music committee was unanimous in choosing this book.

From a mechanical standpoint "The New Church Hymnal" is a splendid illustration of the modern science of bookmaking.

Price $55.00 per hundred.

The Ideal General Purpose Hymnal

A subscriber in Iowa Falls, being stirred by mention of cancer fakes, calls attention to offers to preachers of various kinds of merchandise to be promoted by questionable methods, saying, "I believe a lot of our preachers bite on all this stuff." Maybe they do. Their theology may be infallible, but they are still gullible.

Prof. James Hayden Tufts, head of the department of philosophy at the University of Chicago, who for three years has been vice-president and dean of the faculties, has resigned from these positions and will withdraw April 1 from the general administrative work of the university to devote himself to the work of his department and to the writing and revision of books in his special field of scholarship.

The United States has received an invitation to take part in the League of Nations Passport Conference, to be held at Geneva on May 12. In a resolution passed by the assembly of the league it is stated that the conference is for the purpose of "at least taking a step toward the abolition to the widest extent possible of the passport system, and to mitigate considerably the disadvantages of the expense which the system entails."

To every registered delegate to the Birmingham Convention of the International Council of Religious Education to be held April 12-19, there will be sent a certificate entitling the registrant and all members of his family to purchase a round-trip ticket to Birmingham and return at the reduction of 25 per cent from the regular round-trip ticket. This is commonly called the fare and one half rate. The tickets can be purchased at any time between April 7 to 13 in most parts of the United States and Canada, the final return limit being April 26, 1926. From Colorado, (except Julesburg) Montana, New Mexico, Utah and Wyoming, the dates of sale are April 6-12 inclusive and the final return limit is April 27. From Arizona, British Columbia, California, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon and Washington, the dates of sale are April 2-8 inclusive, final return limit May 1.

Again the schemes of modernism are discovered and exposed. The Baptist church at Eldora, Iowa, declares itself convinced "that the creating of so-called 'committees on ordination and ministerial standing' in our state Baptist convention and our various Baptist associations, is a long step towards the final abolishment of the God-given independence of our local Baptist churches, and will be a further step toward the setting up of a super-ecclesiastical machine with more or less arbitrary power over the local churches, a scheme of destructive modernism, un-scriptural, and therefore un-Baptistic, and that their further continuance will only cause further division and confusion in the ranks of our denomination." This would seem to indicate another simple and easy test by which to detect a modernist, namely, he is a Baptist who favors an associational committee on ordination.

Score one for toleration in Evansville, Ind. Clarence Darrow, noted agnostic, was announced to lecture in that enterprising city. Immediately church people set about preventing his appearance and succeeded. But note the gentleness of their procedure. The most violent threat made against him was that of a minister who threatened, in case of Mr. Darrow's coming, to challenge him to a debate.

The sultanate of Nejd, the new power on the Arabic peninsula, which suppressed the Hashimite kingdom in Hedjas, is eager to join the League of Nations. Sultan Ibn Saud, ruler of Nejd, has designated Sheik Hafez Wehbeh to proceed to Paris and other European capitals for the purpose of representing him in paving the way for Nejd's entry into the League of Nations.

Mr. Spurgeon's position on conditions of church fellowship continues to receive attention. A mediating interpretation is that suggested in a note from Prof. E. B. Pollard of Crozer Theological Seminary. He thinks that Mr. Spurgeon's practice was neither so "close" nor so "open" as some suppose, and he tells this story: "In the late eighties a student came from London to an American Baptist Theological Seminary. He said he had been admitted as a member of Spurgeon's church, but had never been immersed, coming to America shortly after being received. When asked how it was he had not been baptized, he replied that not feeling it to be his duty to be immersed, Mr. Spurgeon received him, with the expressed thought that further teaching would bring him to express his faith in baptism. He was later immersed in an American Baptist church, and was still later ordained to the ministry, serving a number of American Baptist churches as pastor."

The University of Chicago board of trustees-announces the election of Prof. Frederic C. Woodward, of the law school, to be vice-president of the university, the appointment to begin on April 1.

The perpetuity of Winona Lake as a Christian institution has been assured by the action of the board of directors in amending the constitution and by laws of Winona assembly and Bible conference and providing for the creation of a board of voting trustees. Seventy per cent of the 20,000 shares of stock is now in the hands of the board of voting trustees, which is a self-perpetuating body. This board now controls all of the property of Winona assembly of voting trustees and Bible conference, valued at $300,000.

Prof. S. E. Dibble of Carnegie Institute of Technology, president of the American Society of Heating and Ventilating Engineers, believes that it is no more improbable to broadcast heat waves than it was to broadcast sound waves. The problem of sending heat to consumers via the air is now the problem of research men and laboratory workers, who must "discover instruments to control heat waves, especially a detector which will pick them up and hold and amplify them," says Professor Dibble, adding "the day is not far off, in my opinion, when we will see huge centralized heating plants broadcasting heat to homes, industries and office buildings."

The American Eugenics Society, Inc. announces through its committee on co-operation with clergymen the competition for the best sermon preached in America on the subject of eugenics. This competition is open to any minister, priest, rabbi or student in a theological seminary of any denomination. The sermon must be preached before July 1, 1926, and the awards will be made on Oct. 1, 1926. Prizes of $500 for the best $300 for the second, and $200 for the third best sermon are the rewards. Printed rules, announcement and other information will be mailed on application to the American Eugenics Society, 185 Church street, New Haven, Conn.

The Associated Press reports that "accepting the ultimatum of the Mexican government, which gave them twenty-four hours to leave, Rev. J. L. Phillips, president of the People's Institute of Piedras Negras, across the Rio Grande and seven teachers of the college left today. The school was established in 1912 and has been supported by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. This is believed the first ousting of Protestants. The decree in Mexico which forbids foreign Catholic priest from presiding over churches in the republic, is being extended to churches and educational institutions of all denominations, as is the decree which provides that pastors and educational workers must be married." One observation seems to cover the case: The rest of us can stand this kind of thing in Mexico can.

The Function of the Northern Convention

THE Northern Baptist Convention is a clearing house for all the activities of the various boards, societies and state conventions cooperating on the basis of a unified program through this general agency. The unit of cooperation is called the Board of Cooperation. This board and its administrative committee work out all the cooperative plans of the convention in council with representatives of the different organizations participating in the unified program. The Northern Baptist Convention is therefore a great Christian business organization designed to prevent overlapping of effort and at the same time to promote unity and efficiency. In this organized attempt at doing the business of the kingdom according to the principle of cooperation northern Baptists have found their fellowship strengthened and enriched. The inspiration of concrete tasks undertaken and definite objectives set up, together with the unified effort to complete the tasks and realize the objectives, has given spiritual tone and enthusiasm to the denomination.

In building the structure of the convention great care was exercised by the original framers of the constitution and by-laws to avoid anything that might be construed to mean that the convention could ever act for the local church in any matter that violates the principle of local church autonomy. The membership of the convention was deliberately defined to include any Baptist church in the United States cooperating in the financial support of at least one of the cooperating organizations. It was felt that this was as far as the convention could go in limiting the basis of representation without invading the independence of the local church. The rights and responsibilities of the local church were left intact. The convention became a clearing house for the missionary, educational and philanthropic work carried on by the fifty-seven varieties of organization in the denomination cooperating in a unified program without interfering with the autonomy of the ten thousand local churches which constitute the membership of the convention.

It is a well-established principle with Baptists that the local church is supreme under Christ in the realm of ecclesiastical authority. The local church recognizes no higher power than itself in the form of council, association or convention. Councils may be advisory, associations may be fraternal and conventions may be cooperative, but the local church is independent and free from all control on the part of any other body. It determines its own constitution, selects its own covenant, adopts its own articles of faith, selects its own titles, decides upon its own program, calls its own pastor, builds its own meeting house, accepts its own budget and takes care of its own affairs. If the local church joins an association or cooperates in a convention it does so voluntarily and on the express understanding that its autonomy will be respected and that no attempt will be made by the association or the convention to violate that principle. Of course, should the local church so far depart from sympathy with the structure and aims of the association or of the convention to which it belongs as to create a breach of good faith, then the association or the convention might reasonably withdraw the hand of fellowship from such a church, or better, the church might withdraw from a fellowship with which it was no longer in harmony. But that does not affect the autonomy of the local church. A Baptist church may live and thrive and call itself a Baptist church without affiliation or cooperation with any other body. We have never heard of such a church; but we see no good reason why such a church might not live and thrive apart from the larger fellowship. This, to be sure, would be autonomy carried to foolish extremes. It is cited here simply to emphasize the right of the local church to determine its own affairs.

The Northern Convention exists only as a voluntary organization on the basis of respecting the autonomy of the local churches which cooperate in the general work of the denomination through this agency. When it invades the right of local churches to be autonomous and attempts to hand down a rule which would bind all of the churches cooperating in the fellowship of the Northern Convention to follow a certain procedure in receiving members, it invades the province of the local church and attempts to legislate in matters over which it has no rightful authority. Such a rule is an inversion of Baptist practice. The unvarying custom of Baptist churches has always been local church initiative in organization, in membership and in the adoption of such articles of faith and conduct as would harmonize in general with the structure of Baptist churches everywhere. This freedom leaves room for considerable variation, but strange as it may seem, it also makes for spiritual uniformity among the churches. As an illustration of uniformity, the subjects of baptism are believers only and the form of baptism is immersion only in all the Baptist churches of the world. And this without any legislation outside of each local church.

Why then should northern Baptists depart from a principle which is recognized and respected by their brethren in every other part of the world? All Baptist history and precedent register a protest against such a departure. The remarkable growth of the Baptists and their loyal adherence to the spiritual democracy of Baptist polity argue strongly for a continuance and strengthening of local church initiative. There will always be a demand for well-organized cooperation among the churches in order that the churches may function efficiently together in kingdom service. But when cooperation ceases to be a spiritual fellowship in the furtherance of the gospel and becomes a congress for legislation or a court of law or an ecclesiastical council handing down statutes and decisions and creeds to the local church, disintegration is bound to follow. We believe the genius of Baptist churches which expresses itself in local church autonomy with voluntary association of churches on the basis of cooperation is all that is needed to meet and solve every problem that may arise in our common fellowship.

When Wealth Becomes Illth

THE legal right of those who give for the support of philanthropic agencies to share in the control of their policies is indubitable. The legal right of taxpayers to control all agencies supported by public taxes is unquestioned. The supporters of religious and missionary agencies have the right to regulate their activities and program. Taxpayers may control the subjects taught in the schools. Therefore they may prohibit the teaching of the laws of gravity, sex hygiene or the theory of the evolutionary unfolding of life. But what is legally right and what is morally right are not always the same. To bind all life by material control is sheer folly. It is too easy for mammon to take a strange hold. The domination of the spiritual by the material is an age-lasting menace. In the very nature of life it will always be so.

Money largely controlled the Jewish church of Jesus' day. High priests bought the sacred office and farmed out the concessions for filthy lucre. Bribery, simony, graft and extortion are mild words to describe their priestly activities. Jesus refused to regulate his message or his ministry by the canons of a religious organization in which the mammon of unrighteousness had so much power. Neither its age, nationality or orthodoxy made any appeal to him who said, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." He put his missionaries and gospelers under obligation to no moneybags but bade them trust God for daily bread and life's necessities. He himself preferred to be homeless and without a pillow when the night fell rather than compromise his spiritual liberty. And he taught that the disciple was not above his teacher.

The autocratic spirit of religious organizations does not assert itself until wealth increases and the vested interests of the church and the vested wealth of society have common grounds to conserve. The testimony of history shows a preponderance of evidence that as wealth increased and controlled, spiritual freedom and prophetic vision decayed. Money control usually meant priestly conservatism strangling prophetic liberty. The priestly class has always been the conservator of money built social and political systems. The prophet of true righteousness has always been regarded as an enemy by both priests and mammon worshippers. It is easier to crucify a prophet than to correct a crystalized custom, especially when it touches the sanctity of property.

History shows clearly that mammon-controlled institutions are not easily reformed or corrected from within. Prophets of a new order cannot expect much support from intrenched material interests. Compromises seldom prove constructive. Heralds of progress have always had to walk the way of poverty, suffering and cross-bearing. Progress must justify itself by its worthfulness.

Whenever any organization arrives at the place where money has unquestioned control, the sentence of death is on it. Richness of life, noble and unselfish ideals and sacrificial service exhibited in living personalities alone can emancipate humanity. The new birth from above always has a spiritual impulsion. God or gold are always before us. Every living soul must make his choice. Baptists have usually been of the prophetic type of mind and life. They have never boasted wealth or authority. They have never sought to impose their will on any living soul. One is their Master, and any moneybags who seeks to impose any yoke on them which is not in harmony with the free spirit of Christ must forever be anathema to them.

Ishmael on the Baptists

THAT Ishmael of the magazine family, known as the American Mercury, in the February number contains an article on "The Baptists" by a newspaper man called James D. Bernard. Evidently Mr. Bernard spent most of his time in the South getting material for the article. He tells the truth in spots, but large areas of his article bear the finger prints of a writer who likes carrion. We once heard Sam Jones say that some people do not have the sense of an old cow. The cow noses out the thistles and eats the luscious grass. But Mr. Bernard noses out the grass and chews on the thistles. We agree with some of the things said about the Baptists in the article referred to. Indeed, we knew the facts long before Ishmael went out to find them, but we also know many more facts on the better side that offset the liabilities involved in the depressing things which make up the bulk of Mr. Bernard's back-fence gossip. It is unfair to caricature the Baptists without a label or footnote designed to enlighten the reader with regard to the real content and object of the article. A drawn cartoon is never found in the art section of a newspaper. It is always known for what it is. But when the American Mercury puts a caricature among the leading articles and heads it "The Baptists," we are justified in charging the editor with unethical conduct in using a good label on a can of garbage.

The World in Transit

Perhaps This is Unlawful But Wherein Is It Wrong?

The Ward Food Products corporation, recently organized at Baltimore, has a potential capital estimated at about two billion dollars. This is represented by 10,000,000 shares of common stock of no par value and 10,000,000 shares of preferred, which the directors reserve the right to buy in at $110 a share. The contemplated bakery merger would own 157 plants stretched across this continent, producing 500,000,000 loaves of bread annually. In the application for its charter the Ward Food Products Corporation asked for the right "to perform any act permitted by the law" to the end that "every child may enjoy the right to be born well, reach school age well, and be fit mentally and physically for American citizenship." Perhaps there are people even yet who think that big business is bad business, and the prosecution of this corporation is threatened under the Sherman law. But why do they think so? Business is simply community service. Combinations are economically advantageous up to the point of the most highly efficient unit. Why not permit experiment? Of course the law ought to be obeyed, but the Sherman law is as archaic as the laws of Solon.

Should All Americans Learn in Such a School?

National Commander John R. McQuigg of the American Legion is not pleased with the ordinary Americanization work as carried on in this country. He thinks that the Legion is specially qualified for such work, and reasons thus: "The men who make up the Legion do not need to be told what loyalty means. They learned that in a school where it was taught in a way that no human being who went through that school will ever forget. They learned what obedience to law meant, where violations were followed by speedy discipline." But certain questions arise. Is military discipline or a campaign in France to be prescribed as a method for making aliens love America? Does loyalty consist in compulsory obedience? Is unquestioning submission to the will of another a good training for democracy? Does the discipline which aims to make men efficient killers best fit them for a society in which killing is a crime? The Legion is loyal of course, but its spokesmen ought to be selected with care.

The Man Who Cried "Stop Thief!" Has Been at Last Discovered

A prominent Baptist layman in the West points out what he regards as the source of the "mysterious propaganda" against business men which was mentioned in THE BAPTIST of Jan. 23, page 1571. His explanation is that socialists began it more than twenty years ago, then preachers took it up, then the churches, then the government and various agitators howled about profiteering during and after the war, and at last it has become a chronic habit. This account seems to be fairly correct, but the essential thing is to inquire whether there was and is occasion for the complaint. "A Layman" says that there are good and bad men and practices in all classes—"Why pick on business men?" The reason is this: Business men largely hold the power and claim the right to rule the country economically, socially, educationally, politically and religiously. Their power is the power of the purse. Their claim of right to rule rests on the assumption that the possession of wealth is a mark of superior competency to rule. That is a purely analytical view of fact and carries no sentimental color. They are therefore in the eye of the public as no other class is. And in consequence the Christian principle of trusteeship, that responsibility is measured by power, applies to them with special insistence. They are the makers of good or ill fortune for the people and for that very reason they are subject to special moral scrutiny. They ought to be morally equal to their position. Some of them are so. Let the others consider. And let no man, great or small, try to escape the moral demands of Christ.

What Are Wage Workers If They Are Not Citizens?

In the various forms of civic revival in the last few years there has been a curious accident of classification. Over and over there have been leagues for civic betterment composed of various professional, business and socially elite groups, with impressive gestures of federation for the public good. A significant—if significant—feature has been the absence of the representatives of organized wage workers in such movements. Why have they been absent? Do they not count as social factors? Have they been overlooked, by intention or otherwise? Do they refuse to cooperate with the citizens generally for the general welfare? Is there after all a class war that actually divides neighbor from neighbor? These are questions of high portent. How insistent they are may be seen by an article in the Federation News dealing with such an organization described by it as "fake reformers who are now posing in a mock effort to reduce crime which they themselves have promoted by indulging in their favorite lucrative diversion of dodging taxes, depriving the city thereby of adequate funds to prosecute crime." Fellow citizens, a federation to suppress crime towards which organized labor reacts in that fashion leaves much to be desired.

For Liberty's Sake Enforce the Law.

A loud outcry in the name of liberty is raised against the present method of enforcing prohibition. It has the sympathy of every consistent prohibitionist. Extreme measures for the enforcement of law are always undesirable and dangerous to liberty. But liberty is not the only thing that government has to consider. It is concerned equally with the general welfare, and liberty must always submit to such restriction as the common good requires. Wherever the liquor business operates it blasts the health, wealth, morals, efficiency and happiness of the people. It is itself one of the greatest foes of a sane, social and ordered liberty. It has always prostituted the name of liberty as a cover for bestiality. Can anybody remember any movement in the interest of sobriety that the liquor interests did not oppose in the name of liberty? Was there ever a law, no matter how mild, for the protection of the people against the evil effects of the liquor business that the business would obey except under positive compulsion? Bootleggers and their sympathizers are precisely the same kind of people with exactly the same philosophy of government as those who have fought the temperance movement at every stage. Strict law and strict enforcement are now employed for the simple reason that the lawless liquor business has demonstrated that all milder measures are futile. It is the incorrigible foe of both law and liberty. To save either we must crush it. And the Volstead law burdens only those who always place their own avarice and appetite above both law and the common good. For liberty's own sake, carry on.

A Revival of Personal Responsibility

"Whom shall I send and who will go for us?" Isaiah answered, "Here am I; send me."

BY ROBERT A. ASHWORTH

IT HAS been said that the world may be divided into two classes of people. One says, "Some one ought to do this; but why should I?" The other says, "Some one ought to do this; so why should not I?" All who have left their impress upon the world have belonged to the second class. Take the young Isaiah, for example: "Also I heard the voice of the Lord saying, 'Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?' Then said I, 'Here am I; send me!'"

Many influences today tend to weaken the sense of personal responsibility and initiative. The farmer must learn to do things for himself. He must be a bit of a mechanic, something of a carpenter and chemist and biologist and butcher, and a good deal of a merchant, as well as an agriculturalist. The farmer's boy and girl were matriculated in a school of farm work almost as soon as they could walk. They learned by doing. In the olden time all the processes of weaving were carried on in the homes. The wool was shorn from the sheep, washed, carded, spun and woven and then cut out and made into clothing. But the development of the factory, city life and the complexity of civilization have changed all this. We have learned to depend upon some one else to do things for us. Some one else builds a house for us. We buy our vegetables from the grocer, our milk from the milkman and our clothes from the tailor. What chance has the boy or girl today to reach that rounded development of hand and brain that characterized an earlier generation? What can you give your boy to do? Coal the furnace, perhaps, or clear the snow from the walks, or mow the lawn, unless you live in an apartment with steam heat and janitor service. And what is the result? With nothing to do but read books, go to the movies or attend parties after school hours, most of the girls are sophisticated at fifteen and most of the boys blase at eighteen, as though they had experienced every emotion and the world had gone stale. This may be the reason why the high places in the city are for so great part occupied by men born in the country, and the city boys and girls are working for them.

The Let-Some-One-Else-Do-It Spirit

Such conditions have as serious an effect upon the life of adults. We can remember when the farmers would leave their work on town-meeting day and go to the schoolhouse to do the public business. They did it themselves. Little was delegated to officials, and those officials were their friends and neighbors whom they could watch and call to account. But in the modern city we have some one else to do this for us also. We can hardly be said to be self-governed. We are content to let some one else do it. Thus there is coming over a large proportion of the population a feeling of sensuous and fatuous self-satisfaction, a love of ease, a desire to be freed from every responsibility except that of making money, and to be let alone.

This tendency to depend upon some one else to do what ought to be done, in the sublime confidence that somehow it will get done, has affected the church. Every true Christian desires that the kingdom of God shall come, but there are many willing that it shall come by efforts other than their own. All Christians want the church to prosper, wish its finances to be adequate, its services well sustained, its missionary enterprises to be supported adequately; but many, apparently, expect it to be done by others than themselves. They want all their work to be done by proxy. When some definite task involving sacrifice confronts them, they have an alibi.

Such was not the spirit of Isaiah: "Then said I, Here am I, send me!" A more common response is, "Here is my check, send some one else," and they often forget to enclose the check! Many church members are content to hire ministers and missionaries to love and save souls in their stead.

The spirit of the age has borrowed from other realms many methods of carrying on the work of the kingdom that were unknown to the fathers. There is the check-book system to which I have alluded, which consists of hiring experts and setting them to work. Then there is the addressograph, card catalog and follow-up system of evangelism, a sort of long-distance method of reaching men for their good. Then there is what we may call the conference and convention system which consists for the most part in getting large or small groups of people together to discuss how to reach the people—eventuating in the passage of resolutions and the spreading of them upon the minutes.

Many Methods

There may be merit in each of these methods: we would not disparage them. But when we come to depend upon them and to expect that by means of them the kingdom is to be brought in, we are doomed to disappointment. All of them are forms of "absent treatment," and whatever may be said for this as a mode of dealing with disease it will do nothing for that disease of the soul called sin from which people are suffering.

Men are easily persuaded that there is somewhere, if only it could be discovered, an easy and agreeable way of getting things accomplished, some method that will cost nothing, some way in which they can serve both God and self. There is no such way. There is no substitute for prayer, the sacrifice of time, money and energy, or for individual, personal effort.

The great need of our day is a revival of a sense of personal responsibility in the affairs of the kingdom. "Let each man," said Paul, "prove his own work, and then shall we have his glorying in regard of himself alone, and not of his neighbor. For each man shall bear his own burden." The church cannot save any man, but individual members of the church, each bearing his own burden, can save multitudes of men. There is no such entity as a church apart from the individual members that compose it, any more than there is such a thing as a state apart from its citizens. The church, therefore, can do no more than the aggregate of what its individual members are doing. It will bring only the men to Christ who are being brought by you and me. There is no one to depend upon but just ourselves as we are led and energized by the Spirit of God. What you and I do will be done.

It is well to remind ourselves of such considerations just now when the thought of the churches is concentrated upon the work of evangelism. Christian men, very many of them, have excellent excuses, in which it is difficult to find a flaw, for not doing what imperatively must be done if the church is to become the power it might and ought to be. Men are busy with many things. Life is a strain. But what we do not do will not be done. Without doubt God waits until you and I are ready. He does not address to us a direct summons any more than to Isaiah, nor lay compulsion upon us; but his voice may be heard now as then calling for messengers: "Whom shall I send and who will go for us?" Isaiah answered it for himself in particular: "Here am I; send me!"

Christianity in China Today

By E. L. PAN, RELIGIOUS DIRECTOR OF SHANGHAI COLLEGE PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT AND A GRADUATE OF SHANGHAI COLLEGE

THE history of the spread of the Christian gospel and Christian education in China is coming upon a critical era. The spirit of nationalism that has been stirred up among the students during the last three or four years is bringing in its trend many accusations against Christianity and all its institutions and functions. Strong attack has been launched against missionaries whose evangelistic work has been accused of involving political motives. The existence of missionary schools has been taken to be a program of racial assimilation and a purposeful infringement on the sovereignty of China. The Christians have suffered persecution for being unpatriotic, and as a consequence those of weaker faith are induced to deny their allegiance. All of this opposition is consummated in the May 30 event, yielding the anti-British spirit, which has been utilized for the generation of anti-foreign and anti-Christian sentiments.

Christian Internationalism versus Narrow Nationalism

At such a time of commotion and disturbance, while we as Christians ought to keep ourselves calm and steady, pending the return of reason—for such a state of affairs cannot endure and truth must be revealed sooner or later—there also comes the call for us to get ready to bear the standard of our Master and sing his battle song. Here is a test for the strength of our faith—for a real Christian is not one who can bear witness in time of safety, but one who can stand the trial of danger and through it prove his devotion true. Are we Christians able to stand the persecution and opposition of today with such a persistent strength? Are we Christians, in utter disregard of nationality and race, ready to show by our very lives and actions, that whether foreign nations have imperialistic intentions or not, or whether missionaries are all earnest or not, Christianity as a religion has its place in China today? Are we able to demonstrate to the people that Christians are preeminently patriotic and that it is when we put our love for China on a high and noble level that out of it grows the conviction that narrow nationalism must give way to a sense of Christian brotherhood and internationalism? It is very difficult; but it is a test that we must stand!

But it is more than a test. It is an assumption of responsibility. It is the time when Chinese Christians should wake up to their own task instead of depending for good upon the help of foreigners. Talk all you can against missionaries, but the Christian religion is not thereby affected. Missionaries may go—nay, they must go, at least from the positions of authority that now are held by them—but Christianity must stay. I appeal to all the truly patriotic Chinese Christians to be on their job for this new responsibility of building a genuinely Chinese church.

Last of all, may it not be overlooked that the time is no less than a good opportunity. This is the time when those who are interested in the spread of the Christian religion can do their work most effectively. Everything grows best when it is combatted most, including religion. Time was when people would accept Christianity without even understanding its basic principles. Now they want to oppose it, and in order to do so some earnestly study it. And this is the chance for truth to win out. Christianity which is capable of standing any degree of thorough scrutiny can truly penetrate into the hearts of people only by careful study. Now that it is no longer a fashion and style to become Christians, it takes one thoroughly converted in heart and soul to stand out among the mocking crowd and announce his belief. The few that are thus gained are in substance worth more to Christianity than many more superficial ones. The trumpet is sounded; let every brave soldier of the cross accept the challenge and win the battle.

At a critical time such as exists today, the Chinese Christian, while he must keep his love and loyalty to his country right up to the point of the non-Christian National and exceed it, he must also be on his guard to hold to his Christian principles and allow no compromise. On the other hand, while he should live out the difference between a Christian and a non-Christian, he must also adapt himself and his religious ideas to the conditions of the Chinese people and their traditional background, and thus truly answer their need. This is his unique contribution to the wholesome diffusion of patriotic and Christian ideals. And this also is his challenge for being not only a Chinese Christian but also a Christian Chinese.

The Pilot

GREAT Pilot, is our ship bound for the strand?
O whither are we steering?
And tell us, are we guided by thy hand
As fainter grows behind us Life's dim land?
Are we a new shore nearing?

I fail to trace the highway through the sea
O'er which our ship is sailing;
The golden gates of morn I cannot see,
Can they be phantom shores that lure me,
With phantom hopes prevailing?

O Pilot, is thy hand upon the wheel?
Thy compass rightly telling?
Strong currents meet and break around our keel;
O tell us, will the end be woe or weal
With tides so highly swelling?

Saith he, "O faithless man! Why doubt and fear?
Behold yon fleets of stars
Which I have piloted ere thy small sphere
Launched on Time's ocean on its fleet career!
Thou surely then canst trust that I will steer Thee safely past Time's bars."

Death and the Life Beyond

III—The Real Meaning of Death

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

DEATH, it is a mere platitude to say it, is the one obvious and certain fact of life. Physical dissolution is the lot of all mankind. Certain things may be done by proxy; other things may be bought off or evaded. But we cannot evade death. Saints and scoundrels alike pass through the portal of the tomb. Life in some respects is like a game of chess. Upon the board during the progress of the game, the pieces occupy different positions and possess different values; but when the game is over all alike, bishops, kings, knights and pawns go into the common box. In life here below one is a king, another a railway magnate, another the director of commerce, another a menial—a mere pawn.

The Inevitable

But when death comes all are reduced to one common level in the solemn silence of the sepulchre. The time of it is uncertain as it is inevitable. No man knows the day or the hour of its coming. Sometimes notice of dissolution is given in sickness, or in the natural decay of the physical powers; sometimes its comes without warning. But whatever be the manner of its approach, it is the one experience which befalls the whole race of man. Few men can seriously contemplate death without emotion, for upon the simplest showing it means farewell forever to many things that they have grown to love and to cherish. It is the end of the physical organism. What in creation is more noble than the human body at its best? How fascinating is the well poised head, the clear eye, the alabaster skin, the developed muscles, the graceful curves of neck and arm, the bloom of health upon the cheek! Verily the human body is a fit temple for the Holy Ghost. But this unique organism, at present so vital and supple, will one day lie immobile in the final rigidity of death. The blood now circulating in the veins will be dried up; the eye which now sends forth magnetic flashes, will be dulled in a final heaviness.

Death is also the end of our material possessions. There is in most men a passion, more or less developed, for the accumulation of wealth. It may grow upon them until it becomes an obsession to leave behind as much material wealth as possible. It is a salutary thought for every man that one day he will be forced to relinquish whatever material possessions he may have accumulated.

Death also terminates earthly honors. It is a legitimate thing to strive after the true prizes of life; the honors of the university, the good-will of fellow men, the rewards which fall to honest and arduous service. But when death comes these honors will be as faded leaves. The posthumous praise which men may offer will possess no value to the dead; they are beyond human praise or blame. Slave and master will be together in the common resting place of the tomb.

But worst of all, in the esteem of men, are the human separations which death effects. Wives and husbands, parents and children, lovers and friends are torn asunder. One is taken, the other left to mourn. Only they who have been through it can understand the terrible loneliness and sense of loss which overwhelms the surviving partner of a life-long comradeship, or crushes to the dust the parents who lose, in a moment by a tragedy, a young child whose life gives exceptional promise of beauty and usefulness. At those awful times heaven is blotted out from view and earth seems to be no more than a gulf of horror.

It is these things, separately and in conjunction, which have caused death to appear to many as the king of terrors, a monster, a robber, a descending curse upon the human race. But to regard death thus is entirely wrong. When it is calmly contemplated it is seen to be, not our enemy, but one of our best friends. The things incidental to it, such as accidents and the suffering due to disease, must not blind us to the mercy of the thing in itself. Strictly speaking, the incidental things have nothing whatever to do with the main thing. They may be considered as things apart; as contributory to the main thing, but not necessarily allied with it. The main reason why death is regarded with feelings of gloom and terror is that life is viewed falsely and lived falsely. The majority of people are practical materialists and death presents to them an aspect of horror because it attacks them on the material side of their lives. It is a spoiler, hence it is regarded with aversion. To live well is to solve in advance much of the mystery of death. He who has learned truly to live will not misunderstand the mission of death. Upon a never-to-be forgotten day, I witnessed in a semi-public place and in the presence of seventy persons, the "passing" of Dr. John Clifford at the ripe age of eighty-seven. Ten minutes before his spirit left forever its frail tabernacle of flesh, he spoke to the men assembled in committee, with remarkable fire and force, upon the necessity of enlisting youth in the service of Jesus Christ. It was apparent to all that his royal soul was as young as ever, and certainly riper than ever. Yet in ten minutes, and without a moment's warning, he bowed his head and passed on. As we stood before his still body, it was utterly impossible for any of us to believe that for him death was the termination of all, or that it was for him even an enemy. We viewed his departure in the light of his long and noble life and there was neither sting nor terror in his going. It is from this angle that death must be viewed in order to be understood.

Life Is Ascensional

What then is the real meaning of death? Let us place the question under three lights—biological, social and religious.

1. What is death scientifically considered? To the biologist death is a simple necessity of nature. It is part of God's plan for us; and to die is as natural as to breathe, to eat, to think and to speak. Considered biologically, death is involved in the act of living. It sounds paradoxical but it is true. Because we live we must die; death is part of the process of life. It is the fulfilment of one stage of life. It is a step on the way to something larger and more wonderful. We are not concerned here and now with what life is in itself. It is enough for us to know that we live. Life is the positive thing, the dominant thing, the victorious thing. The last word will be with life. Life is ascensional.

It mounts ever upward and grows ever richer. Things that "die" are born into a higher sphere. The plant dies when it is consumed by the animal that eats it, but in dying it passes into the animal. The animal, in its turn, is consumed by the man who absorbs it. What happens is not so much extinction as assimilation by a higher life. Lower organisms die in the interests of the higher. The process is general in our world. All here below exists to serve man who is never complete until he achieves a perfect personality. The goal at which God aims in our world is the production of a complete human personality and all else is made subsidiary to that. To this point we shall return later, it is mentioned here to give completeness to the thought we are pursuing.

Death Ends Only One Relation

Life, considered biologically, is a process of waste and rebuilding; waste through work and action, and rebuilding by means of food. The process of repair, which begins at birth, must keep pace with that of waste in order that growth may take place and physical life arrive at its full term. But this process of waste and repair has a natural limit assigned to it. It cannot go on forever. Considered academically there would seem to be no reason why we should not continue to live physically. All that is required is the persistence, without interruption, of this natural process. But as a fact there is a natural limit to the process, the reason for which has never been discovered. As science progresses and disease is conquered human life may be prolonged here below, but end it must one day. Death occurs when waste exceeds the process of rebuilding. Then we "slow down into the station" and die. But it is important to observe that death ends one relation, one process only. It does not involve the end of all relations. "It is not" as Professor Gaston Frommel says, "a ceasing to be, it is simply a ceasing to appear." It is the end of one stage of life for the purpose of securing higher relations in another sphere. "When I go down to the grave," wrote Victor Hugo, "I shall have finished one day's work, and another day will begin." This, however, belongs to another order of thought and has nothing to do with science. Science is not authorized to say more than that death terminates one set of relations. So far as science is concerned, the curtain falls there. It must be lifted again by other hands. Death, moreover, is the law of all living creatures; it has always been their law. Long before man appeared upon this planet death was in the world. Before human sin blighted human progress, creatures of a lower order were born, they lived and they passed away. The story of the rocks is conclusive upon this point. It is no longer debatable. Fossil remains do not lie. The same law that is now in operation was at work in the world prior to the appearance of man. Throughout the whole hierarchy of existence, death has been the natural ending of "life" upon this planet. Biologically, then, death holds no terrors. It is a purely normal and natural occurrence. There is nothing to be afraid of. It is an event, not a catastrophe.

2. What is death, socially considered? It is not only a social necessity but a positive social boon for the human race. If there were no death there could be no true human race. Humanity as we know it would be impossible. Physical immortality is absolutely unthinkable. If people never died life would become a nightmare. The world would become uninhabitable. Use your imagination. Suppose that all the people who have ever been born on our planet were now alive, what would be the state of things? According to the natural law of increase the numbers would be appalling. It is doubtful if we could live at all. If there were no death, then there would be no other life than this—no hereafter. Doctor Alger has stated the case so well that I cannot do better than quote his convincing words. "Consider," he says, "what would be the result if death were abolished and man endowed with an earthly immortality. At first they might rejoice and think their last dread enemy was destroyed. But what a mistake! In the first place, since none are to be removed from the earth, of course none must come into it. The space and material are all wanted by those now in possession. All are soon mature men and women; not another infant to hang upon a mother's breast or be lifted in a father's arms. All the prattling music, fond cares, yearning love, gushing joys and hopes associated with the rearing of children, gone! Ages roll on. They see the same everlasting faces, confront the same returning phenomena, engage in the same worn-out exercises, or lounge idly in the unchangeable conditions which bear no stimulant they have not exhausted. Thousands of years pass. They have drunk every attainable spring of knowledge dry. Not a prize stirs the pulse. All pleasures permeated till ingenuity is baffled, disgust them. . . . They have no future. One everlasting now is their all. Full of loathing and immeasurable fatigue, a weariness like the weight of a universe oppresses them. What would they not give for a change?" To remain here forever would be to remain in a horrible prison, an enclosed outpost in this vast creation. Life should be regarded socially, as a banquet, to which many guests are invited and where there are many sittings. They first take their place and, having finished, make way for other relays, until all are served. If we were here forever the first comers to the banquet would gain all, the last comers—nothing.

The Christian Dies to Live

3. What is death religiously considered? If death be perfectly natural, if it be biologically and socially a boon, how is it that religion has often given an account of it very different from this? Death is said to be due to sin; it is God's punishment of the human race. Even the passing of little children, who have committed no sin, is declared to be a punishment for racial if not for personal sin. This view of death is supposed to rest upon Bible authority. "In the day thou eatest thou shalt surely die." "As by one man sin came into the world and death through sin." "The wages of sin is death." These words seem conclusive. They appear to teach that death is the result of sin. In reality, however, they teach nothing of the kind. Nowhere does the Bible teach that physical death is a punishment for sin. Let us turn to the root passage of all, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." (Gen. 2:17). But Adam, did not die in "the day" he ate. According to the Bible story he reached a ripe old age and then died. The difficulty is avoided by some in attaching to the word "day" a moral meaning, while they retain for the word "death" the literal meaning. This will not do. It is a mere juggling with words. Both are literal or they are not literal. If the word "day" does not mean a day in the ordinary sense of the word, neither does the word "death" mean death in the ordinary sense of the word. Physical death cannot be intended since Adam did not "die" on the day of his sin. Further, Genesis 3:19 represents physical death as normal—"dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." That is the announcement of a fact, not the pronouncement of a sentence. Man physically had been drawn from the materials of the earth and would return to that from which he came. To understand how death is conceived in the Christian sense, we must turn from all poetic representations of an earlier age to the clear light of the gospel, in which we shall at once perceive that "death" has a spiritual rather than a physical content. The emphasis of the New Testament falls, not upon the physical dissolution associated with death, but upon the quality of the human spirit which is conceived of as "dead" if it is out of harmony with God and "alive" if it is reconciled to him. The Christian is "made free from the law of sin and death" (Romans 8:2). Yet he dies physically. He who believes in Christ passes out of death into life. (John 5:24.) Yet he dies physically. The millions who in the Christian era have "believed" in Christ and found in him life eternal according to his word have all passed away in physical dissolution. "Death" in the Christian sense is referred to man's spirit and not to his flesh. The prodigal son who was very much alive physically was spoken of as "dead." "This my son was dead and is alive again." Alive physically, he was dead morally, until he was restored to his father's love and home. The "death" then that is caused by sin is not physical dissolution; it is spiritual wryness and discord. Whenever a pupil of the school of Pythagorus deserted his master a coffin was placed in the seat he had occupied to signify that on the day he left the class he became intellectually "dead." In this moral sense the word is used again and again in the Bible. The wages of sin is the death of the spirit.

The Sting of Death

But if physical death is natural why does it appear so dreadful to many? It is not terrible to the lower creation why should it be to man? St. Paul has said the last word upon the subject—it remains forever true: "The sting of death is sin." (1 Cor. 15:56) The presence of human sin gives a new moral significance to what is in itself a perfectly natural event. If men were living normal lives, harmonious with God and their fellows, they would dread dying no more than they dread sleep. The natural event is rendered dreadful for many; it stings because the spirit is wrong. It is not theology that has the last word here, but conscience. The gospel, which in man's interests shows him the source of his terror, also offers him the secret of his relief. It offers him Christ who went to the depths for us and "tasted death" for every man. He entered into the experience of that moral death by which the race has been oppressed. Twice he suffered the pangs of death, once in Gethsemane where his soul was crucified ("My soul is exceedingly sorrowful even unto death") and once upon Calvary when his flesh was crucified. By that double dying he removed forever the "sting" of death for all who live in union and friendship with him. The physical dissolution remains, but not the moral dread. Since he tasted death for us, the whole atmosphere has changed. Death is now a "sleep." This does not mean unconsciousness, but an absence of all terror. It need be no more than the repose after a hard day of toil with an awakening to freshness in the day beyond. It is a "departure"—a pulling up of the anchor and a setting sail for the brighter port. It is our "exodus" (Luke 9:31)—a passing from bondage to liberty. It is the exchange of a temporary tent for a permanent house. (2 Cor. 5:1) So through Christ death has been transformed. Elsewhere there is no hope or brightness.

All the speculations and experiments of mankind pale before the substantial fact of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ with all its implications for the future of humanity. Because he lives, we shall live also. That is both starting point and terminus for the Christian. Compare this faith and hope with the cold-blooded oration delivered over the remains of M. de Sainte-Beuve in Pere Lachaise—"Accept thanks in his name. The ceremony is concluded"; or with the appalling pessimism of James Thomson in his "City of Dreadful Night"; or with the half lights of the spiritualistic seance. The faith of the gospel alone is resplendent. To speak jocularly of death, on the one hand, or gloomily on the other, is unworthy of enlightened men. Seen under any aspect, it is a solemn event for every one. It ends one phase of life and commences another. But it makes no difference to any person's character. There is no magic in the act of dying. Thousands imagine that when they die, extreme unction or the prayers of a clergyman will effect a miracle. Never was error more profound. The act of dying makes no greater change in character than does the act of removal from one house to another. We remain the same persons. We awake on the other side of death as we depart hence—for good or bad. This life determines that. The law of habit is rigorous and applies in all worlds. The solemn thing is to live well—we shall then die well. Let us order our life in view of the inevitable future and (to use the word of Bourdaloue) "lift from death the power to betray us."

The Devotional Life

Not Meaning It So

Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither does his heart think so.—Isaiah 10:7

BY OWEN PHILIPS EACHES

IN Isaiah 10:7 is the significant expression, "Howbeit he meaneth not so, neither does his heart think so." It is the affirmation that Jehovah looks not so much at the results as at the motives that move the man. God had chosen Assyria as the mighty agency with which to destroy Israel. Would not Assyria therefore have a moral standing in God's sight as carrying out God's righteous purpose? The answer is that Assyria was doing this not with any high moral aim but in pursuance of a selfish and cruel national policy. The motive had in it no desire to do a righteous act and therefore in God's sight it had no moral standing.

In the ministry of Jesus God manifests in the flesh the same principle of procedure. Three disciples of Christ went with him to the entrance of Gethsemane. They had been chosen to help him in bearing his mediatorial suffering, but they fell asleep at the switch. He might have censured them with terrible invective, calling them traitors to the faith, indifferent to the claims of love and duty. But generously he looked at their hearts, not at their sleeping bodies. They had not meant to be recreant to their trust; their spirit was willing, but their nervous system had outweighed their devotion and intention. He did not look at the outward act but at the inner motive that beat true to him.

Doing Wrong Ignorantly

Paul in the first century was as intensely against Christ and his followers as was the inquisition against Protestantism. But behind his intensity of spirit and his seeming savagery was his aim to be a protector of God's truth and of the supremacy of the Old Testament religion. Therefore he received mercy and found salvation because he did wrong ignorantly.

antly. (1 Timothy 1:13) The inference is that if he had acted not ignorantly but knowingly, it would have been more difficult for him to receive mercy from God. His aim was right, but his activity was utterly wrong.

Believing the Best

Looking at the divine procedure of having regard to the impelling motive in fixing the moral standing of men, we should be governed by the same rule in our treatment of others. Our judgment at the outcome of a foolish movement will be more lenient if we can say the leaders meant well. We should never impugn the motives of others. This was Paul's method, always eager to believe the best. (1 Cor. 13:7) Religious controversy often begets a bitter spirit and degenerates into the calling of names and the impugning of motives. John Wesley and Augustus Toplady were leaders of opposing theological parties. They stepped down from the high level of discussing religion with the aim of finding out the real truth of God and called each other names that would have disgraced quarreling fishwives. It is obligatory in disputants on religious doctrines to keep an even disposition and to respect the motives of others.

In Paul's ministry at Ephesus

he was in direct opposition to the worship of Diana and his success interfered with the leading business of the city; but he retained the esteem of the leaders of the heathen party. Some of the official supporters of Diana worship were concerned for Paul's safety. (Acts 19:31) Paul was a defender and an outspoken witness for the truth, but he knew how to deal with his opponents in so just and generous a way as to retain their respect. We censure the narrow-mindedness of the Puritan leaders for banishing Roger Williams, for whipping Obadiah Holmes in Boston Commons, for breaking up Baptist prayer meetings; but we respect them as good men who were intent, in a mistaken way, on building up a community on their interpretation of truth. We judge them as Jesus judged the three disciples in Gethsemane.

God's How and Why

If we give to the motives of men the weight to which they are entitled we shall be able to express a fair judgment. Xavier, on account of his relation to the Society of the Jesuits, is usually condemned by common Protestant judgment as an unworthy man; but when worn out in body he traversed torrid India with the words on his lips, "More Souls, More Souls," we see an intense missionary spirit united with imperfect conceptions of Christ's kingdom and the method for its extension. God is fitted to be the moral governor and judge of the world because he takes cognizance of the real man, the innermost man. John Oxenham has given these fine words:

Life's real harvest is what we would

And strive our best for,
Not trust in what we could.
The things we count supreme Stand, happily, not so high
In God's esteem as How and Why.

The Country of Books

THIS workaday world is so trying at times,

Folks chatter and squabble like rooks!
So the wise flee away to the best of all climes

Which you enter through History,
Memoirs, or Rhymes,

That most wonderful Country of Books.

And griefs are forgotten. You go on a tour

More wondrous than any of "Cook's."
It costs you but little—your welcome is sure—

Your spirits revive in the atmosphere pure

Of the Wonderful City of Books.

Your friends rally round you. You shake by the hand

Philosophers, soldiers and spooks!
Adventurers, heroes, and all the bright band

Of poets and sages are yours to command

In that wonderful Country of Books.

New heights are explored; and new banners unfurled;

New joys are found in all sorts of nooks—

From the work-weary brain misgivings are hurled—

You come back refreshed to this workaday world

From that wonderful Country of Books.

The Chimes

By MATILDA A. FRASER

THE evening was chilly for early November, with a nipping touch of frost in the air that conduced to brisker movement among pedestrians and the turning up of fur collars about the ears. On the busiest corner of the Common the subway entrances were still like giant maws swallowing their quota of hurrying people, but doing it on the reduced scale appropriate to Sunday evening. Not far away on benches along the walks and facing the fountain, now chilled into silence, were one or two huddled groups of young people and a few solitary masculine figures.

Up the hill the white bulk of the State House, dimly visible through the gloom, reared its dusky outlines, mellowed a little by the soft radiance shed by the gilded dome, cunningly lighted from some hidden source. On a corner across the narrow street bordering one side of the Common a beautiful old church raised its delicate spire toward the sky. With its warmly lighted windows, its walls of century-old brick lit to a soft rose-color by the light from tall street lamps and electric signs flashing from the tops of many-storied buildings, and its heaven-pointing spire, the church seemed to hover over the scene like a benediction.

Suddenly the doors were flung wide, and down the steps flowed the congregation, a stream of people with white leaflets in their hands, singing as they moved:

"For all the saints who from their labors rest;

Who Thee by faith before the world confessed,

Thy name, O Jesus, be forever blessed.

Alleluia. Alleluia.

"Thou wast their rock, their fortress and their might;

Thou, Lord, their captain in the well-fought fight;

Thou, in the darkness drear, the one true light.

Alleluia.

"But lo! there breaks a yet more glorious day;

The saints triumphant rise in bright array;

The King of glory passes on his way.

Alleluia. Alleluia."

The singers massed themselves about the steps and along the curb, traffic officers gently directing the movement and keeping a way clear for passers-by. Some of the latter, realizing that the dedication of the new chimes must be taking place, joined the throng about the steps. Reverently they listened to the Doxology as it pealed out on the frosty air, and then to the words of the minister who from the top of the flight of steps ended the solemn dedication of the chimes "to the glory of God and the service of man," and stretched his arms out over the assembled crowd in benediction.

As the throng melted away into the night, some disappearing down the subway entrances and others lingering along the walks of the Common to hear on loved hymn after another rung out by the sweet-toned chimes, a little drama was being enacted near the frozen fountain. On one of the benches two young seamen in the small flat caps and wide flapping trousers of the Naval uniform had been joined by a couple of brazen-looking girls, the four gradually huddling together in a wriggling group from which there issued from time to time giggles and little squeals of laughter. As the strains of "Sweet Hour of Prayer" broke out, the clean-looking young chap at the end of the seat suddenly lifted his head to listen, and drew a little farther away from his companions. He was back in the village church at home beside his mother, whose slightly tremulous voice was singing:

"Sweet hour of prayer! Sweet hour of prayer!

That calls me from a world of care,
And bids me at my Father's throne,

Make all my wants and wishes known;
In seasons of distress and grief,

My soul has often found relief,
And oft escaped the tempter's snare

By thy return, sweet hour of prayer."

Obedying a sudden impulse he reached out behind the back of the gum-chewing girl next to him and giving the other lad's shoulder a sharp pull, said: "Come along, Jim, let's be going."

"Aw, what's your hurry?" protested Jim, catching up with him on one side while on the other a girl slipped her arm through his. The three drew him down on another bench, and soon the four figures, one to be sure a little stiff and reluctant, were huddled together as before. But the chimes were not through with him yet. A program had been planned, and at short intervals one after another of the old familiar hymns was played. "Abide with Me" made Jim restive, bringing vivid memories of the laying away of his work-worn father for the long sleep, and of the high ideal that father had cherished for his son. Jim's cigarette was tossed aside, and when after another short interval the strains of "Just as I am, without plea" thrilled through the air by an impulse both boys were suddenly on their feet, moving away with a terse "Good-night" flung behind them.

BOYS and Girls

There's Nothing Like Persistence

By JEREMY T. JONES (AGE 11),
BUFFALO, N. Y.

I read you wanted lists of explorers so I made up one, and I was interested to see that every one of them was a man who had tackled a hard job and then stuck to it through thick and thin. This is one of the stories I know about explorers, but I don't know the man's name. He wanted to find a certain place, and the natives thought that place was sacred and made up their minds no white person should see it and live. So this white man browned his face with powdered berries, and browned his whole body, before he started to travel there. The sands were so hot in the desert that even the toughened caravan drivers refused to go that day, so he tied sacks around his legs to protect them, and wore heavy clothes to keep out the sun's rays and a pith hat and off he set alone. His water was giving out when he noticed that even his camel was getting red out, so after some debate he gave all his water to the camel, since it was important that the animal should keep going if he was to get where he wanted to go. He got there, of course, because he had pluck and persistency. Every explorer needs these two things, and I guess everybody needs them, too.

In closing I can say how much I like our page.

How a Deed of Kindness Saved the Fort

By ELEANOR PARSONS (AGE 11),
BELLINGHAM, WASH.

Marion Bradley, twelve, and her brother Dick, fourteen, together with an old soldier, Bronson, had been left to guard the fort. The women and smaller children had gone berrying, and the men were on a hunting expedition. It was in the Indian times, and of course the fort could not be left alone. Marion was seated at a table, sewing; Bronson was reading, and Dick was carving a wooden doll for one of his smaller sisters.

Suddenly she heard a knock at the door, and running to open it came face to face with a tall Indian. She was very frightened at first, but seeing how tired and hungry he looked she felt sorry for him. He was faint and weary, for he had traveled almost a day without food or water.

Marion at once took him in, and although food was getting scarce, made him a good meal. While she was preparing this Dick called her aside and said, "Marion! don't take an Indian into the house. Mother and father won't like it at all, and the captain said that the Indians were getting dangerous around here." At the same time Bronson came up, and he also advised her to "send that Indian where he belongs."

"I won't!" she cried. "He looks so tired, and he wouldn't hurt us, anyhow." "Well, I guess not," Dick admitted. "But still, I wouldn't, Marion." "And remember, if anything happens, I warned you beforehand," said Bronson. Marion went over to Rising Sun, the Indian, and told him to rest before going on to his village.

When he woke up an hour later he seemed somewhat refreshed, and said he must start on his way. He thanked Marion heartily, and his last words were "Indian never forget kindness. Me do something for white girl some time." And sure enough, he did.

Marion did not tell her parents about the Indian's visit, and as both Dick and the old soldier said nothing about it, no one knew it until later, when she told them herself. She often thought of the Indian and his promise, and believed he would come back, and would, at some time, make true his word. But as the months went by she began to lose faith.

There had not been any trouble from the Indians for some time now, in fact, not for many months. More supplies had been sent to the fort, and everything had been going smoothly.

So what was every one's surprise when a tall Indian came riding up and asked for Marion Bradley. The children were all frightened, and began to cry, for Marion was a favorite, and they thought she was going to be taken away. Mr. Bradley stepped forward. "What do you want?" he said curtly. "Don't, father," cried Marion. "He wants me. I know him."

She stepped up toward the Indian, who

We Begin Exploring!

Dear Boys and Girls:

So far this month three stories have come in for our page, and I am hoping more will come in for next week's issue.

For next month the general subject for which you are pleased to go exploring is "The Negroes." Who can send in the longest list of facts about negroes in the United States, or names of famous negroes and what they have done, or a story about some negro? Whatever you send will be printed here on our page. Mail your contributions to Miss Margaret T. Applegarth, 21 Arnold Park, Rochester, New York.

was Rising Sun, her friend of a few months before, and he told her why he had come. His tribe of Indians, the Chicopees, had decided in the council the night before to make an attack on the little settlement. As he was the only one who was not in favor of it, the attack was to be made some time soon. So he thought the best thing he could do was to warn them.

Marion told her father what the Indian had said, and he was very grateful to Rising Sun. He gave him some food, and then Marion's friend started back for his village.

The next day when the Indians made the attack they were surprised to find the men all ready to defend the fort. It was a short battle, in which the Americans were victorious. The Indians, defeated, crept back into the woods. But Rising Sun stopped for a while, and when he was thanked again, said, "White girl kind to me. I help her," and pointed to Marion. Then he too disappeared into the woods.

When Marion's story was told every one was surprised except her brother and Bronson, the old soldier. "Well, now I am sure it is a fine thing to do a kindness to any one, no matter who he is," said Mr. Bradley, patting her on the back. And so it happened that a deed of kindness, done by a little girl, had a great deal to do with saving the fort.

This Happened in China Last October

By FLORENCE M. SKEVINGTON,
CHENG TU, CHINA

Every Sunday morning I help Miss Downer in Sunday school and children's church. I was most interested the other morning in watching a street urchin who has attended regularly since we began our fall work. As we left our compound he was at the gate to greet us with a smiling face and a happy "Good morning." Then he started work. All the way to church he gathered the street children together. We could hear him telling them that the foreigners would give them pictures, the children would sing, and a Chinese gentleman would tell them a story. By the time he reached our church he had six small boys with him. It took a lot of coaxing and persuading for our little missionary to get them inside. When he finally got them all in and seated, he sat down in the middle. When the time came for them to sing "Jesus Loves Me" his voice was heard above all the others, for he was trying to help them along with the tune. As I caught his eye, he smiled the dearest smile which said, "Now I'm happy, because I was successful, aren't you proud of me?" And I was.

Young People and the Kingdom

"Meeting Helps" for C. L. P. Topics for March 14

Note: All references hereafter made in these "Meeting Helps" will be to the following books: "Modern Discipleship and What It Means" by Woods; "Twelve Tests of Character" by Fosdick; "The Man Nobody Knows" by Barton; "Gates and Keys To Bible Books" by Robinson; "How We Got Our Bible" by Smyth; "A Short History of the Christian Church" by Moncrief; "Peasant Pioneers" by Miller; "God's Dynamite" by Lerrigo. The entire set of books may be had from the American Baptist Publication Society. A few others may be added later.

If you have the time to read again all of Bruce Barton's "The Man Nobody Knows" you will see there several portraits of Christ, each in a different "pose."

Then in Robinson's "Gates and Keys to Bible Books" you will find a great deal of help. Under "The Christ of the Book" on pages 267-268; 274-275; 280-282; and 288-289, Mr. Robinson has given us an explanation of the portraits found in the Gospels.

If you will get a few of your group members to help you, you may be able to show the young people why there are so many portraits of this one man. Get four of the members to read the story of Christ's birth in Luke, but do not let them confer as to their conclusions.

In meeting ask these four people to leave the room and then, one at a time, have them come in and tell of their impressions and conclusions as derived from their reading of this story. It is quite probable that each person has a different viewpoint.

Similarly, get four other young people to report some event (such as a party or a hike or a game) to which all have been. Each person will more than likely have something different from the other—each person will put a different interpretation on the event.

Then explain that just so the writers of the four Gospels had seen Christ in a different light. Show that these disciples saw only what they were interested in in the Christ. For example, Luke the physician, dwelt on the physical reality of Christ. John the great heart, saw his love, etc.

In order to impress further the lesson, four pictures in which Christ is the central figure may be hung on the wall, one right next to the other. Call attention to these pictures and explain that the artists drew Christ as they knew him. Hence, the variety of portrayals of this man. Try to show the young people the real Christ, who can appreciate our every feeling and thought and who can sympathize with us.

A Week "On"

Every one is familiar with the "week off"—vacation time, or sick leave, or something like that. Quite often people are having a "week off." But the Baptist young people of the Northern Baptist Convention are being asked to give a week's time to introduce friends to Christ.

Evangelism is the keynote for all Baptist churches in the North this year. In some churches there have already been evangelistic campaigns with good results. In other churches the effort is to precede Easter. The denomination is asking the young people of the church, Sunday-school classes, young people's society, mission study bands, to cooperate with the church in having a "Win My Friend" week—March 21 to 28.

It's Friendly

The effort to win others is to be made through friends. For instance, if you

My Chum

HE stood at the crossroads all alone,

With the sunrise in his face;

He had no fear for the path unknown,

He was set for a manly race.

But the road stretched east,

And the road stretched west;

There was no one to tell him which way was best;

So my chum turned wrong and went down, down, down,

Till he lost the race and the victor's crown,

And fell at last in an ugly snare,

Because no one stood at the crossroads there.

Another chum on another day,

At the self-same crossroads stood;

He paused a moment to choose the way

That would lead to the greater good.

And the road stretched east;

And the road stretched west;

But I was there to show him the best;

So my chum turned right and went on and on,

Till he won the race and the victor's crown;

He came at last to the mansions fair,

Because I stood at the crossroads there.

Since then I have raised a daily prayer,

That I be kept faithfully standing there,

To warn the runners as they come
And save my own, or another's chum.

have a friend who is not a Christian, and you have volunteered to serve during this week, you will be asked to take care of that friend. Throughout this whole effort, "friendship" will be in evidence—the effort of a friend to introduce another friend to the great friend, Christ.

It's Outlined

The agencies promoting this evangelistic effort have prepared a little booklet telling just how the "machinery" may be set up for this week—only the lack of machinery and the evidence of planning and praying are noticeable. For example, a program, complete in outline, is given for the whole week. Sunday is to be spent in a final check-up on "friends." Monday is to be "boys' night"; Tuesday "girls' night," etc. Suggestions are made as to what might be done—generally.

These agencies, however, are leaving the detail of the plan to the local church. Because one thing might work out in one church is no reason it will work the same way in another church. Conditions may be altogether different. What will appeal to one group will probably not appeal to another group. Therefore, the details of the suggested plan are left to the church itself.

It's Quiet

Did you say that you don't believe in these "revival meetings"—that people usually step forward under the stress of emotion, and it "doesn't mean anything"? Well, this is not that kind of an affair. This effort is a "personal" one—friend speaking to friend—presenting the cause of Christ in a quiet but sincere way. It is merely the introduction of a non-Christian by a Christian to his friend Christ.

With adequate preparation the "introducing" is to center in this one week with prayer and thanksgiving. The those who have decided to take Christ as a life-long friend should be present on Palm Sunday (March 28) in order to tell others about this meeting with Christ. The following Sunday (Easter) the newly pledged friends of Christ's will be baptized.

It's Lasting

The plans suggest that the matter not going to rest there, however. The new members should be asked to do something in the church. It is felt that only by giving them something to do will they keep that first glow of interest. By serving they will be more adequately expressing their friendship.

Did you say that you want to observe this week? If you do, you may have free of charge, a copy of the leaflet telling of the plans. Write either to B. Y. P. U. of America, the American Baptist Publication Society, or the literature department of the Board of Missionary Cooperation.

Among Ourselves

Chicago Letter

By C. T. HOLMAN

"Play Ball!"

"Jim" Brougner—as the ministers in their retreat at Peoria insisted on calling him—has come and gone. But his "Play Ball" address has evidently had about the same stimulating effect on Chicago Baptists that the coach's words of admonition at half-time have upon a football team. I did not hear Doctor Brougner give his famous "Play Ball" address in Chicago, when an enormous crowd gathered in Immanuel church to hear him, but I heard the same address at Peoria, and I also heard him at the Chicago Baptist Ministers' Conference and at another smaller evening gathering in this city. He reminded me of coach A. A. Stagg at a "pep session" before a football game. Not that Stagg was Brougner's fund of humor; but both now how to appeal effectively to the strongest motives and call forth the greatest possible effort. The denomination is under a real debt to Doctor Brougner. However, I am left with a feeling that denominational programs cannot permanently be conducted on pep sessions. Processes of education, and perhaps fundamental adjustments of method, will be necessary to sustained effort.

"Old Englewood—and Youth"

The Englewood church is one of the best and strongest in the city. But however it may age, it will always renew its youth so long as young life pours into it and the church adjusts itself to the needs of this young life as it now is living. The week of Jan. 31-Feb. 7 was given to the dedication of the beautiful new educational building and church house, erected at a cost of $220,000 primarily to house the church school of over 1300, and also to provide for that expanding program of community service which the Englewood church proposes to render. In addition to the dedication of this building the interior of the fine old stone church itself has been remodeled and redecored. The dedication sermon was preached by Dr. Myron W. Haynes, who was pastor when the present church edifice was erected; and the services of dedication were brought to a close with an address by Dr. C. W. Olney of Hyde Park church on "The Outfeach of the Church." The Englewood church is to be congratulated on this achievement. Especial credit is due Dr. C. A. Brooks, the pastor, who brought to his task a rich background of experience gained in dealing with city community problems while in the service of the Home Mission Society and under whose dynamic leadership this work was accomplished; and to Mr. W. G. Brimson, for over thirty years the efficient and contagiously enthusiastic superintendent of this great church school.

A Victorious Retreat

When I saw the great canvas sign "Pastors' Retreat!" over the entrance to the First Baptist church, Peoria, Jan. 11, the opening day of their sessions, I wondered if it was a command or an affirmation. Whatever it was, I soon discovered it was a way to victory. The registration at this Illinois Baptist ministers' retreat was, I understand, over 150, and the ministers came from all parts of the state. The program was remarkable for its informality. There were a few set speeches to be sure. James Whitcomb Brougner was there as already stated. Among other headliners were Bishop Edwin H. Hughes of the Chicago area M. E. church, Pres. Harley Marsh of the Illinois State Convention, Prof. A. G. Baker of the divinity school of the University of Chicago and Dr. C. A. Brooks of Englewood. Francis Stifter of Wilmette was chairman and admirably led the retreat through unhurried, yet never draggy discussion, conference and prayer. The most significant achievement was the cultivation of a fine fraternal spirit which never once was remotely threatened. It is a strange commentary on our religious life that this should even be worthy of remark; yet any one who has been through state or Northern Baptist Conventions knows that such a spirit is not always characteristic of our gatherings. I have a feeling, however, that this annual ministers' gathering will have to do something more than repeat the same type of program each year if it is to continue to hold interest and to render increasing service. It would be very easy for the devotional services to become sentimental. Perhaps it is because of the Episcopal training of my youth that I am more readily awakened religiously by a beautiful and orderly service of worship than by the typical Baptist devotional meeting. Our usual devotional meetings seems to me almost morbidly introspective; there is too much feeling of one's spiritual pulse, too much concern about the present state of one's spiritual health. Such meetings inhibit rather than release my religious emotions. Thus my criticism may be merely a confession of my own limitations. Even so, I think that the manner of conducting the devotional periods will bear watching. Further, it does seem to me that these sessions might very profitably be made an occasion for frank interchange of opinion—with regard to doctrine, polity, or what you will—in which no one will try to coerce and perhaps not even to persuade anybody else, but in which points of view might freely be expressed and in which an effort could be made by different individuals and groups to understand one another. Questions which easily become divisive are going to be discussed anyway. Our customary procedure has been to permit discussion to be carried forward by partisan groups until misunderstandings have deepened and feeling has become inflamed. Then one party or the other, feeling that the issue is so vital that a decision must be reached, attempts coercion of the other group. Inevitably there follows debate between antagonists, the taking of a vote, with its sundering of fellowship, its doubtful victories and defeats, and its irreconcilable minorities. The question I raise is whether these pastors' retreats might not avert much of this by providing an opportunity for frank and fraternal discussion, in an objective and irenic spirit, unembarrassed by the idea that a vote is to be taken at the close to determine who shall have his way. Among the results which might be hoped for would be mutual understanding and the discovery of many mutual vital interests which demand cooperative service. Continuing fellowships are built up, not around mere protestations of love one for another, but around common interests and activities.

The Social Union

The mid-winter dinner of the Chicago Baptist Social Union was held on Thursday evening, Jan. 28, at the Hamilton Club. It was quite a cosmopolitan meeting. Foreign-speaking Baptist students, numbering over sixty, from all the schools, colleges and seminaries in Chicago were guests of various members of the club. It was highly appropriate that

WE must not hope to be mowers,
And to gather the ripe gold ears,
Unless we have first been sowers
And watered the furrows with tears.

It is not just as we take it,
This mystical world of ours,
Life's field will yield as we make it
A harvest of thorns or of flowers.

—J. W. von Goethe.

the speaker of the evening should be Dr. E. Y. Mullins, president of the Baptist World Alliance.

Smith Thomas Ford

No minister of any denomination in Chicago and vicinity is more deeply beloved or more highly respected than Dr. Smith Thomas Ford, for many years pastor at Englewood and more recently pastor at Wheaton. He has had about all the honors that can be given him by his brethren. He has been president of nearly everything, including the Chicago Church Federation. Now he has resigned, his resignation, on the generous insistence of the Wheaton church, not to take effect until Sept. 1, 1926, when he will have completed seven years' service. In the meantime Doctor Ford has had the honor of preaching the one hundredth anniversary sermon in a former pastorate, the First church of Lowell, Mass. Not only will Doctor Ford be greatly missed in all gatherings of Chicago Baptists, but also his gracious wife, who has been looked to for leadership in a multitude of activities, will be greatly missed.

Two Great Conferences

Two great conferences, both under the auspices of commissions of the Chicago Church Federation have recently been held. The first was an industrial conference running the entire week of Jan. 10-17 under the joint auspices of the commission on church and industry of the Chicago Church Federation and the commission on the church and social service of the Federal Council of Churches. Among the speakers were Jane Addams, Hull House; William Green, president American Federation of Labor; William Hapgood, president of Columbia Conserve company; Hubert Herring, national secretary of social service for Congregational churches; Sam Higginbottom; Arthur E. Holt, professor of social ethics, Chicago Theological Seminary; Mary E. McDowell, head resident, University of Chicago settlement house; James Myers, Dutchess Bleachery company at Wappinger Falls, N. Y.; Worth M. Tippy, secretary of the social service commission, Federal Council of Churches; Alva W. Taylor, national secretary for social service of the Disciples of Christ; and many others. Prof. Arthur E. Holt, the chairman, in speaking of the significance of the conference, said: "One test of such meetings is of course in the number of people reached. Judged by this test, it was, in the estimate of Dr. Worth M. Tippy of the Federal Council of Churches, the most successful conference of its kind ever staged. There were fifty-five meetings, arranged for by the commission. In addition to these meetings, there were a number of meetings held during the week which were in keeping with the general plan of the conference, but were not directly planned by the commission. One such occasion was a meeting of 400 foremen under the auspices of the South Chicago Y. M. C. A. Another was a meeting in the Oak Park First Congregational church. Five services were broadcast over the radio and were known to have been heard as far west as Colorado. Hundreds of newspaper clippings have been received, coming from all parts of the country." It was indeed an important gathering. In the words of one of the speakers, Alva W. Taylor, "No more prophetic activity is on foot today than that of the social service commissions, joining, as they are, under the Federal Council and local Church Federation auspices to lead capital and labor to sit down with one another, together with the religious and social leaders, to talk it over. Men with whom the Christian spirit has carried through will be willing not only to talk it over, but to do their best to get into the other man's shoes and see the thing from his angle. They will be willing to meet one another on the basis of personal sacrifice rather than on that of personal self-interest. The striking anomaly in these attempts at conference under united church auspices is the fact that labor leaders, who seldom or never attend church, have been more willing to accept the overtures than have business men who regularly attend. It would seem strange that some excellent churchmen can reserve their personal affairs from such Christian intervention on behalf of industrial peace."

The second conference referred to was of a very different character, and was under the auspices of the Chicago Council of Religious Education, which is also a department of the Chicago Church Federation. This conference, held on Monday, Jan. 25, had to do with "the fine arts in religion" with Prof. H. Augustine Smith of Boston university as the chief speaker and conference leader. There is reason to believe that this conference will do much to lend new beauty and dignity to many services of worship in churches and church schools in Chicago.

Dr. and Mrs. Melbourne P. Boynton of Woodlawn are on the Pacific coast. In Seattle Doctor Boynton has been conducting special services for the First church of which Dr. Ambrose Bailey is pastor. Before returning to Chicago he is to preach in First church of San Francisco (a former pastorate) and Oakland.—Dr. Perry J. Stackhouse broadcast a drama sermon, "Thomas, the Twin," on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 7, from Station KYW. This drama sermon with twelve others written by Doctor Stackhouse will appear in a new book to be published by the American Baptist Publication Society, probably early in the spring. This will be Doctor Stackhouse's fourth book.—Mr. John Charles Wanamaker, pastor of the West Elmhurst branch of the Wheaton church, was ordained Jan. 15.—Bethany and Galilee churches recently held receptions for their new pastors, Rev. Burrill R. Hutto and Rev. A. O. Odegard.—Mr. Alfred C. Karmouche has been engaged to open up work among the Jews in Chicago under the auspices of the Baptist Executive Council. The Garfield Park church will be the center of Mr. Karmouche's activities.—Ninety-three Chinese students in various Baptist Sunday schools of Chicago held a great union meeting on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 31, with Englewood.

West China Letter

BY JOE TAYLOR

We are having, or perhaps by this time one should say, we have been having, another war in China. And as this letter has a long way to travel and will not be printed until this year is three months old, one should also say that we may be having another war in China. Indeed, it is possible to use all the tenses usually given in a self-respecting book of grammar. When one lives in topsy-turvydom, he must be prepared for anything or everything; and China is peculiarly topsy-turvy at this time; the future will reveal what she will look like when the bits left over have been picked up and the dust swept away and China will be China. It must seem slow and prosy to the dwellers in Europe and America to have to live in order and peace. Out here one will never be allowed to rust away; for he will find enough to keep him awake and hard at it.

But to come back to "de war." I started off like a whirlwind, for Sun Chuang Fang, the starter, is nothing unless he is swift. He simply blew up from Chekiang, incidentally calling on Shanghai, rushed on to Nanking and was half way up to the Shantung border when the next news came off the press. He is some boy, that same Sun. Well, the forces of Chang Tso Lin managed to keep ahead of him and there was little fighting until they were caught at Hsuehowfu, a railroad ganglion. They had to give that up and move on into Shantung where they were again attacked and did some more "moving on." About that time, some of Chang Tso Lin's troops rebelled and formed an army to attack him. They have been doing this in Manchuria, and, if one dare to believe the press reports, the old ex-bandit, Chang Tso Lin, is about hors d'combat; but the old fox has apparently been run to earth more than once only to come out of another hole that the dog had not discovered. We had better "wait and see."

China and Feudality

But one or two things are evident and can be seen without the aid of field glasses. And the first is: China is being rapidly feudalized. If the reader will remember the trend of events since 1911—the year of the Chinese revolution, when the "republic" was born—he will see that the feudalizing process has been going on for about fifteen years; but that it has been speeded up during the last third of that time. Sun Yat Sen became president; but gave way to Yuan Shi Kai who determined to found a monarchy and did so; then he died and there was a scramble for what he left. A strong man got possession of Yunnan, another took over control of Kwangtung and spread out to Kwanghsi. Then some one got control of Chekiang, some one else settled down in Nanking, and some one took over Hupeh, while another was rifling Hunnan. And Chang Tso Lin staked out Manchuria as his private preserve. Once in awhile a shake-up would occur in the form of civil war and the chessboard would look different. But Chang Tso Lin "castled" and stayed in his corner in Manchuria. Wu Pei Fu attacked him and would have "mated" him but lost his knight when Feng Yu hang turned against him and refused to fight. Now Feng is lord of a big slice of China, Wu Pei Fu is in "the wilderness" and Sun Chuang Fang is fastened on Kiangsu. One of Chang Tso Lin's generals has turned against him and is fighting for Manchuria. Significantly, Japan has despatched troops to Manchuria to sit on the side lines and see who is going to kick the goal. Here in Szechuan, we are treated to a cabal of present which seems to be afraid to agree on anything except a demand for several millions of dollars.

The student of things Chinese can clearly see that these barons are doing just what their medieval prototypes did in Europe in the middle ages. By a system of feudalization, each is endeavoring to get control of as much of the country as possible. To do this he must have the allegiance of several lesser barons. These lesser chiefs in turn have their followers who depend on the greater power for protection and in turn give their support in time of battle to their overlords. It all means that China is under a form of personal government. None of these barons can speak for any of the others. The central "government" is the weakest of the lot. At present, it is taking its orders from Feng Yu hang. I read the other day that Dwan Jui had sent a messenger up to Peking with a list of names for a cabinet. Feng approved, he (Chwan) would receive a presidential mandate announcing that appointment of the new cabinet. Think of a self-respecting statesman being at the beck and call of a military strap! If it were not so tragical it would be laughable and beat a Gilbert and Sullivan opera all hollow.

One of the Chengtu city papers carried these two items of news about three weeks ago: "On the fourteenth, in the evening, on Tung-chen-ken-kai, two soldiers seized a young woman and tried to ravish her. The woman defended herself and they shot her in the breast and then died. Afterward, the police office sent the woman to a hospital for medical attention." "Yesterday evening soldiers killed a woman on Tsing-kueh-luh because she resisted them when they tried to ravish her." This is what the military have brought this city to. The very people who are supposed to exist for the defense of the weak are attempting to assault them and when opposed kill their victims. Personal government cannot succeed; but as long as this country is not crossed with it, any protection that foreigners, especially foreign women and girls, have should not be bartered away. It may be easy to argue theoretically for the abolition of extra-territoriality; but the real facts in China hardly back up a doctrinaire statement about it. The real name of China is that these overlords have saddled themselves and their armies as parasites upon this people, and there does not seem to be any force strong enough to drive them away. These people no longer have an opportunity for the pursuit of life, liberty and happiness.

Chengtu, Jan. 6, 1926.

Religious Education

The present stage of progress in the week-day church school movement is one worthy of careful study. In many communities where two or more years ago it was heralded as the hope of the church, it is now suffering its ebb tide. Most of these places are the victims of over-zealous promoters who have loaded their citizenry with phenomenal budgets, running into the thousands of dollars. The result is failure to raise the money, discouragement and, temporarily, retrogression. Milwaukee and environs have tried to obviate this difficulty. Under the Council of Churches the churches of various faiths are cooperating to bring about a wide use of the provision whereby children are dismissed for religious training one hour each week. The beginnings are slow. The schools are small. There is no inclination to march in torchlight procession about it. Several of our Baptist churches are getting into the movement, notably Grace, Underwood Memorial, South church and Tabernacle.

Dr. D. W. Hulburt at Woodlawn has a school that is in every way unique. His instruction is based on the pamphlet which the pastor published some thirty years ago and has revised several times since. This is entitled "Convert Culture." It is a splendid course for the preparation of young people for church membership. They go through the Bible to get the various biblical statements of belief in the great verities of religion. Then the pastor talks on these beliefs as they arise. All kinds of interesting questions have been discussed in this way. It is especially fitted to the community in which he works. He will gladly furnish copies to any one desiring them.

Lincoln and Our Chains

By ARTHUR E. COWLEY

O LINCOLN, lover of mankind,
Come back, for we have strayed,
Through love of ease our eyes are blind,
Come, grant us once again, thine aid.

Teach us, anew, thy rugged love
Of simple virtues, gentle deeds.
Come, as of old, yet from above,
Stoop to our weakness and our needs.

Strike from soft hands
These golden chains;
Snap from our wrists the jeweled bands,
Save us, too willing slaves of gaudy gains.

Emancipate us from the snare
Of snobbish power and plan;
Give us thy spirit, till WE dare
Claim for OUR brother, every man.

Catechumen and Catechisms

These have a long and honorable history in the church. When large groups of heathen people were to be received into the primitive church they had to be given insight into the nature of the Christian religion. In most of our sacramentarian churches it is the grist-mill process by which the children of Christian parents are inducted into the church. How it does stick in the minds of some pastors! It is hard to get many churches and pastors to see that what religious education intends to do is to prepare boys and girls to live the Christian life. At best the catechism can but prepare them for union with the church. Dr. L. C. Barnes recently stated that 80 per cent of the Christians of Milwaukee are avowedly of the sacramentarian branches of the Christian church. Evangelical Protestantism has its battles to fight yet in the average American city.

Evangelism Over the State

Several of our pastors are exchanging services with good results. Recently Rev. C. C. Browne, director of religious education, was loaned to the little church at Lancaster. Eleven conversions and a wonderful spiritual tonic for the church resulted. Pastor Salter of Appleton is being loaned in a similar way to the rural field at Wild Rose. Rev. R. N. McDonald of Beloit will help at Dodgeville. Thus some of our stronger churches scripturally "bear the burdens of the weak." At Kendall the return of the former pastor, Rev. J. M. Wilson, has brought new life and a gracious work is going on. This field was nearly lost a year ago. Menomonie recently had an awakening of new interest with the visit of Rev. Kirby Chapman of Marinette.

Michigan News

By MINNIE L. KENTON

Many of our Michigan churches have been experimenting with surprising and very satisfying results, and these results we are glad to pass on to others. Pastor Wright of Calvary church, Muskegon, holds shop meetings each week, and estimates that he reaches at least a thousand men in this way. He is also carrying on a ministry among the Jews. Incidentally, the members find that their building must be enlarged to accommodate their audiences and their growing Sunday school.

First church, Kalamazoo, celebrated the ninetieth anniversary of its organization Feb. 14-15. Dr. J. E. Smith, state executive secretary, who was pastor of the church for eleven years, preached Sunday morning, and Dr. M. W. Haynes, another former pastor, in the evening. At a recent evening service, the Young People's Council sent invitations to about 450 young people to be their guests for lunch at six o'clock, and then attend the evening service to hear Dr. Frederic Goëdrich of Albion college deliver an address on the topic; "Is the Bible a Book for Young People?" The result was most gratifying.

Pastor Harold Slocum has adopted this program, which seems to be meeting the needs in Corunna: Sunday evening at six o'clock the young people meet and a member conducts the first half hour, using the topics in the Young People's Leader, then the pastor has half an hour, using as the basis of his talk, "Young People and the Church." At seven, the evening service program is varied, using sermons, talks by young people, musical programs and stereopticon lectures, stressing inspiration and evangelism, and following the service there is a fellowship hour, with refreshments. For their prayer meetings, they have a once-a-month church family night, meeting at seven o'clock for pot-luck supper; devotional meeting at eight o'clock, and a social hour at nine o'clock—food, faith and fellowship, their motto for this meeting. Attendance, especially at Sunday school and B. Y. P. U., has greatly increased.

Rev. Donald T. Grey, during his some more than five years pastorate has seen his work at Lansing develop from a small mission to an independent church of more than 220 members. The Sunday school now is obliged to hold three sessions; one class meets in an abandoned automobile body (formerly used as a traveling grocery store) set up in the rear of the church. This comfortable "room" has stove heat and electric lights. A campaign of visitation evangelism resulted in several baptisms.

Rev. W. F. Dissette recently received twelve members into the South church, Lansing, by baptism. The young people presented the church with a beautiful service flag, having four stars, in honor of the young men who have entered the ministry from the church. A new organ, which is given by the members in honor of the mothers, will be dedicated February 28. Rev. Ralph W. Hobbs, of First church has been asked to preach the sermon. Mr. Dissette recently gave an interesting talk to the high-school department of First church on "The Ministry," one of the topics in the class studies.

Music has an important place in the program of the Benton Harbor church, of which Rev. Herbert Winston Hansen is pastor. The May Tompkins Chapter W. W. G. presented the church with a table and chair for the prayer-meeting room. A nursery is maintained for the children during the morning service.

Pastor F. E. Carey has received seventy-four additions to the Dearborn church in the less than a year of his pastorate. Dr. H. A. Smoot of Kansas City has closed a successful fifteen-day evangelistic campaign, which has proved a great spiritual uplift to the church.

The Story of a Bell

From Grass Lake comes this item of interest. From 1860 to 1918, the bell in the Baptist church steeple regularly called the members to worship. In this latter year the Baptists and Congregationalists united and held services in the Congregational church. Then both churches were destroyed by fire—the intense heat melted and spoiled the bell in the Congregational church; but the old Baptist bell across the way fell from the blazing steeple into the ashes, and was later taken out unharmed. Now it has been hung in the new Federated church building, and again peals forth its invitations to worship every Sunday.

Rev. D. Martin has entered his tenth year as pastor at Bad Axe, and was given a very substantial increase in salary for the coming year, which goes to prove that there are still some sensible members left in our churches. As a result of special meetings in which Dan Shannon assisted, there have been nearly twenty additions to the church.

Dr. Henry H. Ford drew large crowds to the special meetings held in Conlay Memorial church, Detroit, by using choirs of negro singers—a different choir each evening. There were many conversions.

Pastoral Changes

Rev. Joseph Priest has resigned the pastorate at Sturgis to take charge of the ministers' home at Fenton during the year's absence of Miss Lou LaTourette, the superintendent.

Rev. H. B. Pilcher, for nearly three years director of religious education in First church, Lansing, has accepted the call of the Community Baptist church, Dover, Idaho, and will begin his work there March 1. Mr. Pilcher put on a progressive program in the First church, notably, the organization of a high-school department in the Sunday school, together with a thorough organization of the school along departmental lines. He was an active worker in the Lansing Council of Religious Education. He will be both pastor and director in his new field.

Rev. George W. Lawrence, for several years director of town and country work for the Michigan State Convention, will assume pastorate of the Owosso church, Mar. 1. This church has been pastorless since the resignation of Rev. Harvey Waite, Nov. 15.

Rev. C. P. Kirby, formerly of Elkhart, Ind., began his pastorate with Cadillac church, Jan. 31.

Gorham Street church, Jackson, called a council on Jan. 29, for the purpose of ordaining the pastor, L. M. Thompson. Dr. W. B. Hartzog, Mason, was elected moderator, and O. B. Ansted of Rives Junction, clerk. Forty-four delegates representing eighteen churches were present. A thorough examination was made of the candidate's fitness for the gospel ministry. Ordination service was held in the evening, and Rev. J. W. Thompson of Georgetown, Ky. (father of the candidate), preached the sermon, and was also pastor of one of the delegates, Mrs. Ella Kelley of Columbia church, now past ninety years of age.

Montana News and Notes

By ROBERT W. SHAW

Looking at the map of Montana one would hardly suppose that it took twenty-four hours for a fast train on the Northern Pacific to cross it from east to west. But such is the case for it is 767 miles from the Idaho line to North Dakota. Until about nine months ago was 150 miles from the eastern line before one came to the First Baptist church which was at Miles City. But now have a church organization at Glend a railroad town, but they have no building and must be supported as a missionary proposition for a long time.

At Miles City we have a good church but it is still in the mission stage, though it hopes soon to become self-supporting. Pastor R. D. Brittain has been located here for several years and the work has grown under his leadership. Here is headquarters for two of our district workers, and the districts stretch as far north and south for more than a hundred miles. These district missionaries have from four to seven preaching stations in their districts using homes, school houses and halls for meeting places. This territory has been allocated to Baptists and they are responsible for it. Rev. Olaf Sutherland and Rev. J. Dryden are the efficient workers.

One hundred miles farther to the west we come to Billings. Here we have one of our best churches. A few years ago they undertook to build a modern church plant. They have now the educational and social unit, though this is not complete. The depression and a bad failure have handicapped them in their plans. This is the only modern educational plant the Baptists have in Montana. Dr. W. Holt Smith is an efficient pastor.

The Crow Indians

South of Billings is the famous Lost Grass mission among the Crow Indians under the leadership of Rev. W. Pedzoldt. Rev. R. O. Shannon is in charge of the work among the white people living on the reservation. Ten miles west of Billings at Laural we have a small church whose members are heroically endeavoring to hold the fort. Rev. C. L. Nilson is the pastor. A few miles just north of the Crow Indian reservation and near to the old Custer battlefield we have a small church at Hardin with Rev. C. R. Norwood as pastor. They have a new church building.

One hundred miles west of Billings is Livingston, a railroad town. Here we have a self-supporting church with Rev. T. D. Huxley as the minister. Twenty-eight miles farther west and over the divide is Bozeman, one of the best of our Montana churches. Here is the seat of the Montana State College, with approximately 1000 students each year. For years they have struggled with a troublesome debt and just now have come to a place where the debt is practically wiped out. Just beyond this place are Belgrade and Manhattan, two small villages each with a Baptist church. Rev. Roy E. Reece is holding the fort here as well as at Dry Creek a country appointment. The work is taking on new life and the churches are encouraged.

One hundred miles farther to the west is Helena where J. F. McNamee has served for twenty-five years. For a church in a capitol city our church has is not what it should be, though it of our good churches. On the cut-off is Butte, the largest mining camp in the world. Here we have a good building located down town. Rev. C. O'Farrell has just left this field. The population is a moving one, and it makes the work difficult. At Missoula which is near by we have two churches where one would be sufficient. The English church is small with a modest plant, and our Swedish church is much better.

One hundred miles farther to the west is Missoula, the seat of the university with Dr. Henry Van Engelen as pastor. A new building is imperative if the Baptists are to hold their own in this growing university center. To the south of Hamilton and Stevensville, two small towns where H. H. Longenecker serves a fine teaching school. He also serves a small country point called Victor.

Nearby is Darby, where E. Clutterbuck has been for some time. We have a good church here, and by reason of our Montana plan the church is a sort of a community church. A community hall was recently dedicated.

South of Butte is Dillon, the seat of the Normal School, where we have a small church and a little box building. Here Rev. E. L. Hurley has wrought well, but how much better he could do if he had the right kind of a building in which to work. He has 100 prospective teachers to minister to.

Montana is still one of the Home Mission States. Its opportunities are limitless, but the people are pioneers and at such distances from the railroads the church centers that their interest in the work of the churches is passive. It is said that Baptists bring everything they have to Montana except their church memberships, which they have mostly in Missouri.

The Mother of Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougher

Mrs. Euphemia R. Brougher, the mother of Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougher, passed to her reward on Saturday night, Feb. 13. She made her home with her daughter, Mrs. Chas. I. Beecher at Jackson, Calif.

She was born Nov. 27, 1842, at Madison, Ind. Her husband, Frederick C. Brougher, died about twenty-five years ago while visiting his son, Doctor Brougher, at Paterson, N. J. Mrs. Brougher, therefore, has been a widow many years. She had good health until about a year ago at which time she had to undergo an operation for a stomach tumor. About six weeks ago the operation had to be repeated. In referring to her Doctor Brougher says: "She was cheerful and hopeful and expected to rally from the operation and until I completed my speaking tour of the denomination. Nevertheless she said to me, 'My son, if I should pass before you get back do not break your speaking engagements to return to California for my funeral. My daughter and the grandchildren can look after laying my body away. If you should come back I will not be here for I will be at home with the Lord. You would find only my body here and it is far more important that you should attend to the work of the Lord that you have been especially called to render at this time. The King's business requireth haste and you must be about our Father's business. It is my earnest desire that you keep right on filling your appointments and not disappoint the people who are expecting you and wanting to hear your message. If I should leave this tabernacle of flesh before you return I will be at home with the Lord and be waiting there to welcome you. I love and appreciate all my children and grandchildren—they are so kind and good to me, but I am especially grateful and praise the Lord for giving me three preacher boys—you and Russell and James, Jr. I pray for you all every day that you may preach the word with power and win many for Christ and his church. Tell Russell and James, Jr., always to be loyal to the Word of God and I am sure with the talents they have Christ will make them efficient ministers of his and greatly honor them in his service. I am continually praying that you may have the needed strength for the great task that you have before you.'

"It was in response to this wish," said Doctor Brougher, "that I did not return to California to attend my mother's funeral. I am doing exactly what she wanted me to do. She was a wonderful Christian. She was loyal to Christ, the Bible, her church and her pastor. In all my life I never heard her or my father, who was also an earnest Christian, criticize their pastor or their church. They belonged to the old-fashioned family-altar, praying and living Christian type. My mother's unwavering faith, sincere love, and high ideals, combined with her prayers, made me a preacher and have continually inspired and upheld me in my ministry. She had a Christ-like spirit, trusted her heavenly Father implicitly and loved all of God's children. She was kind and forgiving, generous and hospitable, cheerful and patient, unselfish and self-sacrificing. She had a keen sense of humor, enjoyed telling and hearing a good story, and was naturally sociable. She was a good mixer. She was a devoted mother, a beautiful Christian, a loyal faithful church member and a sweet noble woman."

Her life was completed in many ways years ago. She lived in these later days for her children and grandchildren only. She had her highest wish gratified in seeing her son, now Dr. James Whitcomb Brougher, become a preacher. Her cup of joy overflowed when her two grandsons decided to enter the ministry. One of them, Russell Morse Brougher, is the honored young pastor of the First Baptist church, Paterson, N. J. He is one of the successors of his father, in this great church. The other grandson is James Whitcomb Brougher, Jr., a promising young preacher, and a student at Newton Theological Seminary. All of "Mother Brougher's" children and grandchildren join heart and voice in thanking God for the memory of her Christian life and character. They rise up to praise her and call her blessed.

Letter from India

By W. L. FERGUSON

Yesterday a party of seventy American tourists arrived in Madras by the morning train; they hopped into taxicabs and began to "do" the city,—we have only 520,000 people here, and cover an area of more than thirty square miles—and by two o'clock p. m. they had "done" the place, and by three o'clock they were aboard a special train bound southward, for Madras and its historic temples, which they propose to "do" and then proceed to Ceylon. One wonders what this sort of hop-skip-and-jump method of going around the world can do for its votaries. What do they see, and what can they remember to have seen—really to have seen? I do not know what they were shown in Madras, of course, for they were under the pilotage of a professional tourist guide; but if they were spending a worthwhile period here, they might have seen some such things as these.

Fort St. George, which is the oldest possession of the British on this coast; St. Mary's church, within the fort, which is the oldest English church in India; its interior, which is a sort of Westminster Abbey for South India; the wonderful tablets erected to the memory of governors, generals, colonels, captains and civilians; the mammoth tablet erected to the memory of Christian Frederick Schwartz, Christian missionary and regent of Tanjore, with its elaborate inscription reciting the history and achievements of this great man—the chief monument in the church; the "Last Supper"—a beautiful painting of extraordinary size, which has a history connected with warfare between the British and the French for possession of these regions; the monument to the infant son of the Honorable Elihu Yale, founder or rather patron of Yale college in colonial America, and one time governor of the East India Company, resident in Madras; the statue of Lord Cornwallis and a fountain to his memory—the Cornwallis who surrendered at Yorktown, Pa., and so brought the Revolutionary War to a close—who was afterward commander-in-chief of the King's Forces in India, and governor-general; the cathedral of St. Thomas the apostle, who is said to have preached the gospel in these parts and to have been martyred just outside the city; the many fine colleges of arts, law, medicine, engineering and applied science; the missions with their churches, schools and hospitals; the lighthouse tower from which a panoramic view of the city can be had; the harbor, one of the best in all the Orient; and dozens of other objects of interest. None of these things seem to have crossed the vision of these tourists. The news item about them says they went to the aquarium, to the park, to the museum and the high court; and then they skipped for the next place, Madura. As Mr. Kipling says, (but not about Americans specifically), "Laws! wot do they understand?" They were on the most historic spot in all this part of Asia, so far as recent centuries are concerned, where the final battles for empire were fought by Franks and Anglo-Saxons, where Yale, and Clive, and Munro, and hundreds of others who have achieved have done their bit and their great best; but all the tourists seem to have seen in Madras was fish, fossils, a park with a zoo, and the high court of this Presidency of Madras. How much of what they saw will stick and be an abiding possession?

A Big Conference

The missionaries of the American Baptist Telugu mission met in Ongole for their annual conference at the close of the old year and continued over into the new for five days. The task of entertaining a gathering so large as this has come to be heavy, and more and more is it becoming difficult to obtain invitations for the assembly to meet at the mission stations, now one, now another. This year a new plan was adopted. Instead of having a common dining shed or room in which all would be seated and served, the conference was broken into parties, some of which catered for themselves, and others of which were cared for by the families living in the mission bungalows. The plan worked well; but many felt that this was not the final or the ideal way of solving the problem. What is needed is a permanent meeting place for the conference, say at Ramapatnam, where there is ample space for the gathering, and where permanent kitchens, dining-room, storerooms, etc., could be provided, and the conference tables, dishes, cutlery, and such equipment might be stored. The present method of shipping these things from station to station year after year is expensive and destructive, for breakages and losses are heavy. The only thing which stands in the way of having a permanent meeting place is lack of funds to provide it with the equipment required.

Many and thorny were the problems tackled, and few were the decisions reached. We rejoiced in the news that the home churches had successfully completed the Lone Star fund; but were sobered when we recalled that this did not permit us to increase our work by as much as one solitary worker. The success achieved simply means that for the present we are able to hold the line and not retreat or yield stations, fields or institutions which have cost years and years of prayer, labor and energy. What we need is a strong advance in our work. We are ready for it, and India is ready; but the "sinews of war" are lacking. When will our American Baptist churches reach the bottom of this financial decline and begin to strengthen their foreign mission cords and to strengthen their stakes? All plans for advancement, which involve increased expenditure, had to be shelved, and tentative consideration had to be given to a further combining of stations and work in case the order to retrench comes out from the boards.

Bright spots there were in the conference. The times of prayer and devotion were both solemn and stimulating; the ministry of music and song was beautiful and abundant; the reports of missionaries were interesting, so far as we had time to hear them, but business robbed more than half the members of a chance to be heard; and the total number of baptisms occurring on all the fields of the great Telugu mission was "the best in forty years." 6700 was the number given as the preliminary total. The final figures may be a bit below or above this amount. We have held on; we have struggled under great limitations; we have won so far; but what of the future? How far can we go on reducing staff? How long can we wait for new men and women to be sent? What provision is to be made for these new thousands whom the Lord is giving to us annually, that they may be instructed in the "all things" of Christ and be built up in him, a spiritual house? These are searching questions, and it is for the churches at home as well as for the missionaries on the field to give answer, and in such a way that the kingdom shall not suffer loss.

Doctor Rohrbach in America

BY FRANCIS C. STIFLER

Among the sojourners in the Chicago Association for the next three months is Dr. Ernest A. Rohrbach of Stockholm, Sweden. He is here primarily to see his aged parents and especially his mother who has been very ill for over a year. Dr. and Mrs. Julius Rohrbach, the parents, are residents of Wilmette where they make their church home.

Dr. Ernest Rohrbach was born in England and was educated partly in Germany and partly in England. For more than twenty years he has been serving Christ in Sweden. For a large part of that time he was pastor of a prominent free church in Stockholm. Latterly he has been engaged in evangelistic work for the Y. M. C. A., of Sweden. He preaches fluently in three languages—English, German and Swedish.

In the course of his ministry Doctor Rohrbach spent some time in Burma in connection with the American Baptist work there and has 100 slides made from his visit there.

Dr. C. E. Benander, president of the Bethel Baptist Seminary and vice-president of the Baptist World Alliance, has furnished Doctor Rohrbach with a most cordial letter recommending him to the Baptist brethren of the United States and Prince O. Bernadotte, brother of the present king of Sweden, commends him with equal earnestness to all Americans.

Doctor Rohrbach is anxious to be of service where he may during his visit and is prepared to do either evangelistic work or tell of the kingdom progress in Sweden or as he saw it in Burma. He may be addressed at his father's home, 1123 Linden Ave., Wilmette, Ill., or through Dr. A. E. Peterson, 2328 S. Michigan Blvd., Chicago.

In the Heart of Burma

BY WILLIAM G. EVANS

SEVERAL months ago I applied to the Foreign Society for a loan of Rs. 1000 to enable the Telugu Christians to build a small chapel for their service. As a result of the favorable action of the board of managers, we were to proceed with the erection of the church, and I am glad to report that the building is completed and on Sunday, Oct. 18, it was dedicated. We began the day and the dedicatory service of the church, by having a special meeting, with a hymn, Scripture reading and prayer; then we journeyed to a lake nearby where I had the privilege of baptizing five Telugu men. To me this was an impressive service of dedicating the new church and I wish you could have been present to see and hear for yourself. As the Telugu Christians marched back to the church singing their religious hymns, they showed very clearly how happy they were because they were able to have their own church building at last. They had been renting from a non-Christian Burman for some time previous, and this had not been at all satisfactory; in fact at times it had been very unpleasant. But all is changed now, and I want to assure you that they greatly appreciate the kindness of all who have made their new building possible.

The Communion Service

Shortly after the baptismal service we had our communion service. I was joined by our Karen Christians and this was a delightful service indeed. To see so many Indians and Karens who had responded to the invitation of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ and to see what a remarkable change it makes in the lives of the natives of India or Burma, was in itself a sight really worth while. This truly added to the impressiveness of the dedicatory services, and we were all very grateful to God for all that he has done for us.

At four o'clock in the afternoon we had an open meeting. At this service our Karen Christians joined us again and also the Chinese M. E. church and the pastor of Mergui, as well as some of our Anglican friends, including a pastor from Rangoon who was in Mergui for a few days. We also had the honor of having with us Mr. and Mrs. J. Anderson. Mr. Anderson is the commissioner of Tenasserim division with headquarters in Moulmein, but he was in Mergui on official business, and readily consented to come to the service and speak a few words to us. The Andersons are very fine Christian people, Scotch Presbyterian, and are a great influence for good wherever they go. He gave us a very helpful and encouraging address, and the Indian people were proud to have this high government official present at their church dedication. (I should think Mr. Anderson's position would correspond to that of governor of one of our states.) T

West Virginia is not the easiest place to arouse a countryside to active interest in a religious meeting in mid-winter. The people are earnest and faithful Baptists, but the difficulties of winter travel in that region of mountains and forests and swift streams are very great. With the best of intentions, church members often find themselves unable to get to denominational rallies. Therefore when the series of Brougher meetings arranged for West Virginia proved to be extraordinarily successful in point of attendance, those who had planned the meetings were well pleased indeed. Secretary Kelley writes in a letter, "We have just closed what I regard as the most helpful series of meetings in many years. The attendance was large and the people were enthusiastic. It was a fine piece of kingdom work when you secured Doctor Brougher's consent, and that of his church in Los Angeles to give this six months' period of time to a tour of the Northern Baptist Convention in the interest of the united missionary program."

At the four meetings in West Virginia, at which there was a total attendance of 4500 Baptists, resolutions were adopted as follows: First that the representatives of the Baptist churches in West Virginia extend their appreciation to Doctor Brougher for his "strong, helpful, unifying missionary messages"; and second that they pledge him and the denomination united and earnest effort in carrying into effect the message he brought them. In the true "play ball" spirit, they resolved to do their best "to bring West Virginia in on the home base by April 30, 1926."

Another place where Doctor Brougher "came, saw, and conquered" was Sparta, Mich. Representatives of about twenty Baptist churches in western Michigan were thrilled by the message which he brought them there on Jan. 26, and they too adopted resolutions pledging wholehearted support to the missionary program of the Northern Baptist Convention.

In connection with the special Christmas offering, of which the women's organizations had charge, Miss Ina Burton makes the following announcement of comparative results:

Largest gifts from local churches—

First, Lake Avenue Baptist church, Rochester, N. Y.; second, United Baptist church, Saco, Maine.

States making largest gifts—New York; second, Michigan; third, Connecticut.

District making largest gift—England.

"Less than five years ago," writes Allyn K. Foster, concerning Keuka College, "this institution was closed. What the effort was made under the leadership of Dr. A. H. Norton to revive interest in the college, as usual, proved declared that it could not be. The college, under Doctor Norton's leadership, has completed its fourth year and is on the fifth. There are two new buildings, magnificent in structure and appointments, a dormitory for women, an administration building with classrooms. This equipment represents expenditure of nearly half a million dollars. Does this look like a dead institution? Doctor Norton and his faithful associates had set the marks, with eye of faith, and considerable faith that, of 200 students by 1931. There are present 205 students and as fine a group of young women as I have encountered in any college in America."

THE SELF-DENIAL BANK

Not only our missions but those who give to missions are benefited by the plan of a designated self-denial period. Last year, when special emphasis was lent to the week so set apart by the use of paper savings banks in which the Easter offering was accumulated, the expressions of approval were many. This year, with the whole month of March dedicated to self-denial, Northern Baptists are to have a more attractive and slightly larger carton to serve as a bank. Its panels bear designs printed in two colors, appropriate to the purpose and bright enough to make it unlikely that the relation of self-denial month to our missionary work will be overlooked in any house where one of these banks is established on the living room table. Enough of the banks have been distributed through state offices to provide one for every Northern Baptist family.

BURG, S. D., HAS dedicated a new organ costing $6000.

THE WILLIAM JEWELL alumni in Chicago recently met and elected Dr. J. R. Stey, professor in the Northern Baptist Theological seminary, as president, and D. J. Evans of Kansas City was president with them. Dr. H. C. Wayman, president of William Jewell, is to be president at their next meeting.

MEMORIAL CHURCH, Williamsport, Pa., has dedicated a fine large pipe organ. Decorating and other improvements are going on. The Sunday-school attendance is about 400. Seventy-six were in the men's class Sunday, Jan. 31. Baptisms have been frequent.

REGIONAL CONFERENCE of the Y. W. C. A., which included delegates from Springfield, W. Va. Institute, Morgan and Ward, held a three-day session at their college. The students of Storer are supporting a student in Africa, thus helping where they cannot go.

ANY CHURCHES, prior to conducting preaching or lay evangelistic campaigns, have found it helpful to conduct a school of evangelism. They have used this purpose the regular mid-week meeting of the church for a period of from four to six weeks. Pastors desirous of doing this may receive a copy of "A School of Evangelism" by addressing Rev. H. F. Stilwell, general superintendent of evangelism of the American Baptist Home Mission Society at 1132 Schofield Building, Cleveland.

TEN NEW MEMBERS were enrolled in the day night Bible class in Immanuel church, Elgin, Ill., taught by Rev. T. L. Spens. This brings the number up to eighty-one. The goal is set for 100 and it is expected to be reached in a month.

TEN PERSONS were welcomed into the membership of Delaware Street church, New York, N. Y., at the communion service on Feb. 7. This makes a total of two new members who have been received since last Easter, twenty-seven baptisms. The children's church was organized last November and reached an average attendance of over sixty. The school is conducted under the direction of the director of religious education, Miss Elsa Berg.

TH PARK CHURCH, Los Angeles, Calif., Dr. Gordon Palmer, pastor, reported at its annual meeting, recently held, that 1207 new members received into the church during the year 1925; of this number 101 came by baptism, eighty-five by letter and twenty-four by experience. The average attendance at the church meetings exceeds 100.

ST CHURCH, Reynoldsville, Pa., Rev. K. Crossman, pastor, is having a church night service every Wednesday night for six weeks. The weekly program is a supper and fellowship hour; a church school of missions with classes for adults, young people and juniors; a devotional period; and a teacher training class.

THE ANNUAL MEETING of the Manayunk church, Philadelphia, was a pleasing function. The union of the Mt. Vernon and Manayunk churches has been a very happy one, and Dr. G. Morton Walker has led a united people in ways of prosperity. In round numbers $20,000 has been given for all purposes during the year and a score of new members have been added to the church.

A NEW COURSE in contemporary world politics will be given during the second semester at Carleton college, Northfield, Minn., by Dr. David Bryn-Jones, pastor of Trinity Baptist church, Minneapolis. Doctor Bryn-Jones has been on the faculty of the college since 1920. Last year he wished to resign to devote more of his time to his church, but the resignation of one of Carleton's outstanding faculty members left a vacancy hard to fill, and Doctor Bryn-Jones was prevailed upon to remain as professor of economics and political science.

A SERIES of articles on the English language by Lionel Crocker is now appearing in the Japan Advertiser. These lectures were first given at Waseda university where Mr. Crocker was associated with Mr. Benninghoff.

FOLLOWING A RECENT revival at the church at Belle Haven, in Prince William county, Va., a congregation that had been without a pastor for many years, twenty persons professed faith in Christ. When the time came for baptismal services, they preferred to be baptized in an open stream, although there was snow on the ground at the time and the water was icy cold.

REV. F. W. PEAKES has resigned the pastorate of Lincoln Park church, West Newton, Mass., and become pastor of the East Poultney, Vt., church.

ON SUNDAY, JAN. 31, the new building of the Mexican Baptist church at Banning, Calif., was dedicated in the afternoon, and the new Mexican church at Colton, Calif., was dedicated in the evening. Dr. W. F. Harper, convention secretary, gave addresses at both places.

FIRST CHURCH, Phoenix, Ariz., has purchased additional property, giving a frontage of a full block on one street and more than half a block on adjoining side streets. The average attendance at Sunday school is more than 700. A fine new church building will be erected soon.

AFTER FIVE YEARS at Jacksonville, Ill., Pastor A. P. Howells has resigned in order that he and Mrs. Howells may be with their son, Arthur L. Howells who is teaching in Piedmont high school, Oakland, Calif. Mr. Howells has not only large and successful experience in pastoral work but has also been active in the general work of the denomination.

Station WCOY

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You) broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, 2320 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

"This evening we are to have some highlights from the field. Hundreds of pastors are giving their congregations fine publicity materials concerning the paper in their weekly bulletins. We want to present a few of them and let each speak a few words:

"E. LeRoy Dakin, Brooklyn, N. Y., says, 'Every home should subscribe for THE BAPTIST and Missions.'

"Wm. S. Abernethy, Washington, D. C., says, 'Our denominational newsstands contains copies of this week's issue of THE BAPTIST. Get a copy on your way out.'

"G. H. Young, Kalamazoo, Mich., says, 'Next Sunday morning we shall give any in the audience the opportunity to subscribe for any or all of our denominational papers.'

"Johnston Myers, Chicago, says, 'THE BAPTIST is one of the best religious journals published. This good paper will be a blessing to any home. A club is being formed and we will be glad to have our readers join.'

"York A. King, Chicago, says, 'A special campaign is on to increase the number of subscribers for THE BAPTIST and Missions in all the churches in Chicago. The pastor earnestly hopes that these two splendid denominational channels of information and inspiration will be received and read by every family in this great church.'

"Herbert Waldo Hines, Springfield, Ill., says, 'The boys of the Royal Ambassadors and the girls of the Guild are contesting for honors in securing subscriptions for THE BAPTIST and Missions. Give your three dollars to which ever comes first and save yourself a lot of future bother.'

"Clarence Hill Frank, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., says, 'What is going on? Are you in touch with the progress of Christianity in our modern world? You may give your soul some fresh air and good food by reading THE BAPTIST.'

"George Ferguson Finnie, Lewiston, Me., says, 'THE

BAPTIST is a most excellent, all-around, fair, able, informing and interesting publication, coming every week to your home for $2-a-year club rates. There is no other way of being well-informed as to what our denomination is doing in this and other lands.'

"Herbert Ford, First church, Lincoln, Neb., says, 'THE BAPTIST and Missions are our official publications. Their announcement is not made because they are official but because they rank at the very top among religious publications. If taken and read by every family they would at least double the spirituality and efficiency of this church.'

"We would like to present all the state secretaries and have them tell you the fine things they are saying at the time for the paper. Special mention should be made of a whole page given to THE BAPTIST in the February number of the Wisconsin Baptist, edited by Secretary A. Legrand. Also a special article on THE BAPTIST covering one and a fourth pages in the Baptist News of Southern California, edited by Convention Secretary W. F. Harper, in the January-February issue.

"The following communications are stimulating: 'Dear Mr. Cress: Herewith check for $50. Please send paper one year to fifteen old ministers and to ten prisoners. Signed, 'A Layman, Plainfield, N. J.' Also, 'Herewith $106 from Men's Bible Class, Oak Park, Ill., First Baptist church, for fifty-three annual subscriptions for prisoners in the Illinois State Prison at Joliet.'

"The office boy says that in his opinion 'smog' is responsible for the dullness of some people, without mentioning any names. 'Smog' is defined as a combination of smoke and fog. It is of two kinds viz physical and mental. The latter type is more 'fizzekal.' The best antidote for 'smog' is regular reading of THE BAPTIST.

"WCOY now signs off. We will be on the air as usual next week."

Rev. H. B. PILCHER, assistant pastor, First church, Lansing, Mich., has been called to Dover, Idaho. He begins his work March 1.

THE DIVINITY SCHOOL of the University of Chicago is now moving into its partially completed building. Among the lightful activities to be carried on in new quarters will be an informal tea on Thursday afternoon from four to five o'clock. Mrs. J. M. P. Smith was hostess on Feb. 11. Judge Barthelemy, a Roman jurist, of the Juvenile Court of Chicago was the speaker.

FIRST CHURCH, Asbury Park, N. J.,

David A. MacMurray, pastor, the annual business meeting and roll call was held, Feb. 3, afternoon and evening with a supper at 6:30. Rev. Marshall Sewell of Lakewood, N. J., was the speaker at the afternoon session, and Rev. C. E. Goodall, executive secretary of the New Jersey State Convention, was the guest and speaker of the evening. Reports show that the church is making progress in every direction. The ladies' aid society has assumed the raising of $500 toward the budget of the year.

REV. CAREY W. CHAMBERLIN completed twenty years in the pastorate of the First church, Beverly, Mass., on the first Sunday of February. The years have passed swiftly, smoothly and fruitfully. More than 1000 new members have been received. At this anniversary Mr. and Mrs. Chamberlin received many tokens of esteem from the deacons, church societies, Bible school classes and individuals.

LEADERS OF THE First church in Indiana Harbor, cooperating with the workers at Katherine House Christian center are organized to put over a program of activities in the city to stimulate the religious life of the community and thus contribute to the lifting of the life of the people to a higher tone. This has resulted in the forming of a Baptist pastors' and workers' organization, the purpose of which is to stimulate co-operation, and further a more rapid assimilation of the various foreign groups into the real life of this rapidly growing city.

INTERNATIONAL FALLS, MINN., is an important field where the Home Mission Society and the State Convention have spent several thousand dollars. Last June a well-equipped new plant was dedicated here, Rev. Earle D. Sims having labored for several months to that end. Rev. Stewart Bain is the present pastor. As special missionary worker of the convention, Rev. E. L. True was on the field for six months beginning early in July. In November a Christian life mission was held by Rev. Edgar A. Valiant and Pastor Bain, resulting in the addition of thirty new members.

TWO NOTABLE PERSONS died recently at the First church, Philadelphia—Dr. S. Lewis Ziegler, the eminent ophthalmologist, formerly director of public health and charities of Philadelphia; and Mrs. Frances M. Wayland, wife of the late Dr. H. L. Wayland. Mr. Rose, pastor, and Mr. Nichols, assistant, conducted funeral services. President Emory Hunt of Bucknell, where Doctor Ziegler was trustee, and President Evans of Crozer Theological Seminary, assisted in the services for Doctor Ziegler. At Mrs. Wayland's funeral, Mr. Bulson, pastor of the Wayland Memorial church, which Mrs. Wayland built in memory of her husband, and Rev. G. T. Berry, American secretary of the McCall mission in France, which had been a life interest of the deceased, assisted.

A $4,000,000 GOTHIC CHURCH with a tower approximately 400 feet high will be built on Riverside drive opposite Grant's tomb with funds largely furnished by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., to replace the Park Avenue Baptist church, New York City. The tower will overtop all existing church pinnacles, and rise a few feet higher than the spire of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The material probably will be Indiana limestone. Architects have been at work on the plans for two months, but will not complete them for six months more. The church tower or campanile will hold the carillon of fifty-three bells which was given to the Park Avenue church by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., in memory of his mother, Laura Spellman Rockefeller.

IMMANUEL CHURCH of Erie, Pa., M. R.

Sheldon, pastor, has been taking part in a home evangelistic campaign. Members, as in apostolic days, have been going to the homes and winning people to Christ and the church. At the end of two weeks there have been three decisions. Twenty-nine have joined with the church, eighteen by baptism.

BUSINESS WOMEN of Ontario, Calif., guests at a recent Sunday evening service in the First church, when the speaker, W. Earle Smith, spoke on the subject "Selling Your Service in the World Market-places."

AT THE COMMUNION SERVICE Feb. 7, Pastor Smith extended the hand of fellowship to twenty new members at San Diego, Calif. There were 554 communicants. The school of missions opened with an attendance of almost three hundred.

FIRST CHURCH, Olean, N. Y., closed its doors for a week, the services extending over ten days. Pastor Frank Houser did the preaching, assisted for five days by Rev. Arthur Slag, song leader. Sixty-seven converts to Christ. During the past three and a half years Mr. Houser has baptized 377 persons, received more than 500 into the fellowship of the church.

THE LEBANON CHURCH, Pa., has notably increased its apportionment for missionary work about 25 per cent. This action is due in part to missionary education through pictures and lectures.

REV. HUGO BONNAHA, a Yavapai Indian, was ordained, Jan. 26, by the Bethel church of Clarkdale, Ariz., to the office of the gospel ministry. He passed an excellent examination covering the history of his conversion, religious experience, doctrinal belief and call to the ministry.

DR. T. M. HOFMEISTER recently addressed the convention of the Ohio Farm Bureau Federation at University Hall, O., Columbus, Ohio.

SINCE OCT. 1 CONLEY MEMORIAL CHURCH of Highland Park, Mich., has been demonstrating the worth of personal evangelism in a drive for members. On Oct. 10, a banquet was given to fifty-four united with the church recently. Henry H. Ford is the happy pastor.

THE DEMAREST EVANGELISTIC PARTY concluded a campaign under the auspices of Bethel temple, Chicago, Rev. A. L. Fraser, pastor.

MISS ETHEL RYAN, a missionary to the upper Big Horn Crow Indian Mission field in Montana, has been obliged to leave the work temporarily on account of illness. She is now at the Montana Parks Sanitarium in St. Paul for treatment and rest. Miss Ryan's home is in Massachusetts and she was formerly a missionary among the Hopis in Arizona.

REV. A. C. BLINZINGER and wife, chapel car "Grace," have been at San Jose, Calif., for a few weeks. They report a number of conversions and baptisms, and the purchase of a commodious school building and a large lot. The building will be remodeled for church purposes.

ALL EVANGELICAL CHURCHES in Palo Alto, Calif., are joining in their Sunday evening services for a month for the study of missions in Latin-America and among negroes in this country.

FIRST CHURCH, Danville, Ill., had sixty men at a men's Bible class banquet, Feb. 1. The church has also adopted a plan of a church night with good interest and prospects. Pastor John R. Stevens writes that the other Baptist churches of the city are also in encouraging condition.

Dr. HENRY DAY, PASTOR of the Memorial church, Philadelphia, has resigned except at Seventh church, Baltimore. He will go with the good-will of his present charge expressed in warm resolutions.

THE EXPECTED COMING of a pastor to University church, Baltimore, will resign Dr. James S. Kirtley, to repeat elsewhere the work of interim pastor. He has become so skillful in doing. He does not want a permanent pastoral appointment, but while serving a church he has buried himself in the life of the people, and his fine qualification for the office and other duties makes the period of his service a distinctive one in the history of any church.

Rev. H. B. PILCHER has closed his work as pastor of religious education in the church of Lansing, Mich., and become pastor at Dover, Idaho.

L. J. WHITCOMB BROUGHER has rendered a magnificent service to our work in northeastern Ohio. In an association where some of our churches were not wholeheartedly in the denominational work, he has left a magnificent influence. On Feb. 9, over 1200 people greeted him in the First church of Youngstown. For two hours he thrilled the great audience. The next day the pastor, Rev. A. C. Archibald, had six phone calls from people wishing to increase their pledges. Four large conferences were held in the afternoon with a supper which over 200 attended.

AFTER REDECORATION and the installation of a heating plant, the auditorium of the church at St. Clair, Mich., was reopened Feb. 7 with an interesting program covering a week in which many persons and activities were represented. On Friday night, Doctor Smith of Lansing spoke, called for subscriptions to cover the cost of the enterprise and secured enough for the purpose. Pastor H. Z. Davis starts out with renewed enthusiasm.

PASTOR ROY STARR of Toulon, Ill., baptized twenty-two candidates as a result of meetings in which he had the assistance of Evangelist H. F. Holbrook.

"JACK'S FIRST SUNDAY IN PRISON" was delivered as a monologue in costume by Pastor Herbert C. Carnell at Bay View church, Milwaukee. This church sends ten copies of THE BAPTIST to prisoners in the state prison at Waupun.

Rev. H. Q. MORTON, general missionary and corresponding secretary for the Arizona State Convention, has accepted a call to become convention secretary for the Nebraska State Convention. He will begin work in Nebraska, Mar. 1.

EVANGELIST F. M. DUNK closed a successful meeting with Godfrey church, Ill., Jan. 31. Eighteen were received into the church. Sixteen were baptized the following Sunday. A class of fifteen high-school students has been organized to study "Jesus' ideals of living" led by the pastor, F. J. Luedicke.

UNDER THE DIRECTION of the Rev. John Morgan Currie, director of evangelism for the Western Washington Baptist Convention, twelve of the Seattle Baptist churches conducted a simultaneous evangelistic campaign, Jan. 24 to Feb. 7, the following ministers acting as evangelists: Rev. Melbourne P. Boynton, John M. Currie, L. M. Carter, F. W. Wightman, L. J. Butcher, J. S. Moore, Benjamin P. Richardson, Evangelist Wheeler, F. B. Matthews, D. E. Hatt, Emil Friberg and D. W. Townsend. A total of 429 decisions and accessions were reported, Catholics and Japanese being among those converted. Simultaneous campaigns are planned for Tacoma, Feb. 14-28; Mt. Vernon, Mar. 7-21; Bellingham, Mar. 28 to April 18.

THE ILLINOIS POWER AND LIGHT company employes attended the First church, Danville, Ill., in a body Sunday night, Feb. 14. J. R. Carstens, pastor, is preaching to large congregations every Sunday. Five persons were received into the church Sunday morning on their Christian experience.

THIRTY NEW MEMBERS will be added to the church at Milton, Iowa, as a result of the revival campaign recently closed there, in which Rev. Wm. S. Dixon of Wheaton, Ill., preached and sang every night.

REV. L. E. FORD pastor First church Salamanca, N. Y., welcomed seven new members on the morning of Feb. 7. After the mortgage burning Jan. 1, special meetings were held with Rev. George B. Newcomb, as preacher and Rev. P. F. Hawthorne as song leader. These meetings began the evangelistic effort that is now being carried on in the regular services and cottage meetings.

ON FEB. 5 a council convened by the First church of Cherryvale, Kan., examined and recommended by unanimous vote the ordination of Edgar Cook, a young man who had grown up in the Cherryvale church but who for three years had been attending Ottawa University. Revs. W. H. Briggs, Earl Riney and M. H. Young officiated.

BY VOTE OF THE COMMITTEE on denominational day of the Northern Baptist Convention, Sunday, April 18, will this year be observed as denominational day. The subject on which emphasis will be placed is "Beginnings of Baptist History in America." Pastors will receive early in April a folder treating of this subject, Dr. Arthur W. Cleaves, pastor of the historic First church, Providence, R. I., has been chosen chairman of the committee.

THE ANNUAL MEETING held recently at Longmont, Colo., showed all bills paid. There were over 200 persons present. The building is almost paid for at a cost of $44,000 and is one of the most adequate for the purpose of religious education in the state. The records show 500 members, 400 of these being resident. One Sunday recently there was a gain of ninety-six in the church school with no special program. The young people are evidencing special enthusiasm and interest in the work. The average attendance is from forty to fifty with sixty at the monthly business meetings.

PASTOR SAMUEL C. WELSH, Milford, Del., stencils the copy for his church calendar with a pen and then runs it off with the mimeograph. It is a unique and interesting little sheet.

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for Mar. 7

JESUS WASHES THE DISCIPLES' FEET
Lesson Text: John 13:1-17. Golden Rule
Matt. 20-28

Knowing

Contrast is a primary law of dramatic art. Laughter and tears, love and hate, hero and villain, are always found playing their part in the classic works of the great authors. The writer of the Fourth Gospel knew the art of composition in which the Greeks excelled. Therefore we find in the three verses of the chapter a striking statement of the divinity of Christ. These three verses are an attempt to dramatize the consciousness of Jesus with regard to what has come to be called in theology the Deity of Christ. "Jesus knowing that his hour was come . . . Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, that he came forth from God, and goeth unto God." What does one expect to read after that tremendous statement? He naturally expects to read that Jesus ascended an improvised throne and called upon his disciples to bow before him in reverent adoration and in praise to exalt his glory. Instead, he humbled himself to wash their feet. The best revelation of Deity is love in service. Therefore the element of surprise is introduced when we read "Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, he riseth from supper, and layeth aside his garments, and he took a towel and girded himself." Then comes the dramatic incident of Jesus washing the feet of his disciples.

Doing

God is never so godlike as when he is active, and Jesus was never so much like the Father as when he was serving suffering humanity. We used to be taught that Deity was best seen in omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence and all the other attributes of an infinite and eternal Being. But Jesus disclosed the great truth that God is best known in the terms of fatherhood and motherhood and service. In other words, Jesus was just as godlike when he washed the disciples' feet as when he stilled the tempest on the lake, just as divine when he sat weary on the cross as when he curbed the devil and talked with an erring sinner about the way of life as when he raised Lazarus from the dead. We speak of the humanity and the divinity of Jesus as though they were distinct and different. But his humanity was divine and his divinity was human. Jesus washing the feet of his disciples was simply an illustration of the law of service that operates from the very heart of the universe to the outermost rim of the illimitable cosmos.

New Books

The Reading Circle

By ROBERT GORDON

One of the most notable achievements of Bishop Vincent's fruitful life was the promotion of the Chautauqua reading circle. He enlisted mature people of all classes by hundreds of thousands in the reading of serious books. For an interesting account of his influential career, read "John Heyl Vincent" by John H. Vincent. He revolutionized Sunday-school methods. He was a pioneer in proving vacations need not imply mental vacuity. He added a new word to our vocabulary—"Chautauqua." Always his favorite theme was education. He was determined it should not be forgotten that Methodism began in a university and its founders were scholarly young men. The charge that scholarship is hostile to fervent piety is in his opinion superficial and pestiferously false. Early and late he preached the necessity of the sort of training to be had through good books. Bishop Vincent came of a reading family. It was not strange that the young suit rider packed his saddle-bags with substantial books. And to the end, on ships, or in hotels, wherever he went he had books at hand. Everywhere he read and wrote. Here was a man of rare gifts, editor, lecturer, organizer, teacher and always a preacher of the Gospel who sent his auditors away both intellectually stimulated and spiritually refreshed.

For a shocking illustration of the extent of illiteracy, consider Mexico. Only 75 per cent of her people cannot read. Religion divorced from education has been the taproot of all kinds of evil. "Modern Missions in Mexico" by Wheeler, Day and Rogers voices again the appeal of that belated country. These men were sent to Mexico to investigate Presbyterian missions. After six months on the field, they report, "Anyone who knows Mexico cannot question for a moment that the one thing she needs above all else is Christian education." In this they support the conclusion of Professor E. A. Ross. He declared the one hope for a better Mexico is the children "provided they receive the right kind of education." Have seen the fruitage of a mission school in Mexico, Frank Tennenbaum wrote an article to the Century Magazine entitled, "The Miracle School." The New Testament has a deeper meaning after one reads of the modern martyrs of Mexico. The book is beautifully illustrated. Perhaps no picture is more impressive than that of the group on horseback with uplifted hands taking an oath to be true to the Protestant faith. Their leader had just been killed by Roman Catholics. He that hath ears will hear a ringing call for volunteers to cross the Rio Grande with an educational evangel.

Many will read and be profited by a little book of sermons just issued by our own press—"Sifted but Saved" by W. W. Melton. This is a series of simple gospel messages. I imagine they were much more impressive delivered than they are in cold type. All will not agree that the preaching of sufficiently conservative doctrine will fill the churches. One day the common people heard Him gladly but the next day they howled for His crucifixion. Many will not think we have fully met our social obligations when we have fed the hungry or healed the sick and preached an individualistic gospel. But let us hope an increasing number will agree with him in putting the supreme emphasis on "the orthodoxy of life" rather than creed. And where we differ let us pray that in this preacher's spirit we may deplore all bitterness. "Each individual needs to do his own thinking," Pastor Melton asserts. Let us all join the reading circle; see both sides, nor be afraid.

Through Science to God, by Floyd Darrow.
Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill. $2.50.

Another attempt to demonstrate to the average man who has no scientific training that there is nothing to fear for religion in the rapid development of science. The book "tries to relate the everlasting spiritual truths of sacred literature to the changing forms of modern thought." That is a fine distinction which too many people have failed to make and by this failure they are confused and somewhat distracted. Many people used to think that if the old geocentric idea of the world were not maintained the Bible and religion would suffer. But we now see that the Bible and religion did not suffer. On the contrary the new knowledge of the universe greatly enriches both the Bible and our religion. It is with this distinction in mind between the changeless truths of the Christian religion and the changing forms in which the changeless truth may be expressed in the light of modern scientific discoveries that the author of this book proceeds to deliver his message which is well worthy of a wide and studious reading.

—JOHN A. EARL.

Life Exultant, by Mary Clark Barnes.
New York: Schulte Press. 35 cents.

The new and poignant interest in every phase of the subject of life separated from a physical body has led to repeated requests for publication of the record of actual experience contained in "Life Exultant."

Science and Religion, by William North Rice. New York: Abingdon Press. 50 cents.

It is the thesis of this booklet by the emeritus professor of geology in Wesleyan university that there can be no conflict between science and religion. Science knows nothing about final causes, directing attention only to natural phenomena. Religion and science are therefore like trains running on parallel tracks and there can be no collision. There have been, of course, conflicts between certain interpretations of Scripture and scientific beliefs. The author deals with five questions over which scientists and defenders of an inerrant Bible have battled: the form of the earth, the relation of the earth to the sun, the age of the earth, the antiquity of man and the origin of species of living beings. Occasion for strife passes with the acceptance of the Bible as a progressive revelation. The writer maintains none of these scientific questions touches the central truth of Christianity, that "God was in Christ."

—ROBERT GORDON.

On the Doctrines of Grace, by A. S. Pettie.
Nashville: Sunday School Board, Southern Baptist Convention. pp. 189. $1.25.

In the "landmark" country of West Kentucky, where the reviewer began his ministry more than thirty years ago, the most cultured and scholarly preacher of those days was the Mayfield pastor, Dr. A. S. Pettie. After two notable pastorates there, and splendid service in other fields, Doctor Pettie still lives at Mayfield; and still preaches as a minister at large. The sermons under review were delivered a year ago at the Edgefield Baptist church of Nashville, whose pastor vouches for their "vital orthodoxy." The series constitute a fine summary of sturdy old-fashioned Southern Baptist pulpit work, and they suggest an explanation for the fact that the southern churches have a fair working knowledge of "Baptist doctrine" which is less in evidence in other parts of the world. Aside from their devotional and exegetic value they are typical of a worthy and historic school of American preaching, and as such worthy of careful study.

—GEORGE E. BURLINGAME.

Khama; the great African Chief, by J. C. Harris. New York: Doran. 112 pages. $1.25.

This small volume contains a congested biography of a noted chief of one of the large tribe of the Bantu race. His province was in Bechuanaland and under British protection. He was the progeny of a cruel, depraved and savage ancestry; but was converted and became, for over fifty years, one of the wisest, kindest and most heroic chiefs known in history. Livingstone and Moffat were among his instructors and exemplars. Surrounded as he was by savage and treacherous natives, his nearest kinsmen conspiring for his life, hated by vicious white adventurers whose depravities he restrained and would-be assassins among his own people on account of his puritanism, he died without a stain on his name and conduct as an exemplary and devout Christian ruler. As has been true in the history of Carey, Judson, Paton and other Christian pioneers—the most virulent and wicked of his foes were the white traders and politicians from the coast. They were the constant importers of strong drink, conspiracies and diseases. He was born in 1828 and died July, 1922.

—H. O. ROWLANDS.

The name "Pollyanna" the country over stands for gladness—so it is needless to explain that we have here another "glad" book—the fourth of the series. Pollyanna has her own following and it is sufficient to announce that she is appearing in a most delightful story in this book. Well illustrated by H. Weston Taylor.

—GRACE ROLLINS.

The Saving Sense

Many a player in the orchestra of life spends all his time merely in tuning up.
—Forbes Magazine.

"A regular verb is one that we use every day," is a test-paper definition.

When Jimmy came in from his play covered with mud, his mother cried out, "Why, Jimmy, you dirty little pig!" The next day Jimmy's father came in after cleaning his car, and his appearance resembled Jimmy's on the previous day. "Why, papa, you dirty pig!" cried Jimmy. Jimmy's mother reproved him sharply for speaking in that way to his father, and Jimmy said, "No, you're not a dirty pig, papa! You're a nice, clean pig!"

Life is impossible unless one can be an insignificant private individual occasionally.—George Bernard Shaw. On that score few of us find life impossible.

The Canton, Mo., Press gives this as "Johnny's" rendering of the first stanza of "The Psalm of Life":

"Lize Grape men allry mindus
Weaken maka Lize Blime,
Andy Parting Lee B. Hindus
Footprints Johnny Sands a time."

A ducky named Sam borrowed $25 from his friend Tom, and gave his note for the amount.

Time went on, the note became long past due, and Tom was very impatient for its payment.

One day the two men met on the street. Tom stopped and said, with determination: "Look heah, man, when ah you-all gwine t' pay thet note?"

"I ain't got no money now," replied Sam, "but I'm goin' to pay it soon as I kin."

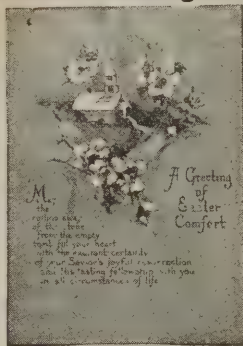

"Yo' been sayin' thet fer months," retorted Tom, "but it don't get me no money." Yer gwine t' pay thet money here and now, thet's whut yer gwine t' do. Ef y' don't, y' know whut goin' t' do? I'm goin' to burn yer note; then whar'll yo' be at?"

"Yas yo' will. Yas yo' will," shouted. "Jes' yo' burn dat not mine and I'll pop a lawsuit onto yo' The Outlook.

The Baptist

Published Every Week by the National Baptist Convention

FROM A PAINTING ENTITLED "MATERNITY", BY G. MELCHERS, WHICH HANGS IN THE LUXEMBOURG MUSEUM.

Folks, Facts and Opinion

As a result of a race conference recently held in Louisville, Dr. James Bruce, eminent child specialist of this city, has issued a cordial invitation to the colored physicians to attend his clinic at the children's hospital every Monday. The announcement was made through Mrs. Helm Bruce, a member of the state and local interracial committees and one of the city's prominent women.

Have our Baptist conventions become so large as to be impracticable? The Religious Herald renews a suggestion made by it last year that the Southern Baptist Convention be composed of a limited body of delegates small enough for efficient action, and that much of the inspirational and promotional work now done through it be undertaken by three district conventions representing territorial divisions of the field now included in the Southern Baptist Convention as a whole.

Dr. Len G. Broughton's magnanimous act in giving notice of his purpose in the interest of harmony to withdraw a resolution which he was expected and announced to present at the next meeting of the Southern Baptist Convention, continues to win approving comment from southern Baptist papers. The resolution proposed was intended to commit the convention to a denunciation of evolution, and its aim was to check the inroads of heresy among the churches and schools. Doctor Broughton has become convinced that there is a better way and shows his bigness by being brave enough to acknowledge publicly that he has discovered his mistake. It would be a happy outcome if other Baptists both north and south could see their way clear to imitate his example.

Proof that another universe with bright and dim stars and nebulae in a heavens like our own exists out in space inconceivably distant from the earth, together with photographs and accurate measurements of the mass of celestial bodies that compose it, has been presented by Dr. Edwin P. Hubble in a study published by the University of Chicago in the Astrophysical Journal. Dr. Hubble found that it is about 700,000 light years away from us, or approximately 66,609,872,000,000 miles. According to his computations it is 4000 light years across. Its general appearance is like that of the Magellanic clouds, a mass of nebulae like the Milky Way in the skies of the southern hemisphere. Prof. E. E. Barnard, who was on the staff of the Yerkes Observatory of the University of Chicago up to the time of his death in 1923, first saw the galaxy in 1884.

That increasingly ridiculous pronouncement of the Church Temperance society against prohibition moves the Living Church, organ of the same denomination, to this reflection: "We hope that the policy of prohibition will at least continue long enough to enable the church to recall her own people to the practice of such abstinence and self-denial, as will enable them to speak their sentiments with respect to that policy without conveying the unpleasant feeling that they are speaking rather from the dictates of their stomachs than from sound minds. When men who scrupulously obey the law speak on the subject, we attach much weight to their views. We shall be glad to know more of the questionnaire of the Church Temperance society."

Is Wisconsin University to take up again the role of pioneer in educational progress? After the calling of Glenn Frank to the presidency of the institution, comes the announcement that Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn, former president of Amherst college, has been appointed professor of philosophy. Doctor Meiklejohn resigned from the presidency of Amherst in June, 1923, as a result of criticism that his views were too liberal. He went to Amherst from Brown in 1912 with a special program of modernizing the curriculum and developing courses in history, social sciences and political economy. He is expected to have a large part in the proposed reorganization of the curricular and advisory systems at Wisconsin, designed to furnish better contact between the university and the growing body of students.

Persons who have an impulse to go gunning for our country's foes may find a good game range by following a hint from the Central Christian Advocate. It says: "Who are America's enemies? Bolshevism? Revolutionary communism? Nay, verily. These poison weeds will never really take root in this land. We notice that some authority or other says they are less numerous than even three or four years ago. Their experiment in Russia, too, is helping put a quietus on them in this kind of a country. No, the real enemies of America are little Americans, men moved by prejudice, ignorance, fanaticism, and by the bigotry of race. It is the tyranny based on the assumption of 'the man who pays the bills,' who conceivably may know very little of what he is talking about. But that is not a trait solely of any one class. Let us have team consultation. Let's all sit in at the church council table and if we don't know we can keep still and learn."

"An Outline of Christianity" in five volumes is announced, conceived by R. Harold Paget, financed by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and "prepared by editorial councils covering a wide range of subjects." The idea seems to be to do for Christianity something like what H. G. Wells did for history, but to do it in a more extensive and scholarly way.

The executive committee of the Missouri Conference for Social Welfare announces a state-wide meeting at Booneville, March 14-16, in which men and women of state-wide and national reputation and experience will discuss the best ways of dealing with delinquency, prison administration, county welfare, child welfare, public health, race relations and other social problems which the church and its leaders are constantly facing.

The present agitation for a return to the licensed liquor traffic by the repeal of the Volstead act and the eighteenth amendment is stirring up religious organizations all over the country to protest. At a recent meeting of the board of managers of the Iowa State Convention the report of executive secretary G. P. Mitchell, contained a rousing call to the Baptists of Iowa to support the present law and to condemn all attempts at nullification. In view of the call, a series of resolutions were adopted by the board commending heartily the members of congress who stand for prohibition, deprecating all attempts to discredit the eighteenth amendment and urging all citizens to stand firmly in support of the Volstead act.

More and more the question of the recognition of Russia is awakening discussion in America. At a recent luncheon of the Foreign Policy Association Major Gen. William N. Haskell, who was head of the American Relief Administration in Russia in 1921-23 and was appointed recently as head of the New York State National Guard, and Dr. Boris A. Bakmeteff, Russian ambassador to the United States during the Kerensky regime, agreed that economic conditions under the soviet government had improved within the last two years, and that the trend was for further improvement. About the same date Capt. Patton Hibben was telling the same story at the Chicago Forum. All parties, even the bolsheviks themselves, declare that Russia has now a government which is neither communism, socialism nor sovietism, but a partial adaptation of them under a dictatorship, which tends to give place to a modified socialism with a sovietized democracy.

Word from Mr. Harry S. Myers informs us that a cable was received at the headquarters office in New York on Monday, Feb. 22, from Cairo, Egypt, announcing the sudden death of Mrs. J. N. Mauck. She and Doctor Mauck, resident emeritus of Hillsdale college, left last summer for a winter in Europe. In January they met a friend in Athens and traveled to Egypt. Mrs. Mauck was attacked with appendicitis and did not survive the operation. Doctor Mauck is due in this country on March 6 on the Aquatania.

The bridging of the old chasm between the papacy and the Italian state can best be accomplished through mediation by the League of Nations. An important member of the Sacred College is authority for this belief. The cardinal, whose identity he insists must not be made known, is of the opinion that the breach between church and state which has existed since the fall of the temporal power could be surmounted if Italy would consent to the setting up in the confines of the city of Rome of a small papal state, over which the pontiff would hold the mandate of the League of Nations.

Carl Marx would be astonished, were he alive today, to see socialists in many countries participating in parliamentary proceedings in a constructive way and accepting positions in the several national cabinets. The latest example is Poland where it is said that the socialist party, with forty-one deputies in the national parliament and two ministers in the cabinet, headed by Count Skrzynski, will continue to support the coalition government of the republic in its efforts to weather the economic storm, while at the same time the socialist leaders will neglect no opportunity to see that the measures taken in the interest of the nation's finances contain no provisions calculated to injure their constituents—the bulk of the industrial workers.

It is curious that the year of the Day of the trial should also be the year of unprecedented paleo-anthropological discovery. At the beginning of the year the places where authentic remains of men of the Old Stone Age had been found were all in Southwestern and central Europe. But beginning in the early spring, one discovery after another rolled back the frontiers. First, a Russian scientist named Bontsch-smolovsky found parts of two skeletons of the Neanderthal type in a cave in the Crimea, which carried the boundaries of this race to the edge of Asia. Then came the reports of Roy Chapman Andrews from Mongolia, of undisputed races of a Neanderthaloid people. Near the miracle-famed city of Capernaum in Galilee, an Englishman, Francis Tuttle-Petre, discovered a skull of an "advanced" Neanderthal type. From Egypt, the Sahara, Florida, Arizona, South Africa, Moravia and other localities remote from one another, a whole series of interesting and related discoveries has placed science in a position to trace human life millenniums farther back than had before been possible.

The Federation of Churches of Greater New York announces its purpose to fight the Freethinkers' Society of New York and the new Society to Advance Atheism in their efforts to stop by injunction and otherwise the dismissal of children from public schools that they may go to religious schools selected by their parents or guardians. The federation is backed in its stand by practically every Protestant agency in New York, including lay people in the churches, who promise the funds to pay the cost of the contest. Resort is to be made to the courts and, if they fail, the legislature of New York is to be asked to change the law.

A citizen of North Carolina objects keenly to an account in THE BAPTIST of Feb. 13, page 36, "of the deplorable and savage way the road contractors treat the negroes" in that state. His criticism is based on three grounds, namely, that he has never heard of such cases, that slavery is abolished and that such stories are not fit for religious papers. His sense of loyalty to his home state is pained. Well, nothing was said about slavery. The brutalities were reported as incidents of the penal system of the state. As to state loyalty, North Carolina happens to be the ancestral home of the writer of these notes. As to the matter of fact, refer to the secretary of state of North Carolina. If such wrongs are not the concern of the religious press, what is its business in the world? They are carefully noted in a publication that is far holier and more dignified than THE BAPTIST, namely the New Jerusalem Record. And to the honor of North Carolina be it said that she was the first to give attention to these atrocities, as the previous news note was careful to record.

According to the British Weekly of Jan. 7, news has arrived of the birth of a son to Dr. and Mrs. Hubert Wilson at Chitambo, in Northern Rhodesia, on Dec. 12. Doctor Wilson is a grandson of Dr. David Livingstone, and is at present working under the Livingstonia mission, near the place where his grandfather died. It is therefore of peculiar interest that little more than fifty years after Doctor Livingstone's death, and within a few miles of the spot where he laid down his life, his great-grandson should have been born.

Sovietism as it is taking hold of China is first graphically shown by Henry Kittredge Norton in the New York Times of Feb. 7. By a map sketch he indicates the strategic areas already occupied by soviet forces or soviet ideas in Mongolia and Manchuria, and they are somewhat impressive. His thesis is that at the present juncture soviet Russia is endeavoring to break up China and encouraging rival factions while the European powers are trying to hold China together. As a part of the intricate scheme, it is even suggested that both Feng Yu Hsiang and Chang Tso Lin are supported by Moscow. If his interpretation is true and if to these factors of soviet control we add the powerful Kuo Min Tang, the party of Sun Yat Sen in south China, we seem to face a situation in which the European nations must choose sooner or later to abandon China or to prepare for a war more terrible than that of 1914.

No, brother, the quoted words confute you. The Word and Way devotes considerable space to a discussion of an editorial in THE BAPTIST of Jan. 23, dealing with the Wallace Lodge conference. It quotes from this paper: "The extreme fundamentalist has the duty of giving clear assurance that if the substance of the old saving faith can be preserved on the basis of the old liberty he will be content to accord full and harmonious fellowship on that basis without insisting on a formal creed. This clear assurance has not yet been given in terms of irenic finality by any representative group of extreme fundamentalists. On the other hand the extreme liberal group has the duty of giving clear assurance in terms that common folks can understand that its message preserves everything vital in the values of the gospel." From that quotation the Word and Way draws this remarkable inference: "If we understand THE BAPTIST, its idea is that differences between fundamentalists and liberals are to be composed by mutual concessions and compromises. This, according to THE BAPTIST, is the way out of discussion and contention and into a condition of peace, fraternity, fellowship and cooperation. The thing strikes us as impossible. The fundamentalists would still be fundamentalists and the liberal would still be a liberal. No juggling of terminology or phraseology can change the real situation."

The first negro woman lawyer admitted to practice before the supreme court of the United States has become a member of that bar. She is Violette N. Anderson of Chicago, admitted upon a certificate which showed that she had practiced for more than three years before the highest court of Illinois.

President Irving Maurer of Beloit college, an avowed liberal, has written an article on "The Failures of Liberalism," in which he gives to liberals generally something fit for reflection. The failure to say the positive word, to develop the technique of a devotional life, to become biblical preachers, to be completely and thoroughly liberal and to exhibit Christian saintliness is charged up thus by a liberal against liberals. Let liberals weigh his indictment.

Antics and aches of American Baptists move our British brethren, if not to laughter and tears, at least to interested observation. Witness the following note from the Christian World: "President Mullins is the latest target for American fundamentalists. The eminent Baptist scholar has said that 'Christianity must be able to defend itself in the open court of a sound scholarship and by scientific methods if it is to abide; no doctrine of authority will save it, whether of an infallible pope, authoritative church, or infallible Bible.' The Baptist Messenger is, consequently, out after Doctor Mullin's scalp. 'One simple question,' it says, 'the verbal inspiration of the Bible, is the decisive test of orthodoxy, and the controversy,' it declares, 'cannot stop unless one side withdraws from the denomination that retains the other side.'"

Hand-clapping as a blasphemous nuisance has not received sufficient attention. George Bernard Shaw disposes of it in his decisive fashion thus: "As far as serious work in the theatre is concerned I should put applause during a performance on the footing of brawlings in church. The first condition of an artistic performance is that the players should be able to forget the audience and the audience to forget itself. The moment the audience makes an uproar and the players are compelled to stop and wait until silence is restored there is an end of artistic conditions. The only entertainments at which loud laughter and applause should be countenanced are those which have laughter and applause for their object. Therefore, what I said does not apply to clowning or political oratory. As you pay the clown to make you laugh, it would be ridiculous to deprive yourself of the thing you paid for. At political meetings no man would dare to talk as political orators are expected to do unless the audience encouraged him and intoxicated themselves by a dervish-like uproar and antics." The other day an audience of preachers listened to a gospel song so tender that it moved many to tears, and at its close, rewarded the singer with loud and clattering applause.

Fundamentalism seems to the Baptist Advance to be far deeper than loyalty to a creed. Among the deeper fundamentals the editor of that paper names willingness to suffer and sacrifice, obedience to the will of Christ, sensible evangelism, missionary cooperation and giving for the support of the gospel, and he goes on to say: "Personally we are not at all interested in any person's fundamentalism unless it does include these fundamentals." On the supposition that he would be glad to include also all the fruits of the Spirit as indispensable fundamentals, an approving "amen" is due.

THE current of life runs ever away
To the bosom of God's great ocean.
Don't set your course 'gainst the river's course
And think to alter its motion.
Don't waste a curse on the universe.
Remember it lived before you.
Don't butt at the storm with your puny form
But bend and let it go o'er you.

The world will never adjust itself
To suit your whims to the letter
Some things must go wrong your whole life long.
And the sooner you know it the better
It is folly to fight with the infinite
And go under at last in the wrestle.
The wiser man shapes into God's plan
As the water shapes into a vessel.

Sane utterance is such a habitual practice of the Biblical Recorder that only extraordinary instances of it impinge on the reader as exceptional. But this one does so impinge: "Believing what is not true about the Scriptures no more makes the belief true than believing what is not true about anything else. Saving faith is not built up on believing what is not true, but fanaticism is. The difference between the two may seem slight, but it is wide as the poles. They have some traits in common, but are no kin whatever. Faith is trust based on belief of what is true; fanaticism is trust based on belief of what is not true. Much supposed interpretation of Scripture is only theory. Theorizing about the Scriptures and their meaning has never yet saved a soul; only personal trust in a personal Redeemer can do that. Theory when accepted as Scripture and later found to be mere theory may drive one into skepticism and infidelity. Skeptics and infidels usually start from this station and travel by this route. Knowledge in the Scriptures and about them does not undermine faith, does not make fanatics, does not beget superstition; it does nourish faith, convert fanatics, and starve superstition."

It is reported that on condition leave the country, Marcus Garvey, provisional president general of Africa, head of the Universal Negro Improvement Association and one of the picturesque figures in New York City may receive a commutation of sentence within a few days and be released from Atlanta penitentiary, where he has served one year of a five-year sentence for using the mails to defraud.

At the national council of Congregational churches held in October in Washington, the dominant issue was the reorganization of the missionary societies, and a forward step was taken. The American board of commissioners for foreign missions will, by the action taken, absorb the three women's boards which now have work in the foreign field, the women being given equal representation in the board and leadership on the field. The eight organizations of the homeland are likewise to be merged into one board. It is expected that fully two years will be necessary to make the merger even partially effective.

Referring to the late Dr. Henrik Gunderson concerning whose death a notice and appreciation have already appeared in THE BAPTIST, the school committee and the executive committee of the Norwegian Baptist Conference of America wish to add their tribute of love for the distinguished fellow-countryman and co-worker. Reciting essentially the facts of his life as already reported, they add: "Yes, this loyal and faithful man of God and beloved brother has gone from us, but the influence of his life remains with us. Treasured up in memory, too, his life and labor will continue to bless. We record our most heartfelt appreciation. This tribute bears the official signature of O. Breiding, Ole Larson and T. Knudsen."

When puzzled over Genesis, look to the League. Such would seem to be the program recommended by the Alabamian Baptist, since it reasons thus: "The Bible says that 'in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth.' Just what the 'beginning' was, this writer does not know and probably no one else does. Probably no authentic record of the human race can be traced further back than five thousands years. And, of course, all the things that went on before records were kept can only be guessed. So far as we know every man has a right to a guess. In the meantime this generation has seen a thing that no generation ever before saw or dreamed of; that is, the combination of forty-six nations now united in the League of Nations which are standing collectively for the settlement of international differences without resorting to the means of tooth and claw, of battleships and standing armies. After everything else is said that can be said or can be thought of, the biggest idea that has struck the world in this twentieth century, or in all of the centuries, is the League of Nations."

Is the Amendment Advisable?

IN a crisis of controversy, agitation and alarm, when time and opportunity were not available for careful consultation and when a present emergency seemed to call for immediate and decisive action, notice was given at the meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention at Seattle last year of a motion to amend the by-laws of the convention by adding to Article I, Section 2, the following words: "A Baptist church as defined for the purposes of these by-laws is one accepting the New Testament as its guide and composed only of baptized believers, baptism being by immersion." The movers must be credited with a desire to protect the principles and integrity of the denomination, to promote harmony and effective cooperation in the convention, and to take the most direct and practical step to this end. Their purpose was to give time for reflection and discussion, as required by the by-laws. If in the light of later information the proposed amendment should be found not likely to accomplish the ends they sought by it, they would be among the last to favor its final adoption. It is still pending and it ought to be carefully considered. A careful consideration of the whole subject involved in the light of the facts as they are now known indicates that the proposed amendment is needless, dangerous as precedent and likely to be divisive.

Its single clear aim is to prevent the churches of the Northern Baptist Convention from departing from the New Testament as the trustworthy guide of Christian faith and order. Is there any danger of such perversion? So far as known, only one Baptist minister in the whole field of the Northern Baptist Convention has expressed himself unofficially as willing to use any other form than immersion for baptism, but no church has done so. It does not appear that a single minister or church objects to the New Testament as the authoritative guide for Christian life and conduct. The mere suggestion of a departure from immersion only as baptism has awakened within the denomination an instant, resolute and apparently unanimous reaction against it. No by-law can make that reaction more decisive and none can give it clearer expression. The adoption of a by-law for this purpose would be futile because it would not effect the result sought. It would not change the practice of any local church or the membership of the convention, or the future course of the denomination. It is defective because its terms inadequately define a Baptist church. Under it a Mormon or a Seventh-Day Adventist church would be entitled to representation. It is contrary to the historic principles and practice of Baptists, for they have always held that the local church has the right to determine its own conditions of membership. That power has never been conveyed by them to any other ecclesiastical body. A valid organ of cooperation among Baptists must recognize the final authority of the local church in this particular and must sacredly protect that principle as essential to the genius and life of the denomination.

The proposed amendment is dangerous as a precedent. If adopted, its insufficiency for purposes of definition is likely to become soon apparent. Somebody, alarmed at some teaching or practice in some church or churches which appears objectionable and seeing that such peculiarity is not covered by the proposed amendment, will naturally seek additional amendments restricting the right of representation. The fact that the convention has so acted in this instance will constitute an undeniable precedent for such further restriction as may seem necessary in order to secure the desired uniformity. There is no stopping place. If we ought to prescribe terms of local membership as a condition of representation in the convention, we ought to carry such prescription far enough to satisfy all reasonable scruples of any considerable group. Logically this leads to the conversion of the convention from a cooperative association of self-governing churches into an authoritative synod for the common government of the churches. The time to prevent such a development is before it begins.

Finally the proposed amendment is certain to be divisive. A host of conservative Baptists who in the strictest conscience stand for a New Testament church and for the baptism of believers by immersion only, will feel themselves impelled by an equal devotion to the principle of full local autonomy in the local church to oppose such an amendment. They hold the direct and sole lordship of Christ in the local church as supreme and jealously guard the authority of his word and the sacredness of the ordinances as he gave them. In fact, as circumstances have developed since the meeting at Seattle, this pending amendment seems to be the only seriously divisive subject that is likely to arise in the next meeting of the convention at Washington.

If through fraternal conference and common understanding proponents of the amendment could find a harmonious way to eliminate this subject from consideration, they would thereby make a large and magnanimous contribution to the future peace, integrity, harmony and progress of the denomination.

Shall We Pay Our Bills Monthly?

The rule for the payment of bills in America is settlement once a month with a ten-day margin of grace. The year is divided into twelve parts and all the books of commercial institutions are balanced according to this calendar arrangement. In this way the habits of the people are formed in receiving salaries and discharging financial obligations. Even the unsalaried farmers who do business with the banks receive their monthly statements of account, and the wage-earner who gets his pay every Saturday is subject to the same rule if he is a bank depositor. The thirty-day limit rules America in practically all business transactions.

The churches being primarily spiritual bodies do not readily take their place in the long line of business organizations. The sense of financial obligation for the support of the church and its benevolences is not so strong among the members as the sense of financial obligation of the same people to the grocer. The monthly bills for merchandise are paid promptly but the pledge to the church can wait. This is the situation among thousands of people in our churches who are thoroughly honest and who will pay their pledge to the church before the year is up. They do not seem to realize that deferred payments create a condition which forces the trustees of the church to borrow money at the bank to pay the monthly bills of the church and compels the missionary societies to pay large interest on borrowed capital in order to meet their financial obligations which come due with the regularity of the first day of each calendar month.

About the first of this fiscal year a movement was started by the Board of Missionary Cooperation to educate our churches to remit one-twelfth of their pledge to benevolences each month. The movement has made a hopeful start and the evidences of substantial progress are encouraging. Up to December, 1925, the increase in payments to benevolences over the record last year reaching headquarters in New York for the support of the unified missionary budget was quite marked. December receipts dropped a notch, thus reducing the general percentage of increase over last year for the same period. But this drop is only temporary and it is expected that January receipts will more than make up for the accidental slip of the previous month. But we are still a long, long way from paying as we go. At this writing we have two months only in which to raise in actual cash, if our budget of benevolences is fully met by April 30, at least 60 per cent of the whole budget of the year or nearly three million dollars. If the churches had paid in month by month the full quota of the unified budget allotted to them, on the first of March, 1926, the general receipts would have amounted to $4,570,140. But as it is the books on the first of March will probably show, when the report is issued, about half of the amount received.

We are informed officially that the smaller churches of the Northern Convention are to be credited with a partial success of the movement this year to remit benevolences monthly. The larger churches in the main and especially in the bigger cities have not responded appreciably to the effort of the denomination to remit one-twelfth of their quota of benevolences for the unified budget each month. This is the problem which gives us concern. It is quite within the realm of possibilities for several of the larger churches to neutralize the laudable effort of the smaller churches to work a reform. We therefore appeal to the larger churches which have large quotas to meet the challenge of the smaller churches and to respond to the effort of the Board of Missionary Cooperation in its business-like attempt to pay as we go and to remove the occasion for the grand rush at the eleventh hour to do the work of eight months in two.

An Unfriendly Church

A YOUNG man visiting in a town not more than a night's journey by rail from Chicago went to the Baptist church for the Sunday morning service and also attended the young men's class in the Sunday school. In talking of his experience to a friend he said, "The church is the coldest proposition that I can imagine exists anywhere in the United States." It appears that no one greeted the young man when he entered the church or when the service was over though he stood around hoping that some one would offer the glad handshake of welcome. He went to the room where the young men's class gathered, but no chair was offered and not even a gesture of good-will was made toward him. The next Sunday found the young man in the Presbyterian church across the street where the atmosphere was warm with sympathy and friendship. During his stay in that town he gave the Baptist church a wide berth. If this had happened in the life of a man more mature and with larger experience he probably would have hunted up the pastor and sought a private interview just as a customer in a department store reports to the manager the discourtesy of a clerk.

Many pastors and officers claim for their churches a friendliness which they do not show. Groups of members are "chummy" with one another, and little coteries may be seen here and there in the aisles and in the foyer at the close of the service exchanging greetings with evident relish; but the stranger stands and looks on with a deepening sense of loneliness because he is not in the charmed circle. Indeed the stranger may hang around the outskirts of the various groups and fail to get a greeting because the members and friends are so fully occupied with their own mutual interests. Of course no church deliberately plans to be unfriendly. It just happens. No check having been kept on greeting strangers and no provision having been made for acquainting them with new friends, the average church appears to be friendly when it is only evidence of "inbred amiability."

How Many a Peasant Girl Who Went the Same Road

Here is a tale that accentuates the tragedy of the Russian revolution and is an echo of a thousand such tragedies in the past history of that long and deeply suffering land. In the days of the czar, the Obolenskys were an old and noble family, one of the proudest of that proud aristocracy. When the revolution came, the Obolenskys were driven into poverty or exile. One beautiful girl fifteen years old, in order to keep from starving, turned to a life of crime and shame. The other day the newspapers carried this paragraph about her from Moscow: "Princess Obolensky, twenty-three years old, and member of one of the oldest families in Russia, was found murdered today in the snow outside a bathhouse."

American Liberalism Lost and Something Better Found

About five years ago the essayists began to note the disappearance of English liberalism, particularly of the Victorian liberals. Now a dirge in the same key is playing for the American liberals. Mr. H. L. Mencken particularizes, and accounts for their apostasy by several causes: they were sidetracked by the war, their arteries have hardened, they have ceased to dream, they are disappointed in the people, they have lost faith in democracy—particularly, they have discovered that democracy is false in principle and is an essential humbug. But he has substituted mere academic enumeration for an analysis. Liberals have ceased to be liberals because they were never anything more than liberals. They had never thought through the social problem with which they dealt. Liberals never change. The men who knew where they were going before the war are standing fast. They were loyal to the government and immune to the war hysteria. They are not disillusioned because they were not illusioned. Where one liberal has become tired, a dozen commonplace preachers are becoming constructive social prophets. And the millions who have learned of Jesus are still believers in democracy. Many men as old as the retired liberals have arteries that show no sign of hardening and they have lost nothing of their idealism and faith.

Will the Gospel Go Abroad Without the Gunboat?

Christianity is having difficulty in its efforts to unshackle itself from imperialism in foreign lands. People in the mission fields, and indeed people in the homeland, question whether the missionary is not a pioneer for the exploiter. In fact it has been argued in the support of the missionary movement that it prepares the way for the exploiter. And by natural sequence the battleship follows the trader. Sometimes the missionary and the most iniquitous kind of merchandise have gone on the same ship to the same country. There is just one way for the missionary enterprise to free itself from the odium of such a connection, namely, to set itself openly, in thorough and resolute fashion against all imperialism and all exploitation of human life and labor both at home and abroad, and to let the world know it.

Is a Good Thing May Be Introduced by Question Marks

Are the religious denominations organized around anti-Christ worship? Was the church born in an atmosphere of autocracy? Does it foster an arrogant nationalism? Has its passion for service been given over to a passion for power? Has it chosen corruption to crucifixion? Is it under intellectual bondage to traditional beliefs? Has it often stood for a bigoted racial discrimination? Has it resorted to the boycott and other forms of intolerance? Such things were affirmed in the mid-winter interdenominational student conference at Evanston. The form of statement is not that of reasonable intellectual balance and discrimination. No church has gone over wholly to these things. No church is wholly free from them. The true question is this: How far in specific cases do such characteristics of church life appear? That question offers the possibility of investigation and amendment.

The Heresy of Presenting Religion in the Wrong Way

Dean Inge is quoted as saying, "The conflict of science and religion is still a long way from being reconciled. It is an open sore which poisons the spiritual life of the civilized world. It is difficult for a man to accept orthodox Christianity, as the churches present it to him, without treachery to his scientific conscience. The injury thus inflicted upon religion can hardly be measured." On the other hand, many voices assure us that there is no conflict between religion and science. Where is the truth of the matter? Between true religion and false science, between false religion and true science, and among people who are not well acquainted with either science or religion, there is conflict. Also there is difficulty when people try to apply to truth in one field tests that are applicable only in other fields. Approach religion scientifically, science religiously and both intelligently, and there will be no difficulty.

He Lost His Leadership But Retains His Discernment

Alexander Kerensky, emerging from his silence in Paris to give the world his opinion of the bolshevik government in Russia, is hailed as another potential savior of the world because he thinks that Russia ought to pay the debts of the czar's government. Mr. Kerensky adds a thing or two besides. Concerning the persevering and repeated interventions in Russia by the allies in the early stages of the bolshevik régime, he says: "There is no doubt that intervention and boycott measurably served to perpetuate the bolshevist dictatorship in Russia, and even to stabilize it." Even concerning the debts, referring particularly to France in terms applicable to other nations also, he expresses this opinion: "It seems to me that a rehabilitated and laborious Russia would bring greater profits to France than the payment of the Russian debts and interest to the last sou."

When the People Discover Their Newest Frankenstein

Norman Thomas has written a pamphlet of luminous quality on the subject of "Industrial Democracy." He points out three lines of effort which he thinks must mark any effective program towards a finer civilization, namely, public ownership of basic utilities with democratic administration, a steady development of workers' representation in private enterprises, and the strengthening of cooperative enterprises. He thinks that the public ownership movement if normally carried on "will require continued development of labor unions and the growth of a political party consciously based on the interests of the workers," and that the socialization of super-power is the transcendent immediate issue. Of course such opinions readily classify him. But what will happen in this country when the people begin to comprehend the economic and social meaning of super-power?

The Romance of the Bread-Line

By H. CAMPBELL-DUNCAN

THE pale winter sunlight, filtering through filmy window draperies mellowed the delicate colors of fragile breakfast china, set on snowy damask, and flung back opalescent reflections from the polished surfaces of silver and crystal.

Outside lay the frost-gripped city.

The man finished his fragrant cup of coffee and leaned back. He was at peace with himself and the world. Beside his plate lay the talisman that would carry him from the bitter chill of winter to the genial warmth of perpetual summer—a through ticket to a southern resort.

Glancing at it, he surrendered himself to luxurious contemplation of lazy days; motoring beneath swaying palm fronds, golfing over mint-sauce courses and swimming in sun-warmed surf. He had worked hard of late. His holiday, he felt, had been well earned. To get, by contrast, the full thrill of the prospect, he rose and looked into the blustery street.

Across the way a slouching figure lurked in a doorway to escape the cutting wind. Shoulders sagged. The threadbare coat was clutched about the throat by one grimy hand. The other was thrust deep into a ragged pocket. The head, drawn deep into the upturned collar, was covered by a soggy cap.

The man at the window saw, and understood.

His mind, wrenched violently from dreams of a sunny southland, raced back a score of years. He saw himself, young, a stranger in Chicago, broke and jobless, trudging the friendless streets and once a day wolfing great slices of bread and butter and gulping down steaming cups of coffee with a hundred or more out-o'-lucks like himself in a church basement.

In those days there had been no choice. It had been the bread-line, or starvation.

To his ears, once more, came the words of courage spoken by the man in charge; words that had straightened his sagging spine and given him the impetus to go after that first job, the job that had eventually brought him creature comforts and an honored place among his fellow men.

His heart moved with gratitude to the old bread-line and the man who conducted it.

Down in the street a burly policeman rounded the corner. The shivering wretch gave a swift glance and vanished on shuffling feet.

Pictures of the Past

A hundred vivid pictures swept through the mind of the man at the window. He saw again the fetid "flop-houses" and barren police stations where he had slept, and the shadowy hallways wherein homeless men lurk through the long, bitter, hungry days. A ghostly procession passed before him; disheartened men with peaked and unshaven faces, all the down-and-outs and out-o'-lucks he had known, the old bread-line their only hope of keeping body and soul together as they sought the elusive and ill-paid job.

Memory stirred him to action. His bags were packed. Sun-washed sands beckoned. Train time was near. He must hurry. A swift ride down town, his taxi weaving through the traffic on Michigan boulevard, on past the station where his train already was made up, until just below

JOHNSTON MYERS—HE BELIEVES IN A SEVEN-DAYS-A-WEEK CHURCH; IN MINISTERING TO THE BODILY AS WELL AS THE SPIRITUAL NEEDS OF MEN.

23rd street it drew up before a large stone building—Immanuel Baptist church.

Twenty minutes later, seated in his Pullman, the man was slipping away southward; in the basement of the church a long double line of hungry men was forming and in the hands of the man in charge lay a check for four figures to help carry on Chicago's all-the-year-round bread line.

This is a true story. That is to say it is true in its essentials, if I have elaborated the details. The man is a real man, and he is not the only prominent business man in Chicago who has taken his place in Immanuel Baptist church bread-line, which has been feeding the city's unfortunates for thirty years, ever since, in fact, Rev. Johnston Myers accepted the pastorate of the church. Of course it is not permitted to name names, but there is scarcely a class of business in Chicago that has not among its most important executives a man who has made one of that daily line in the church basement.

And they do not forget, these men. Their gifts of money are in large measure responsible for the continuance of the work. Two hundred, three hundred and some times as many as five hundred hungry men are fed, but even in the simplest way they cannot be fed for nothing. Money is always needed. The food may be like manna from heaven to the starving recipients, but some one has to pay for it.

They are of all kinds. Should you happen to be in neighborhood of 23rd street and Wabash avenue between one and two o'clock, any day out of the 365, you will see them gathering—shabby figures converging upon the mouth of the alley behind the church. Some slink along nervously, confirmed street-prowlers and work-dodgers; some come boldly, old-timers who have lost their shame at being regular wards of charity; some white-haired and bent, fallen upon evil times in their declining years and fill others with baffled eyes, reluctantly forcing feet, laden with much tramping in search of work, to carry them toward a necessary but unwelcome goal.

A few days ago I stood with Doctor Myers in the church basement and watched them enter. A heavy snow was falling outside. The streets were deep with half-frozen slush. With soggy coats and soaking shoes that quivered as they walked, they were a sorry and pathetic crew. They were very quiet and very orderly. Dejectedly they stood in silence. They exchanged no words with one another. Only here and there was to be sensed a feeling other than despair, and this invariably emanated from those who were still young.

Doctor Myers himself was in charge, greeting each as he entered with a word of cheer. He did not preach, but spoke to them fairly as man to man, seeking to kindle, or keep aglow in their hearts a spark of hope. Walking down the line he drew out one on whose sagging shoulders dejection seemed to sit most heavily.

"Come," he said, "you'll never land a job if you go after work with your chest caved in and your chin on your wishbone. Stand up straight, man, and let's see how tall you are. Straighten your spine. Up with your chin. Take a deep breath and look me in the eyes."

"There," he continued, as the man obeyed, "you look a different fellow already. Two minutes ago you looked like a fellow who hadn't strength enough to lick a stamp, now you look ready to take off your shirt and fight a bear."

A ripple of laughter ran down the line. The man himself grinned. Chins rose. Shoulders straightened. Stilled hearts grew warmer.

"That's the way to go after a job," continued the preacher, slapping his object lesson on the back. "The man who can hold his chin up and look the boss straight between the eyes has the edge on the other fellow every time."

Thus he talks to them, treating them as human beings and seeking to maintain their self-respect. It is for this reason that the bread-line forms in the privacy of the alley behind the church, instead of, as in other cases, subjecting the men to the humiliation of lining up under the public gaze in the open street. As I said, he does not preach, neither does he capitalize their adversity for the sake of dubious conversions, as witness the complaint of one of the men, of the superintendent of a mission bread-line—"He preached to us a couple of hours before he'd let us eat."

As the men waited for the food to be got ready I talked with several of them. One, a young Swede, had worked on a farm all summer and had come to the city hoping for work that would tide him over the winter months. He had done nothing steadily since November. His days he spent job hunting and at night he slept on the bare floor of a police station or in the municipal lodging house. But he was philosophic. The snow would mean a shoveling job tomorrow and there was always one meal a day at the bread-line. In the spring he would go back on a farm. From another came a tale of sickness and exhausted savings. Some whined. Others were optimistic. Here and there I noticed men giving promise of good things if ever they got their chance. But for the most part the line was made of human derelicts having neither the training, the minds, nor the stability of character to surmount failure. Odd jobs would be their only portion and but for the bread-line they must starve.

Presently the call came and the first batch of men moved up to the tables. For each there was half a loaf of bread cut into slices and surmounted by a large chunk of butter and on each table stood great jugs of steaming coffee. Some ate slowly and deliberately with bent heads, in silent concentration. Others fell upon the food ravenously and gulped down cup after cup of coffee. As each finished he faded away through the door into the swirling snow, to wander ghostlike until—tomorrow.

For forty years Doctor Myers has been ministering to the bodily as well as the spiritual needs of his fellow men. His first bread-line was in Cincinnati, where he began his ministry. For years he rose each morning at 5:30 to meet his out-o'-lucks and see to their feeding. This is one form of service, he says, that the church as a whole has overlooked. It is with a touch of indignation in his voice that he speaks of the many churches standing with locked doors for the greater part of the week. He would have every church a seven-days-a-week church, feeding the bodies as well as the souls of its parishioners. If every church fulfilled its obligation to the poor at its door, he believes, poverty and hunger could be banished from the city.

Little change is to be had by talking to him of pauperizing these men whom he feeds daily without question. He will admit that for the most part they are chaff, but his experience tells him that in the chaff is to be found the occasional grain of wheat, the saving of which is worth all the rest. A score of untoward events may force an industrious, ambitious man into the bread-line. Hunger is neither a crime nor a disgrace. Sickness, hard times, seasonal trade fluctuations—many things may be responsible. It is only if he stays there that shame creeps in. But Doctor Myers makes every effort to prevent this; to "shoo" them out to where work is more likely to be found and bread-lines are not available, and to find them jobs.

Without divulging names, for, oddly enough while a successful man will boast of his erstwhile poverty, he locks the secret of the bread-line deep within his heart, Doctor Myers will recount case after case of men whom he has fed rising to places of varying importance in the world. And if their stories could be told they would spell Fortune with a capital "R". As I looked along the line I could not help wondering whether I was one day destined to see any of those faces again under happier and more prosperous circumstances.

But it is not food alone that the out-o'-lucks receive from the hands of Doctor Myers. Medical attention always to be had at Immanuel church. It is nothing new for men to keel over and collapse after reaching the church door simply from long fasting, and these are given a physician's care. Warm clothing, too, is supplied and here is a significant side-light upon the eighteenth amendment. In the old days of the saloon an overcoat seldom stayed with a man more than a few hours and the saloonkeepers literally dealt in old clothing on the side. Now, I was told, there being no need to part with his coat for food, because of the line, and the saloon having gone, a man, once equipped was equipped for the winter.

And so for thirty years Immanuel church has been feeding and clothing all who have come to it in need, and I know of the work. A great work, done without noise without shouting, or plea for praise, how great a work of those of the bread-line know—and they are silent men.

The Mexican Religious Crisis in Protestant Missions

BY FRANK A. SMITH

THE public press has been filled the last few days with reports of a disturbing religious situation in the republic of Mexico. The apparent meaning of the information is that Roman Catholic priests and Protestant missionaries are being driven out of Mexico solely because they are of some other nationality than Mexican. A careful examination of the Mexican situation will reveal the following fact: The Mexican constitution of 1917 provided that only Mexican citizens could serve as priests and ministers of religion. It guarantees to Mexican churches and Mexican ministers of religion the fullest measure of liberty in the exercise of whatever faith they may profess, but plainly prohibits foreigners from engaging in ministerial or priestly functions. The attitude which is now being taken by the Mexican government, with relation to teachers of religion and religious properties, is strictly in accord with the constitution, and as such is entitled to the respect of law-abiding people. It might easily be inferred from the public press that the various Protestant home mission societies were calling upon the United States government to intervene in Mexico in behalf of religious interests. Church and state are separated in Mexico even more widely than in this country, and the only aim of the government is to preserve religious liberties and religious buildings for the people without the domination of foreign religious leaders. The nine denominations represented in the committee on cooperation in Latin America have made no application, either to the president or the department of state, for any special consideration. This is in entire accord with the time-honored principle of Baptists. It has been reported that the Mexican government is seeking to expel from Mexico all foreign missionaries, but a cable from the president and the secretary of the Mexico City evangelical committee on cooperation received Feb. 18, says, "Facts misrepresented in press. No evangelical missionaries expelled nor schools closed."

These provisions of the constitution have been well known since its publication and the American Baptist Home Mission Society and the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society have requested their missionaries and members to live within the Mexican constitution. The pastors of our Mexican Baptist churches are all Mexican citizens. The Home Mission Society maintains three missions in the republic: Dr. A. B. Rudd, for many years an honored and successful missionary, is the superintendent of our work. He is not the pastor of any church nor does he exercise any pastoral function. His work is that of representative of the Home Mission Society in many of the financial interests which are involved in all mission enterprises, and also the administering of such funds the society spends in support of native pastors. In all visits to the churches he has shown excellent judgment and has made constant effort to keep within the provisions of the law. No special communication has been received to this writing, but it is believed that the Baptist situation is not materially different from that outlined in the telegram from the Mexican city evangelical committee. In addition to this the society supports Prof. G. F. McKibben, a teacher in the seminary at Saltillo, and Dr. F. B. Meadows, superintendent of our hospital in Puebla. The Woman's Home Mission Society also supports two teachers and two nurses, all in Puebla.

The Home Mission Society is keeping in close touch with the situation. It is counselling the pastors and church members to be loyal in their support of the constitution. Regarding church property the society conforms strictly to the provisions of the constitution and is now, in cooperation with other missionary bodies, seeking to take up with the Mexican government the question of titles to church property and guaranteeing the use of such property for church services.

These are trying days for our fellow-Baptists in Mexico. They are deserving of our sympathy and confidence in the largest measure. It is an hour in which our Northern Baptists should feel deeply that our God, who rules by infinite wisdom and mercy, will ordain all things to the establishment of his kingdom, and we should pray that the presence of him who has promised to be with his church always, may be realized in the fullest measure by our fellow Baptists in Mexico.

Has America a Youth Movement?

Where is the flaming sword of righteous indignation over any vital matter being lifted?

BY WILLIAM L. STIDGERS

IS THERE a youth movement in America? Answer: There is not!

I interviewed a dozen of the keenest editorial and ministerial minds in the press group and the ministerial group at the Evanston conference, and unanimously these men agreed that there is no actual youth movement in the United States.

Stanley High has stated the case for a youth movement in Europe, but he would be hard put to it to convince anybody that there is a youth movement in America.

Each year since the war the so-called youth movement in America has been diminishing in spirit and size. At Louisville the Easter meeting was a tumultuous gathering, with most of the tumult over the protests of ex-soldiers against war.

The Indianapolis conference was milder than the Louisville conference, and the Evanston conference was not so turbulent as the average meeting of a ladies' aid society.

It was made up largely of cane carrying crusaders, and it once did the flaming sword of righteous indignation over anything seem to be lifted.

About a thousand students were present and registered, with about three hundred registered non-combatants in the galleries. These non-combatants were largely made up of teachers, teachers, and the curious who like to travel during the holidays to any spot where something may be going on.

We non-combatants went with the idea there would be something going on; that great international questions could be discussed with some glimmerings of intelligence; that racial questions would be faced frankly and handled with ungloved hands; that social questions would be met with intellectual honesty and sincerity; that family skeletons would be trotted out and dusted off in this annual gathering of the clan.

And mentioning klan—up to Tuesday evening it had not even been whispered. There was not as much frankness in the discussion of this question as one may find in the average annual church conference.

About the sanest thing that was said—and the frankest—was said by a negro girl in these words: "We don't ask you white people for social equality. We don't even ask you to help us up. All we ask is that you will get out of our way and let us help ourselves up!"

Classifying the Conference

In fact the conference could well be classed as a conference for conservation of conservatism. The youth of our denominational colleges are suffering from three things, according to an innocent bystander who happens to be one of the most brilliant minds in America: "With ignorance of international affairs; with a lack of discipline; and with conservatism that would be a shame to their elders."

Compared with either the Louisville or the Indianapolis meeting, this conference was mild and gentle. It would have stood unhitched. It might honestly have been called a "horse and wagon" conference.

There was more talk about a young University of Michigan teacher who went on a hunger strike than there was about the World Court. I heard rumors all day Tuesday and Wednesday of this chap's devotion. He had the executive committee worried. One of the prime movers of the conference confessed to me that he hadn't slept one night for thinking about that martyr who was on a hunger strike. He got me curiously interested in this heroic chap. I pictured to myself a pale, anemic, Lincoln-like fellow, devoted to an ideal.

I sought him out and found him to be a little round-bellied, temperamental boy born in Czecho-Slovakia, who looked like Humpty Dumpty—as fat as a cream puff, with enough superfluous fatty tissue to hibernate all winter. That chap could have gone on a hunger strike for weeks and never have known it. He had enough food stored up to last indefinitely.

When I asked him why he was going on his hunger strike and why he was burdening this harassed executive committee and making them stay awake nights when world affairs demanded their immediate attention and unceasing devotion, he said: "They won't let me make a speech!"

"Are you a student?" I asked him.

"No! I'm a teacher of engineering in the University of Michigan."

"Then you have no right to make a speech, for you are not a member of this conference."

"But when the committee sent out their invitations they said that anybody could make speeches, and I want to make a speech! I've just got to make a speech! I'll starve myself to death if they don't let me make my speech!"

He Would Speak or Starve

Then the tears came into his eyes. That boy certainly did want to make a speech. He was willing to starve in order to get a chance to make a speech.

So far as I have been able to discover, he did not make his speech and he did not starve. But there was more gossip in the lobbies and more talk in the executive committee over this lad's hunger strike than there was over the question of capital and labor.

I even went so far as to take this boy to lunch, but he steadfastly refused to eat. He was in earnest about that desire to make that speech.

He was a symbol of the whole conference. Nearly everybody there had come with that same desire to make a speech. And—most of them made one. A few who were denied this privilege—about four out of the thousand delegates—expressed themselves in the lobbies. What they said was not highly complimentary to the committee that had charge of the speech-making, or to those who actually made the speeches. In fact, I gathered from those devotional sessions in the lobbies that all the real speakers had been eliminated by the committee on oratory. These out-cast orators, these eliminated elocutionists admitted to me and other curious onlookers that much priceless eloquence was being overlooked.

The only reason why more of them didn't go on hunger strikes was because my friend from Czecho-Slovakia thought of it first and it had lost its originality.

About the only persons who didn't make speeches at that conference were myself, the men who really sat behind the scenes to manipulate the lights and the smoke screens, and the janitor. And even the janitor broke over one afternoon when the session lasted until long past his mealtime, but his speech would not be fit to print in this pious paper.

The most momentous question settled at the conference was the decision of one speaker, shouting with a grand gesture of eloquence and a ring of renunciation: "Let's not scrap the church!"

I felt greatly relieved at this. I looked in the newspapers the next day to see if the reporters had caught its full significance. I expected to see a big black headline across the front pages of the newspapers of the world: "Youth Decides Not to Scrap the Church!" But they were not there! The speaker's magnanimous oratory, however, seemed to meet the unanimous approval of the students. I trembled to think what might have happened if they had decided to do away with the church entirely.

At the time the Evanston conference was proceeding, another momentous student conference of the Methodist Church South was in session at Memphis. A preacher friend of mine was in attendance. There were five thousand registered students. They too attempted to decide one of the great world-shaking questions. They were discussing the "amusement question." Some desperate Daniel asked whether dancing might be permitted in churches.

A church official arose in the meeting—a watch dog of international morals—patted that body of five thousand students patronizingly on their heads and said: "My boys and girls, you are now getting into deep water. There is a little book called the Methodist Discipline which settles that question, and I fear you are treading on dangerous ground. You had best not discuss that!"

Wow! "Boys and girls!"

Which reminds me that the only real excitement of the Evanston conference was when Dr. Ralph Diffendorfer of the Methodist Episcopal foreign mission board in answering a question from the platform, in a slightly patronizing but friendly manner, said, "Now, my boy, just be calm!"

That "my boy" was just like dropping a pile driver on a ton of dynamite, or playfully hammering a tube of nitroglycerin up against a brick building. There was an explosion.

The conference didn't like that "my boy" phrase. It was old stuff. They had had enough of it. Would the speaker kindly take it back and tie it up in its Egean stall back in the past where it belonged? Would he please apologize to the conference for such a terrible insult? Would he please banish himself from the platform? And all this was said to one of the men who had made it financially possible for them to be there! But that crowd just wouldn't, and couldn't stand to be "my boy'd!"

Except the hunger strike for the sake of the sacred rights of making a speech, the "my boy" incident was the most talked-about incident of the conference. Mere matters like the World Court, the racial questions that confront the United States, and the question of social justice, were more or less subordinated to these two questions as to the inalienable right of every delegate to make a speech, and the question as to whether or not the men of forty years of age or over have any right to call college students "my boy" in addressing them in a friendly gathering.

When these two questions were fully settled the time was up, the referee's whistle blew, the seconds wiped off the chests of the participants, the resolutions committees played hob with war, peace, the World Court, the Ku Klux Klan, labor, capital; a package of Wrigley chewing gum was distributed to each delegate as a fitting souvenir of the conference, and everybody took in the Loop in Chicago. They were somewhat prepared for this hilarious adventure in the regions of the Loop, because they had just been through a series of loop-the-loops at the oratorical outing in Evanston.

Dr. Reinhold Neibuhr said in his speech: "There is no youth movement in Europe because Europe is bankrupt. There is no youth movement in America, in spite of the morning headlines, because America is rolling in wealth."

Which leads me to say, in conclusion, that the only enlightening moments on the set programs of this conference were those moments when some adult spoke.

If a thousand or more students from colleges all over America know and care as little about the great problems of life, and dare as little about them as this conference disclosed, it is a serious matter.

If this keeps on "we will be in the position of having perfectly wonderful places in which to say something and have nothing to say!"—to use an expression of Dr. H. Luccock.

Such was the conference held in one of the most beautiful church structures in America, the First Methodist Episcopal church of Evanston, Ill.

These students did not lack honesty of purpose. Most of them were in earnest and evidenced the deepest kind of sincerity. But, frankly, they did not know what they were talking about. Students who are isolated for four years from actual life and living cannot know. The professors themselves suffer from this isolation. These students were intelligent, they were enthusiastic, and Christian in the spirit. But it was plain to be seen that they were lost to facts.—The Dearborn Independent.

Open-Air Evangelism

BY SAMUEL GRAHAM NEIL

THE call to the open-air proclamation of the gospel is loud and urgent. Notwithstanding all the work of the churches the majority of the people are outside. Indifference to the claims of religion and neglect of public worship are to be found on every hand, while in some quarters there is unveiled hostility to Christianity. These facts constitute a challenge and an appeal. The churches must arouse themselves to meet a serious situation.

It is to be questioned whether there is any more effective method of doing this than by open-air preaching. The history of Christianity demonstrates this. Indifference to religion, hostility to righteousness, flagrant iniquity, have again and again driven believers in God to cry aloud in the streets.

But the open-air preacher finds his supreme inspiration in the example of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. He is the open-air preacher of all time. The greater proportion of his notable utterances were delivered in the streets, on the mountain side, and by the shore of the lake.

He ever sought the lost. The first triumphs of the gospel were won because his word was obeyed. "Go out into the highways and hedges and constrain them to come in that my house may be filled."

The truth is that the churches have no more difficult work than this. Personally, I am more than ever convinced that if we are to reach the man in the street we shall have to go into the street for the man. It is conventional to preach inside four walls; it is the ordinary method of propagating the gospel; but Wesley said: "Nothing great is accomplished by ordinary methods." When the man outside sees that the preacher and the church are interested in him, he will begin to be interested in the preacher and the church. The politician, during election, will visit from house to house to secure votes. He goes where the people are because he is anxious for their votes. Surely Christians should reveal their anxiety for the souls of men by proclaiming the gospel where the multitudes congregate. There are some outside of hurch who think that because we make so few attempts to reach them, we do not want them inside.

It is a mistake to suppose that any ordinary speaker is good enough for the open air. It is foolish to assume that the man in the street is eager to hear the gospel. Remember that in the realm of politics gifted men and women take to the open air while great economic and industrial organizations have their well-trained open-air speakers, and the weakness of much of the religious propaganda will be more easily understood. Too many of our places of worship have come to be regarded as provided almost exclusively for the religious enjoyment of settled congregations, with little or no relation to those outside.

This is an open-air age. The open-air cure is famous in the realm of medical science. We are getting more in touch with nature and nature's remedies. Open-air picture palaces, open-air concerts, and open-air "Pilgrim and Passion Plays" are exceedingly popular.

Christianity is Jesus Christ; therefore, "preach Christ," proclaim the great principles he proclaimed, dwell on the great theme of the gospel, show the relationship of Jesus and his teaching to the world-wide, national, social and individual aspects of life. And just as the sun disperses the clouds, so the revealing of Christ and his teaching will disperse the mists of misconception and misunderstanding. The most valuable defense of religion is the proclamation of the positive gospel with conviction, passion, yea, with enthusiasm.

Whose Weakness Is Scatteration

The present-day preacher is a multifarious person whose weakness is scatteration. There was a day, and there were circumstances, when the minister was allowed to concentrate on the most important duty—preaching, but no longer may we call the minister the preacher, for this is reckoned among the least of his tasks. He is the organizer, the executive, the parish visitor, the debt-raiser, the church builder, the committee chairman, the marrier, the buyer, the baptizer, the lecturer, the talker, the speech-maker, the janitor, perhaps—but there is no assumption that he is par excellence the preacher. No man can be a good preacher, not to say a great preacher, who does not read widely, write extensively, think deeply, pray constantly, and keep in touch with the best minds available. A distributed mind develops neither power nor passion. A distracted mind is not capable of great concentration in the moments that come from study and meditation. Musing is a matter that takes time. You cannot warm emotion in a minute. No fine action is possible without a heart heated to the point of production. Preaching, real preaching, great preaching, is an essential in the establishment and maintenance of the kingdom of God on earth.

For all-round effect in open-air preaching, a positive gospel is essential. It is necessary sometimes to defend the faith against the attacks of unbelievers. Yet it is a foolish policy constantly to be advertising the opponents of the Christian religion. Much skeptical literature would have had little circulation but for the publicity given it by religious apologists.

"It's a good thing to remember,
But a better thing to do,
To work with a construction gang,
And not with the wrecking crew."

A banned book generally circulates far beyond its merits or demerits. The gratuitous advertisement given to such by some well-meaning defenders of "the faith" have doubtless gratified many opponents of religion.

If we really want large congregations to hear the gospel, we can be sure of getting them by taking an hour some time in the open air. It is not essential to begin the meeting with a hymn; neither is it necessary to pray. Just start speaking to the people around and others will draw near. Get the people in devotional mood—this cannot be forced. A short prayer at the end and the benediction is preferable. If you cannot get any singers a speaker is quite sufficient; and if you cannot get a speaker, get some singers to sing some popular hymns. Singing is often preaching.

The results of open-air preaching are greater than can be estimated. Outside my window is a yard. When the owner was sowing the seeds, it was a windy day and the seeds were blown about and he could not see where all of them fell. The lawn now is one mass of green. Open-air preaching is like the sowing on a windy day. People constantly pass and re-pass—only a word may be remembered; but the seed is sown and it often grows up where it is least expected.

An open-air meeting was proceeding at a sea-side resort, when a stranger asked to be allowed to speak. He said, "Several years ago I was here for my vacation. I heard a few words at a similar meeting to this. Those words led to my conversion. Afterwards I became a medical missionary and now I am home on furlough."

It is still true that nothing interests men so much as religion. Rationalism never has secured and cannot now secure anything like the audiences that gather together to hear about Christ. "Preach the Word." "Be instant in season and out of season." "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand, for thou knowest not whether shall prosper or whether they both shall be alike good."

The Problems of the Physicist

THE learned physicist and the man in the street were standing together on the threshold; about to enter a room. The man in the street moved forward without trouble, planted his foot on a solid, unyielding plank at rest before him, and entered.

The physicist was faced with an intricate problem. To make any movement he must shove against the atmosphere, which presses with a force of fourteen pounds on every square inch of the body. He must land on a plank traveling at twenty miles a second round the sun; a fraction of a second earlier or later the plank would be miles away from the chosen spot. He must do this whilst hanging from a round planet head outward into space, with a wind of ether blowing at no one knows how many miles a second through every interstice of his body. He reflects, too, that the plank is not what it appears to be—a continuous support for his weight. The plank is mostly emptiness: very sparsely scattered in that emptiness are myriads of electric charges dashing about at great speed, but occupying at any moment less than a billionth part of the volume which the plank seems to fill continuously. It is like stepping on a swarm of flies. Will he not slip through? No; if he makes the venture, he falls for an instant, till an electron hits him and gives a boost up again; he falls again, and is knocked upwards by another electron; and so on.

The effect on some minds of this presentation of the universe by modern science reminds one of the scene in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," as the pilgrims were struggling in the slough of despond, Pliable called out: "Where are we now, Brother Christian?" to which he presently made answer: "Verily, I do not know!"

The Devotional Life

Taken for Granted

BY JOHN MASON WELLS

CERTAIN virtues and ideals are taken for granted in connection with a Christian personality. It ought not to be necessary to say that a Christian is honest, that his word is dependable, that he pays his bills, that he fulfills the common duties of a responsible citizen. If he is a minister in a Baptist church, certain beliefs are taken for granted. It is assumed without question that he believes in the fundamentals of Christianity.

In a conversation with one of our leading missionaries regarding the present financial situation, he said he believed Christian people were paralyzed by the spirit of fear and distrust. Instead of taking it for granted that our Christian brothers are living for Christ and his kingdom, that they are true to the fundamentals of the Christian faith and that they are consecrated to the furtherance of its cause, we seem, at the present time, to be taking the opposite attitude. Unless they state that they believe in these things we assume that there is a measure of uncertainty in regard to their religious beliefs and conduct. Such an attitude is paralyzing and has resulted in a serious loss in spiritual inspiration, in cooperation and in loyal giving.

Faith in Folks

Would it not be better for us to assume that our brothers are true to the gospel of Christ and go ahead in the spirit of faith and confidence? I believe it is better to trust people and occasionally be deceived than always to distrust them and occasionally find one's skepticism is well founded.

But how can we return to a position of mutual confidence?

In the first place it ought to be taken for granted that the church of Jesus Christ is the body of Christ and is the agent for carrying forward the work which Jesus began. As he fulfilled the hopes of the past, so the church of today ought to fulfill the hopes of the loyal Christians who laid the foundations on which we are building.

In the second place, it ought to be taken for granted that as Jesus taught important truths of the kingdom of God, so the church is continuing this teaching function. In our Sunday schools, from our pulpits and through our schools and colleges the things which Jesus regarded as important and the things which he emphasized in word and deed, should be declared to the world with no uncertain sound.

A Healing Mission

In the third place, it is the business of the church to carry forward the healing work which Jesus began. In part we are doing this by making use of the health knowledge which has been given us. Our doctors, nurses and hospitals in the name of Christ are carrying forward this work. We are coming to realize, however, that there is a great deal of sickness which is mental and spiritual in character and this kind of illness can be healed only by faith, by the right attitude toward life, by confidence in men and in God and by living the rational and optimistic life. It is the business of the church to heal these people as Jesus healed them by bringing them into right relations with God.

In the fourth place, Jesus came as the Saviour. He brought sinners to repentance and men who were laden with sin, to the cleansing fountain. The church should carry forward this saving work and in plain language should call black, black; covetousness, covetousness; greed, greed; and sin, sin. It is the business of the church to make men and women realize their own iniquity and the church should lead them to cry unto God for forgiveness and salvation.

In the fifth place, the church should achieve results by the same methods as were used by Jesus. It is not enough for us to wish for good things. It is not enough for us to criticize other people. It is not enough for us to pray and worship. It is our business to bear fruit, to get results, to bring things to pass. Jesus did this not only through his own efforts but by calling about himself a group of men who became loyal co-workers and followers. The church has advanced when it has had this same spirit of cooperation and loyalty and it has failed when this spirit has been lost.

Is it not time for us to take the same attitude that Jesus took and in true partnership and devotion, join hands again, with Christ in the center? I believe that the great hosts of Christian people are loyal to Christ in their heart of hearts and that the present criticism, fault-finding and trouble-making is of the devil and not of Christ.

Galilee and Gethsemane

In the sixth place, it is the business of the church to follow Christ not only over the beautiful fields of Galilee, but through the garden of Gethsemane and to the cross of Calvary. Is it not true that too many of us are now busy saving ourselves, whereas we ought to be busy saving others? Our Master taught us that he that saves his life will lose it and only he that loses his life for Christ's sake will find it. Do we believe these words of the Master? Are we ready to work long hours, to endure hardships, to think not of ourselves but with Christ-like devotion carry on the work that he began?

'Meeting Helps' on C. L. P. Topics for March 21

Note: All references hereafter made in these "Meeting Helps" will be to the following books: "Modern Discipleship and What It Means" by Woods; "Twelve Tests of Character" by Fosdick; "The Man Nobody Knows" by Barton; "Gates and Keys to Bible History" by Robinson; "How We Got Our Bible" by Smith; "A Short History of the Christian Church" by Moncrief; "Peasant Pioneers" by Miller; "God's Dynamite" by Lerrigo. The books may be had from the American Baptist Publication Society. A few others may be added later.

On pages 353-354 and 411-412 of "A Short History of the Christian Church" by Moncrief, you will find very briefly something about the Baptists in Europe and America.

In order to impress this subject on the members, fix up two "fences" out of cardboard, these to enclose a small area, say a foot square, of space. Perhaps you can just knock the bottom out of two boxes for this purpose. In meeting have one of these "fences" on the table and explain that it is representative of the restrictions placed upon the religious thinking of people in the early days. Then tell briefly of the Reformation, of the beginning of Baptists in Europe. Show that here, too, the people were restricted, by a "fence" so to speak. Then tell of how they broke away from these restrictions and went to a new country. Perhaps as this is told, the leader can really break the cardboard "fence" and leave it lying on the table.

Tell of the life in the new country, and of the religious restrictions that were duly placed upon the people there. In telling this, the other "fence" may be brought into view and "erected" on the table. Tell the story of Roger Williams and of his breaking down the "fence" of prejudice and restriction. Here, too, the "fence" may be broken by the leader and allowed to lie broken.

Perhaps the question can be raised as to whether there are today people who want to place "fences" of restriction around the religious thinking of others.

"Ephphatha"

Backward denominations have always held the philosophy of our grandmothers' saying: "Let sleeping dogs lie." It is a saying which works well so long as it is confined to dogs. But the minute you generalize upon it, you find yourself in difficulties.

For example, if you apply the philosophy to Baptist young people, you muzzle them and give them opiates and get no response but snores. It is peaceful now. But twenty years hence, when they should be waking from this sabbatical nap, it will still be peaceful—peaceful as death—and about as fortunate.

Forward-marching denominations have another and a different philosophy. It is well pictured in the story of Jesus and him who was deaf and had an impediment in his speech. And He said unto him "Ephphatha," that is, "Be opened!" "And," the story continues, "his ears were opened and the bond of his tongue was loosed, and he spake plain." Apply this to the Baptist young people in our country and you have results that may astound, but which certainly point out the facts.

For they will, when they are given the opportunity, speak plainly—these young people. And the Baptist denomination has ever held the door of tolerance ajar, that their sayings might be candid.

It was nearly two years ago that the Denver convention of the B. Y. P. U. of A. brought into being a commission on current life problems, or, as it is now called, a commission on interests. At Indianapolis the commission made its first report. It had made a gigantic effort to get at the opinions of the young people. By conference, by interviews, by questionnaires, the commissioners had gathered together some two and a half thousand opinions on peace, industry, education, morality, religion, politics—and had recorded them. They were an interesting collection. Some groups approved of lynching. Some thought war would never cease. Some thought their fellows were losing their morality. On the other hand, there were those who believed that the World Court could help to foreshorten the causes of war; and some thought that the young people were on the whole genuine and eager, not bad; and not a few gave hearty disapproval of all unlawful means of disposing of criminal cases, whether suspected or proved. There was certainly no unanimity of belief. Thinking was on manifold bases. The commission felt that the groups interviewed showed on the whole very little critical ability, but bountiful interest. Its members urged the convention to extend the life of the commission, so that it might make a more thorough job of what it had to do.

On April 11 of this year the commission's work will come to a head. On that day, so it is hoped, young people all over the country will release a "conversation record" containing material which, as they check it, will register, in some elementary sense at least, their frank interests and opinions and attitudes on diverse topics of public interest. It is an attempt by some of the young people themselves to repeat in Christ's words the doctrine of Ephphatha, "Be opened." It is a measure designed to get from all the young people of our churches on the continent a spontaneous expression of what they really believe, as opposed to what others merely have judged that they believe. And the returns are to be tabulated in such fashion as to make accessible to every one interested the facts of opinion so expressed.

The commission has proceeded in the belief that the Baptists do not want to crush the young people's thinking into a squat unanimity, but that they want rather to stimulate independence and courage and care in thought. "Tuning in" with the "Conversation Record" ought to stimulate critical evaluations, as well as to record them. Certainly for the churches which send in for their copies, there is little danger of being lost in a pipe-dream with its illusions about sleeping dogs.

TUNING IN-CONVERSATION SUNDAY

The Woman Who Wrote "Uncle Tom's Cabin"*

BY CONSTANCE MAYFIELD ROURKE

THE year was 1851. Suddenly, amazingly, Mrs. Stowe had begun "Uncle Tom's Cabin," stirred by letters from Mrs. Edward Beecher, who was in Boston, describing the cruel operation of the Fugitive Slave Law, and urging her to write something in protest. "I will," she had said, clenching her hands. "If I live," she added, with her perennial picture of herself as on the brink of eternity. Tranced, surrounded by her family, she had begun without plan or forethought, breaking into ecstasies of tears and sobbing as she wrote. In utter distress she produced her great book, writing installment after installment for publication in the National Era hastily, under pressure. The book was a miracle, a greater miracle than was guessed by an enormous public. Slight as had been the little sketches written in her Cincinnati days, Mrs. Stowe now commanded structure—for, carelessly combined as it seems, the book has structure and a wealth of invention, and a free mastery of the great flow of narrative . . .

Out of her narrow and sheltered experience Mrs. Stowe had produced this book—how? Why? She herself wondered; everything she had known of slavery took on a bewildering magnitude; her mind fluttered and wavered. When she remembered her visit in Kentucky it somehow seemed an extended sojourn; perhaps there had been many visits. Building on the episode of the escaping slave whom her husband and her brother had assisted, she declared that the Underground Railway virtually ran through her house at Walnut Hills . . .

Propaganda sole and simple "Uncle Tom's Cabin" never was; it declares no platform and is unconcerned with measures. What it offers is a sweeping picture and an outcry. Destined to shake and shatter a national apathy by its blind, dynamic force, this immense protest was nevertheless rooted in Mrs. Stowe's private rebellion. Tired, unpracticed, isolated in an extraordinary measure, no longer young, she had drawn from an overwhelmed and exacerbated consciousness the fuels of war.

These deep-laid patterns of bondage and rebellion and escape were cloudy but familiar patterns for a public whose heritage in the main was identical with that of Mrs. Stowe, which had been

*"The beauty of the house is order;
The blessing of the house is content;
The glory of the house is hospitality;
The crown of the house is godliness."*

bred largely in the same faith, and was breaking away from this with a prodigious sense of fortitude. The binding, highly personalized emotion of the book seemed to envelop something elementary in the feeling of the time. It was an era of sentiment, of tears, of a billowing luxuriance in emotion; an intensive pleasure in feeling had welled up in the late forties and early fifties as if after an age of suppression, cresting in the appearance of hundreds of weeping heroines in the novel and on the still precarious stage. With its half-hidden urgent power, its sensational picture of slavery, its demand for endless tears, the career of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" became torrential; it ran through numberless editions in this country and in Canada and England, and was quickly translated into languages which ranged from French and German and Italian to Finnish and Wallachian and the Hindu dialects. It swept the stage in innumerable versions that were repeated with all the casual changes incidental to the production of a folk play; indeed, on the stage the story was in all ways taken completely out of Mrs. Stowe's hands; through a hiatus in the copyright law she reaped none of the benefits of a vast dramatic production. Licensed or not, its influence continued to sweep in great widening circles. Unwittingly, Mrs. Stowe had written an abolitionist tract; her book gave momentum to an enormous volume of gathering anti-slavery sentiment. As a result of it, more than through any other cause, the enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Law became impossible. . . .

"So you want to know what sort of a woman I am!" she wrote gayly to Mrs. Follen in London, in response to a brief little note. "To begin, then, I am a little bit of a woman—somewhat more than forty, about as thin and dry as a pinch of snuff, never much to look at in my best days, and looking like a used-up article now. I was married when I was twenty-five years old to a man rich in Greek and Hebrew, Latin and Arabic, and alas! in nothing else. When I went to housekeeping my entire stock of china for parlor and kitchen was bought for eleven dollars. That lasted very well for two years, till my brother was married and brought his bride to visit me. I then found, on review, that I had neither plates nor teacups to set a table for my father's family; wherefore I thought it best to reinforce my establishment by getting a tea set that cost ten dollars more, and this, I believe, formed my whole stock in trade for some years . . . The nursery and the kitchen were my principal fields of labor. Some of my friends, pitying my trials, copied and sent a number of little sketches to certainly liberally paying 'Annuals' with my name. With the first money that I earned in this way I bought a feather-bed! for as I had married into poverty and without dowry, and as my husband had only a large library of books and a great deal of learning, the bed and pillows were thought the most profitable investment. After this I thought that I had discovered the philosopher's stone . . . When a new carpet or mattress was going to be needed, or when my accounts, like poor Dora's, wouldn't add up, then I used to say . . . I'll write a piece, and then we'll be out of the scrape. So I became an author . . . I lived two miles from the city of Cincinnati, in the country, and domestic service, not always, you know, to be found in the city, is next to an impossibility in the country, even by those who are willing to give the highest wages; so what was to be expected for poor me, who had very little of this world's good to offer? . . ."

Most of her glamorous excitement was spent in writing; among people Mrs. Stowe was noticeably vague and quiet and absent-minded. Once before a dinner in her honor in Boston she remained upstairs while the guests waited; and her hostess found her standing before a bookcase, still in her bonnet and shawl absorbed in "Sir Charles Grandison." But quiet or not, she persistently left Brunswick; she traveled; she visited friends and relatives; she spent weeks with her now famous brother, Henry Ward Beecher, in Brooklyn; and though she told Calvin Stowe not to murmur he seems to have murmured a great deal. He disliked this translation of his wife into inaccessible spheres; he resented being thrust into a position of relative obscurity. He was proud of her achievement in an inarticulate fashion.

BOYS and Girls

Exploring for a Word

(Number I is taken from the letters of Bishop Hannington to his little nieces and nephews at home in England while he was in Africa; Number II is given in "Sketches from the Dark Continent," by Willis R. Hotchkiss.)

I

Says Bishop Hannington:
In some of the places I passed through in Central Africa, they had never seen a white man before. They would gather round me in dozens, and gaze upon me with the utmost astonishment.

One would suggest that I am not beautiful—in plainer language that I am amazingly ugly. Fancy a set of hideous features regarding a white man, regarding your uncle, as a strange outlandish creature, frightful to behold.

As with other travelers, my boots hardly ever failed to attract attention.

"Are those your feet, white man?"

"No gentlemen, they are not. They are my sandals."

"But do they grow to your feet?"

"No gentlemen, they do not. I will show you."

So forthwith I proceed to unlace a boot. A roar of astonishment followed when they beheld my blue socks, as they generally surmised that my feet were blue and toeless. Greater astonishment still followed the withdrawal of the sock and the revelation of a white, five-toed foot. I frequently found that they considered that only the visible parts of me were white, namely my hands and face, and that the rest of me was as black as they were.

An almost endless source of amusement was the immense amount of clothing, according to their calculation, that I possess. That I should have waistcoat and shirt and jersey underneath a coat seemed almost incredible, and the more so when I told them it was chiefly on account of the sun I wore so much. My watch, too, was an unfailing attraction.

"There's a man in it!"

"It is Lubari; it is witchcraft!" they would cry.

"He talks; he says 'Teek! Teek! Teek!'"

My nose they compared to a spear; it struck them as so sharp and thin compared with the African production. Oftentimes one bolder than the rest would give my hair and beard a sharp pull, thinking them wigs worn for ornament only!

the steep mountain sides into the part of Africa known as Ukamba land. Women and children working in the fields run in terror before the white man's approach, but a few young warriors, bolder than the rest, come closer, and when we stop to rest, spring up like magic all around us.

Stork-like, they stand on one foot, the other being drawn up and resting on the knee. Stolidly they gaze for a little while, but curiosity finally gets the better of them, and they begin pointing, and—is that language? Are they really talking? What a meaningless jargon! And we must learn that! Without grammar or vocabulary we must bring order out of this chaos of sounds.

An inquisitive young fellow, pointing to something, utters a single word, "NICHAU?"

What does he mean? We conclude that he is asking, "What is it?" In order to prove it, I point to the nearest object, which happens to be his bow, and to his surprise I say, "Nichau?" He hesitates and then answers, "Uta."

The two words are hastily jotted down phonetically and we have the beginning of the Kikamba vocabulary.

Day after day, through the months that follow, we fling that word "Nichau?" in their teeth, and pester them with it on every occasion, until we have mastered several thousand words. How we long to preach the gospel to the multitudes who are perishing all about us! Yet it was long after we were able to converse on ordinary topics before we could intelligently set before them spiritual things.

For two years and a half I searched in vain to obtain one word. But it was the word that has belted the world in praise; the word that brings order out of the chaos of man's vain search for God; the word that is yet destined to make dark Africa light in the Lord. That word was "Saviour." Never had it seemed so sweet, so incomparably beautiful!

Hour after hour I sat with Kikui and others, trying in every conceivable way to draw out the magic word. The very day on which my search was ended, I had no less than five persons in my room, questioning, explaining, but all to no avail.

With the master passion tugging at my heart, I went to the men's quarters and seated myself with them around the blazing campfire. Minutely they recounted the incidents of the day, and Kikui—the most intelligent and trustworthy native I ever saw—launched into a story that made me hopeful of getting the long-sought-for word.

Brother Kreiger, laboring in another tribe, had been badly torn by a lion, and Kikui had been the means of his rescue. Surely the word must come now! Two years and a half of disappointment were put into the eagerness with which I listened. He went through the whole scene most eloquently, but concluded, even to having frightened the lioness away, without using the word for which I was seeking. Finally, however, just as I was about to give up again in despair, in a modest sort of way, he remarked: "Bwana nukuthaniwa na Kikui" (The master was saved by Kikui).

Being afraid of losing my precious possession, I immediately changed the verb from the passive to the active form, and said:

"Ukuthania Bwana?" (you saved the master?) This proving correct, I said: "Why Kikui, this is the word I have been trying to get you to tell me these many days, because I wanted to tell you that Jesus, the Son of God came!"

"O yes," he interrupted, and his black face lighted up as he turned to me in the lurid light of the campfire, "I see it now, I understand! Jesus came to 'kuthania' (save) us from our sins, and to deliver us from the hands of 'Muimu' (Satan)."

Completely overcome, I rushed into the house and fell on my face in thanksgiving before God.

Next day was the Sabbath. In the early morning I was sitting in my house singing a rough translation of a hymn I had just made, and accompanying it on my guitar, when Kikui came in and said there was a crowd outside who wanted to hear me. I went out with joy-bells ringing in my soul, and sang for them. But I wanted to preach—to set before them my great discovery.

"Muthania! Saviour!"—it rang through my being like music.

I began to speak to them, but before long I was interrupted by Kikui with a query relative to the resurrection, which is always an amazing thing to them. This was encouraging, for questions betoken interest and aid greatly in the work. His question answered, he surprised me still more by saying:

"Master, let me talk a little."

Wondering what he would say, I gave him permission, and in a truly marvelous way, he began to tell the "old, old story."

I listened in amazement. I could scarcely believe that he had grasped the thought so intelligently from the frag-

Among Ourselves

A Layman and the Proposed Amendment

BY JAMES C. COLGATE

COMING home from business the other afternoon, I noticed on the table where we keep our periodicals a copy of THE BAPTIST, side by side with the Watchman-Examiner. Fearing spontaneous combustion from such proximity, I hastened to separate them, and in doing so noticed on the front pages of each the picture of a church—the First church of Pasadena. Had it not been that the name was given in each instance, I never would have recognized them as pictures of the same church. One gave the front view, the other the side view; both doubtless accurate, but totally unlike. The thought came to me immediately, does not this throw light upon the controversy waged between the fundamentalists and the modernists? Can it be that they are giving impressions of truth from different angles?

I remember once hearing some one ask my father his opinion of the stock market. My father replied: "The red-headed man says buy and the black-haired man says sell." The human element, the individual turn of mind, the personal mentality, has much to do with deciding to which group one belongs. Should we not therefore be charitable toward each other in this regard rather than pugnacious?

In both papers I noticed something about "The Amendment."

I am opposed to that amendment, for several reasons. In the first place, I do not think it is within the province or purpose of the Northern Baptist Convention to pass upon questions of this kind. That it is within its right, I do not deny, unless it interferes with the contract or agreement by which the Free Baptist churches were admitted to the convention. This is a question of law, and I should be guided by the opinion of the law committee after it has given the question due consideration.

The convention has the right to pass a by-law that would make a church ineligible to membership in the convention that worshiped in a building any part of which was used for commercial purposes. It might make ineligible any church whose pastor wore a gown in the pulpit.

Inasmuch, however, as the convention is a business corporation—without the slightest New Testament sanction—organized simply for the purpose of carrying on in a cooperative way the business of the denominational societies, it seems a mistake for it to attempt to regulate the procedure of individual churches, to become instead of a business organization a sort of house of bishops or general assembly.

I am opposed to the principle of this amendment, for the reason that it lays an emphasis upon the rite of immersion which makes it appear that this rite is the main thing for which the denomination stands and has stood, overlooking the fact that the strength and glory of the Baptist denomination is, and always has been, religious liberty, the direct responsibility of the individual, the separation of church and state, and believers' baptism.

Again, I am opposed to this amendment because it is unnecessary. Its obvious purpose is to exclude the Park Avenue church from membership in the Northern Baptist Convention. I am not a member of that church, though I have worshiped with it for some years and have contributed through it to the work of the convention. I have no authority to speak for that church, but I am sufficiently familiar with its aims and spirit to venture the opinion that its attitude would be that expressed by Doctor Woelfkin in his address at Seattle. If a direct vote of the convention showed that a representative portion of the convention—not a mere faction—is opposed to its continued membership in the convention, it would withdraw without controversy. It has deliberately taken the position taken by English churches. It will accept members by letter from other evangelical denominations and will upon profession of faith accept into its membership those who for various reasons do not appreciate the spiritual significance of baptism as we understand it and are therefore unwilling to submit to a rite with which they do not fully sympathize. This position has been taken in the belief that it is in accordance with the historic position of the Baptist denomination, and, what is more important, that it is in accord with the spirit and teaching of Christ.

It has no desire to urge other churches to accept this view, but believes that on this basis it can accomplish its best work for the Master in this city and in the world.

If this position renders its cooperation unacceptable to a substantial working portion of the convention, I would be greatly surprised if it made any attempt to assert its rights, but I believe it would regretfully withdraw from an association in which it was not wanted.

All of which is suggested by the pictures of the church on the front page of THE BAPTIST and the Watchman-Examiner, totally different, but the same church.

Evangelism in a Boys' School

BY R. W. SWETLAND

LET us understand at the beginning that we are thinking of evangelism in its definition as the preaching or promulgation of the gospel, and the "preaching" to boys includes every word and act of life on the part of the preacher, not merely what he may say from the platform or the pulpit in a set and formal way.

With this understanding it is easy to see that evangelism is a continuous and progressive process, not to be confused with spasmodic "evangelistic meetings" nor to be measured in its results by the number of "converts" reported. Evangelism in its proper and normal meaning thus becomes the daily, yes, hourly, task of every Christian teacher, whether his contact with the boy be at a religious meeting, a Bible study, a class-room recitation, a football practice, or a quiet chat in the dormitory.

To this every-day evangelism boys are readily responsive. For youth is naturally religious. As Headmaster Drury of St. Paul's has well said in his chapter on "The Education of the Modern Boy", "You do not have to carry in religion—it is there. . . . You will not have half sensed the education of the modern boy unless you recognize him as a natural disciple of spiritual things. . . . The school years are intensely sensitive years, aglow with religion or God-consciousness."

The task of the school, then, is to stimulate, direct and develop this "God-consciousness" and weave it into the warp and woof of the boy's character. For it is not the foundation or the denominational background that makes a school Christian, nor is it the daily chapel service, the required Bible study, the compulsory church attendance, or the pious exhortations of teachers though these all have their place and their influence. That is a Christian school which centers all its activities about the fact that God is in all life and that Christ is the challenging and compelling example of what each man's life should become.

Results? God and eternity alone can tell. You may see them in the sudden change of life of a boy who is what we call "converted," though his numbers are few among modern boys; you may see them in other boys in the gradual but steady development from a frivolous purposeless boyhood into a sturdy Christian manhood; you may see results only in later years as in the case of a peppery profane and pugnacious football captain who wrote me recently to say that he was now a deacon in a Baptist church in a Georgia city and proud to fight as hard for his Master, Jesus Christ, as he once had been to fight for his team on the gridiron; and all, he said, "because fifteen years ago Peddie taught me what Christian manhood means."

Evangelism in a boys' school, then, is to practicing the presence of God amid the lives of youth that they may see the beauty of it, accepting the challenge of it, experience the joy of it, and thus, like the Master, "increase in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." It's the finest, most exacting and most fruitful task the world affords.

Iowa Letter

By JAY A. LAPHAM

DURING the holiday season Pastor R. A. Smith and his people had an unusually interesting time at Red Oak. A pageant, "God Is Love," was presented to a large audience. Mr. Smith is now rounding out seven years on this important field. He has been one of our useful men in southwestern Iowa. In the church at Red Oak the Sunday school is well organized, with departments up to the senior grade. A short time ago Mr. Smith was called to Monroe for the funeral service of Mrs. William Livingston, who has for many years taken a live interest in the church and in the life of the denomination.

Pastor L. L. Smith is now at Webb where a good interest prevails. Brother Smith takes a strong interest in our rural churches and knows how to reach the people on these fields.

Pastor W. C. Moore has served the church at Fairfield for five years. W. H. Dickinson, a graduate of Parsons college, was recently ordained by a council called at the Fairfield church. He has now gone to the seminary at Kansas City. Another Baptist student in Parsons college has been appointed for special rural missionary work near the city. Pastor Moore and his church have been active leaders in Sunday-school work in the city and county. They are now interested in missionary work among a colony of Mexicans.

Frank H. Webster has been bishop of the church at Algona for about seven years past. The church has moved steadily on with seasons of refreshing and ingathering and other times of slow growth. This church has a live interest in missions and in the whole program of the denomination. The Sunday school is one of the carefully organized schools in the Northern Association.

Pastor J. C. Clark has organized his forces with care at Emerson. The field that he tries to cultivate is twenty miles long and ten miles wide. He has eight districts and a captain for each district. Each captain has three teams. These are asked to visit every Baptist home in the district once each month, and other homes where the way may be open for winning neglected people. The interest on the field is steadily increasing.

In the Des Moines Western Association, Pastor B. M. Osgood is the senior pastor in the city in length of service. Baptist interests in the city have grown well in keeping pace with the growth of the city. A fine work has been established with a new building on the west side, and a lot has been secured for a mission in the east part of the city. A strong church night program is now in progress, running from Jan. 13 to March 10. Pastor Osgood is the director of this school. Courses of study in the Old Testament, in stewardship, teacher training, missions, for young people's work, intermediate pupils and for juniors, are covered in the school.

Pastor W. J. Coulston is in his fiftieth year in the gospel ministry. He recently held a special meeting at Mount Ayr where he is pastor and six have been baptized thus far. Brother Coulston came west from Pennsylvania where he had been active as pastor in Pittsburgh. There and since he came West he has been strongly evangelistic in his preaching. At the same time he has labored untiringly in Christian education. For a time he was pastor at St. Joe, Mo., and later he was state evangelist in Nebraska. He has been with us in Iowa for some sixteen years, and many friends congratulate him over his long and useful ministry. We are all glad that he keeps so strong and well for service. Mrs. Coulston is an excellent elementary teacher and no little part of the success that God has given this church has come from her faithful labors.

Pastor William Welsh of Denison rejoices in a revival that has seen twelve come into the church by baptism and one by experience. The pastor and Mrs. Welsh did much of the work, but the members of the church responded well. They gave a week to prayer, a week to visitation and a week to special meetings in the church.

People's church out in the country, with Pastor Charles C. Boyd as leader has had an encouraging year. Nearly $388 was raised for benevolences, $55.25 was given to Iowa Assembly. The women raised $545.25. The total budget raised for the year was $2356.98. A vacation Bible school was maintained, with an average attendance of sixty-three. This is a fine country church. It sent out no statements and asked no one for a cent, but paid all bills promptly. That sounds good.

In the passing away of Mr. Frank Miner a keen loss is felt, not only in the First church in Des Moines, but in our denominational interests generally. Dr. W. C. Bitting of St. Louis, corresponding secretary of the Northern Baptist Convention, who was present at the funeral, spoke feelingly of the delightful fellowship he and others on the board had enjoyed with Mr. Miner, and of his large help in the perplexing questions that arose. In the February Baptist Brotherhood meeting a memorial service was held for Mr. Miner, who was beloved by all the men. His winning smile and warm handshake won him friends in the church and all over the city in business circles and in social life. Words of appreciation were spoken by Messrs. Carl Proper, A. M. Piper, J. A. Lapham, S. E. Wilcox, E. G. Davis, E. L. Daugherty. His long-time friend in business and in social life, Mr. George Carpenter, was too deeply moved to speak. Pastor Harold Geistweit spoke of the personal loss he felt, because in just coming as a stranger, Mr. Miner had received him so warmly. We say, all hail and farewell, brother. We deeply sympathize with Mrs. Miner and other relatives.

Women's Baptist Mission Union of the Chicago Association

By MRS. G. A. EASTWOOD

FEB. 12, the Women's Baptist Mission Union of the Chicago Association held one of its most cheery meetings of the year at the First church, Evanston. Mrs. A. W. Charles, president, presided over the morning and afternoon sessions. Mrs. Robert L. Scott, president of the women's society of the Evanston church, and Dr. James M. Stifter, pastor, welcomed the Mission Union to Evanston. The ladies of the Evanston church

MR. SPEEDS will clean his auto,
Mr. Spurr's will groom his horse,

Mr. Gadds will go to Findlay,
With all the little Gadds, of course.
Mr. Flight will put carbolic
On his homing pigeons perch,
Mr. Weeds will work his garden,
Mr. Good will go to church.

Mr. Cleet will drive a golf ball,
Mr. Tiller steer his boat,
Mr. Popper on his cycle,
Round and round the state will mote.

Mr. Swatt will watch a ball game,
Mr. Take and son will search
Through the beaky wood for mushrooms,

Mr. Willing will go to church.

Do you ask me what's the matter;
Do you wonder what is wrong?
When the nation turns from worship,

Sermon, prayer and sacred song?
Why do people rush for pleasure,
Leave religion in the lurch?
Why prefer a padded auto
To a cushioned pew in church?

Reader, well I know the answer,
But if I should speak aloud,
What I think is the real reason
It would queer me with the crowd.
You'll be popular, dear reader,
When you yield the critics birch.
You'll be safely in the fashion
When you blame things on the church.

served luncheon to over 500 representatives from forty-eight churches.

The guests for the day were the ministers of the Chicago Association and their wives. The churches in the association now number seventy-one. Rev. Francis C. Stifler of Wilmette gave a clever welcome to the new ministers. Mrs. Charles in her cordial welcome to their wives said she was reminded of the story of Adam and Eve. After the Lord created Adam he saw that his work was good and he created Eve. And the woman pleased the man. However, had God first made Eve and then Adam, he would still be "tinkering at him, trying to please Eve."

It was city and state day and the address of the morning, delivered by Dr. A. E. Peterson, secretary of the Illinois State Convention, emphasized the importance of the state work and its far-reaching influence.

In the afternoon Mrs. W. P. Topping, state president of the Women's Missionary Societies, led the devotional service, and in telling of women's work in the state said that individual consecration is most manifest by the volunteer work of 400 women who give their time to Christian Americanization, and the more intelligent response to all endeavors in missionary work which results from the reading of missionary books by nearly 800 interested people in the state.

It was recognition day for the W. W. G. and Miss Gladys Shillstead, president of the guilds of Chicago, told of the work of the young women. Her report was followed by a candle-lighting service for the four missionaries who are entirely supported by the guild girls.

Special music was rendered by Miss Louise Stilphen of Evanston who sang "I do not ask," with a violin obligato by her mother, Mrs. C. A. Stilphen.

The sermon of the afternoon was preached by Dr. Benjamin Otto, superintendent of the Executive Council, on "Change and the Unchangeable."

With a spirit of encouragement for past work done, and a spirit of deeper consecration in completing its many unfinished tasks, the Mission Union adjourned to its annual meeting to be held at the Englewood church, March 9, 1926.

Nebraska Notes

By R. R. COON

Meetings of unusual opportunity and importance will be those held in Omaha and Lincoln when the special leader, Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougher, will visit Nebraska at those points. At the meeting of the Northern Convention in Des Moines four years ago scores of delegates left the regular meeting of the convention Sunday morning to hear Doctor Brougher in the Christian church. He comes with a ringing message to Baptists; one in Omaha, Mar. 7, and two in Lincoln, Mar. 9 and 10. Hundreds of out-of-the-city members ought to hear him.

A vacation Bible school was held in Grand Island college, conducted by Dr. Thomas S. Young of Philadelphia, with special assistants. This lasted two days and was a source of decided information to students as well as others.—The Prairie Union church, entirely rural, has filled an important place in a large country community. It is becoming fully organized in new lines of work; and just now enlarged improvements in the church building are going on.—"The Old, Old Story," a Christmas pageant, was given in the First church, Lincoln, recently, one of the best ever presented in the church.—Colporter J. F. Judkins has been spending some time in the Republican River valley with the smaller churches. This seems to be his forte—to help the weaker churches. Fortunate for them, one state worker remains as years come and go.—The church of Cedar Rapids has called to the pastorate Rev. C. V. Bittiker of Liberty, Mo.—Dean Firth of the college is supplying the church of Fairhaven. Rev. W. H. Parker has been visiting the church Sunday afternoons.—Rev. Oscar A. Creech, who came from Albany, Mo., is doing good work as pastor at Tecumseh.—Rev. Roy M. Lewis has led the important church work at Broken Bow so efficiently that we hope calls elsewhere may not remove him.—Chapman and Prairie Creek have long shared the same pastor. They present a most excellent field, one continuous territory, for service, now attractive by renewed buildings in each case. Maybe before this is printed they may secure a pastor.—Rev. Claude Neal, Rev. H. G. Smith, of Lincoln, and Director Duncan have conducted some profitable meetings in "visitation work" at Alexandria and Beatrice.

Rev. F. M. Sturtevant has thoughtfully sent to the historian an appropriate history of the Mead Immanuel church, an example we hope others will follow.—The Grand Island church has recently lost by death two prominent members, Mrs. Jorden, wife of Dr. E. F. Jorden, and Mrs. M. J. Wilcox, who was one of the few remaining very old members of the church.

Texas Notes.

While in southern Texas a few weeks we notice some items of interest, some variations to northern thought and practice. Texas of course is quite an empire and Baptists a great host here. Their state paper, the Standard has over 20,000 subscribers and is just now making big efforts for an increase of 10,000. Southwest Texas Baptist paper also circulates in this section. Association missionaries are numerous; as a rule on to an association. And their meetings. We have already attended three or four gatherings representing ten, twenty, fifty churches; and others are fast coming. At a meeting last week two addresses were given that would have honored a state convention program: one "A Living Christianity," by Dr. George Green, pastor at Austin, and one on "Gospel Comfort," by Rev. J. J. Kellam, of Yoakum.

Real Bible themes are treated in pulpits. Such topics as "The Periphery of Life," as "The Superman," "A New Gospel for a New Day" and the like find scant welcome in this section. But "Alien Immersion" is pressed vigorously a topic we haven't yet heard really explained.

This little part of the country called the Rio Grande Valley claims to be a very choice bit of the state; in fact we had heard of its beauties before coming south. A very superior cement driveway, seventy miles long, has on its line nearly a score of towns. Its fertility may make almost a continuous urban country! There is a Baptist church in nearly every town on this line, which is barely twenty-five years old; churches of from 150 to 400 members! Nebraska take notice. This last item we get from the printed minutes of the state convention distributed in the state three weeks after the convention was held! Next week we have "B. Y. P. U. Training School" in the next town under leadership of C. C. Gardner, state secretary of B. Y. P. U. By the way, they have "adult" young people's societies down here that beat Grand Island where Baptist young people's societies first started.

Today, Feb. 18, we ferried across the muddy Rio Grande into Mexico to the city of Reynosa where the Northern Baptist Convention has a mission. After an hour's seeking we found the mission, under Rev. Alphonso Gwznan, a graduate of the Baptist Theological Seminary of Stalitto, Mex. The mission has forty-one members where he preaches every Sunday and at four outstations during ple and no church of any denomination laboring here. The superintendent of evangelism of the Idaho Convention sent Mr. Sims a tent which he pitched next to the bank. Here the whole town turned out to hear him night after night. The Sunday school and the B. Y. P. U. conducted services in the tent. A ladies' aid was reorganized and the First church of Minidoka was organized with perhaps twenty members.

Mr. Sims immediately made plans for a building and raised money sufficient a membership of over forty, all the work well organized and all at work, all debts paid and the mission budget raised up to date, Mr. Sims bade them goodbye.

Besides this work Mr. Sims gave missionary sermons and lectures in the First churches at Boise, Caldwell, Weiser, Shoshone, Rupert, Twin Falls, Buhl, American Falls, Pocatello, Blackfoot and Idaho Falls, and also at the State Convention. He is now at his home in Chicago taking a little vacation before starting for South Dakota where he has promised a campaign in the Dakotas commencing at Spencer.

the week. He expects to build a chapel this year and hopes to receive aid from the convention. The only approach to anything like a church we saw in the town was an immense Catholic cathedral, but walled and locked "egress or in" preventing. The thing next most noticeable was a graveyard of startling appearance; this, too, protected by a bold stone wall with gates well-locked; an illustration of "safety first."

A Six-Months' Campaign in Idaho

A SIX months' campaign in Idaho has been closed by Rev. Earle D. Sims, church invigorator of the Home Mission Society. First Mr. Sims assisted Rev. J. L. Taylor in meetings at Mountain Home. The church was discouraged. Its building never had been completed, and it was running behind in pastor's salary. Mr. Sims preached for three weeks, and the church took on new life. The pastor's salary was all raised and paid, and improvements amounting to $1400 contracted on the building. When the building was finished it was dedicated without a debt, a fine baptismal service was held and the work of the church increased in every way.

Mr. Sims then conducted a two weeks' meeting at Hagerman. He found the town of Minidoka, situated on the main line of the Union Pacific, with 300 people to commence the work. The German Baptists had a building 18 by 30 not in use and this was deeded to the Idaho State Convention. Mr. Sims rented an ex-saloon building in which to conduct church activities while he proceeded to build a house of worship. The little German church was turned around and enlarged to 30 by 52 feet. Oct. 20 the new building was commenced, Mr. Sims making plans, purchasing all the materials and equipment, hiring all the workmen he could pay for. On Jan. 24 a modern church house valued at $7000 was dedicated without a dollar indebtedness. The building has an auditorium, pastor's study, parlors, kindergarten room, kitchen, baptistry and dressing room, all modern in every way. Rev. A. M. Petty of Oakland, Calif., preached the dedication sermon.

Rev. W. A. Shank, executive secretary of the Idaho Convention backed the work all in his power and the Idaho Convention contributed $1000 towards the building.

In the completed building Mr. Sims conducted two weeks of evangelistic meetings, assisted by any of the brethren who would help him. The house was packed at every service. Many people who had opposed the project yielded themselves to the Lord. A big baptismal service was held and many people baptized in the new baptistry. With

Connecticut News

BY HORACE B. SLOAT

Miss Esther Palacios, missionary to Porto Rico, has been in Connecticut, speaking in the Ashford association at the Stafford, South Willington, West Willington, Willimantic, First Putnam, First Danielson and East Killingly churches. Her message interested and aroused the churches to greater endeavor in the work of our missionary program.

The laymen of Connecticut are becoming deeply interested in the promotion of the denominational program among men. The State Laymen's Council, consisting of a president, a vice-president and a secretary, and a council man from each of the six associations, making in all nine men, has been set up. The council men are securing a key-man in each local church. Two meetings of the council have been held and the third meeting will be held on March 23 in New Haven. At the meeting of the council held in Hartford, on Feb. 16, Ray L. Hudson of Philadelphia delivered an interesting address which was greatly appreciated by our men.

Rev. Lester T. Mallery, pastor of the South Norwalk church, entered upon the third year of his pastorate, Feb. 7. Since Mr. Mallery's coming to South Norwalk there have been seventy-three additions to the church, fifty-seven by baptism, all incurred indebtedness has been cleared off and repairs to the extent of $4000 have been made. The Bible school is growing and the church is in a happy frame of mind. The pastor is specializing on two series of services: in the Bible school his topic is "The Essentials of the Christian Life"; in the church "fireside services," he deals with such subjects as "Honor Thy Father and Thy Mother," "Courtship," "Marriage," "A Young Man and His Purpose," "A Young Woman and Her Character," "The Bible as a Home Builder."

The work in Willington, as carried on at the South and West churches, Rev. E. E. Sundt, pastor, is well organized and aggressively prosecuted. Perhaps no rural parish in New England has a more varied and up-to-date program which ministers to men, women and young people. The pastor is alive to every interest—for example, Prof. Leroy Jones from Storrs agricultural college, poultry expert, spoke to the men's civic club recently to good effect. The pastor was greatly cheered, Feb. 7, to have twelve boys and girls definitely declare themselves as followers of Christ.

At the Central church, Hartford, Rev. J. N. Lackey, has assumed full pastoral charge. The financial report, as presented at the annual meeting, showed $36,317.92 raised for current expenses and $49,188.76 raised for benevolences during 1925. A school of missions opened on Sunday, Feb. 7, with an enrolment of more than 300. There was also conducted, beginning the week of Feb. 15, a teacher training school of religious education. The faculty consisted, in addition to local talent, of Rev. Seldon L. Roberts, Philadelphia; Miss Frances Simonds, New Britain and Miss Rose W. Greenleaf, Springfield, Mass.

First church, Waterbury, Rev. D. P. Gaines pastor, is also conducting a school of missions with a registration of 115. The president of the State Laymen's Council, Mr. A. L. Mulloy, is a member of this church.

District of Columbia

BY HENRY W. O. MILLINGTON

The weather in Washington for some time past has been not only sunless, but oppressively gloomy. There has been a gloom, however, of a different sort. A pall of sadness has settled upon our Baptist church life, owing to the death of some of our best known and most useful members. In this respect, Calvary church has been most heavily burdened. Mr. Charles I. Corby, one of the trustees of the church, and one of the largest givers, died while in Florida. Death came very suddenly while Mr. Corby and his wife were witnessing a polo game at Miami Beach. The funeral services were held on Wednesday, Feb. 17, from the home of Mr. Corby near Rockville, Md. Dr. W. S. Abernethy, pastor of Calvary church, conducted the services, assisted by Dr. J. Stanley Durkee, president of Howard university. Mr. Corby was born in Binghamton, New York, but he spent most of his life in Washington, and was the president of the Corby Baking company. Another member of Calvary church who was also a trustee, Dr. Charles A. Pfender, died in Boston, following an operation. He was professor of roentgenology at Georgetown university, and during the World War served as a roentgenologist on Medical Advisory Board No. 3. Ever active in teaching and learning in the various forms of X-ray work, Doctor Pfender was associated with leaders in that work in various societies. He was a member of the Roentgen Ray Society, the Radiological Society of North America, the District Medical Society and the Society of Paristology. Funeral services were conducted at Calvary church Saturday, Feb. 20, Dr. W. S. Abernethy officiating. The Brookland church is seriously bereft in the death of Mrs. Sarah Stevens Lynch. She and her husband were among the early members of this church, and had much to do in giving it character and strength through all the years.

Our senior pastor, Rev. J. J. Muir, chaplain of the United States Senate, is under the shadow of a great sorrow, owing to the death of his son, Major John Muir, of Philadelphia. Doctor Muir has the sympathy and prayers of his host of friends.

A number of our pastors have been suffering from the prevailing influenza, but most of them have continued in the main undertakings of their work. Rev. H. M. Lawson, of the Maryland Avenue church, however, is confined to his home by reason of a nervous breakdown, and Rev. C. B. Austin, of the West Washington church, is suffering from a severe cold. Rev. Hugh T. Stevenson has been obliged to slow up in his work, and Rev. W. E. LaRue has been kept out of his pulpit by illness.

This may seem like a doleful tale, but the spirit of our people remains strongly optimistic, and the work is going forward with unusually encouraging results. Several of our churches are conducting campaigns in personal evangelism under the leadership of Dr. H. F. Stilwell and Dr. A. B. Strickland. Dr. E. E. Richardson, the successful pastor of the Congress Heights church, has just celebrated the thirteenth anniversary of his pastorate. The superintendents of our Sunday schools recently entertained the pastors of our churches at a banquet at the City Club. This event in its practical and social values was a pronounced success.

James Percival Abbott

BY GEORGE W. TAFT

REV. James Percival Abbott, born in Woonsocket, R. I., December 8, 1846, died in Pasadena, Calif., February 17, 1926. He was a graduate of Brown University and Newton Theological institution. He became pastor of the First church of Medford, Mass., in 1877 and remained there over twenty years. In February, 1899, he went to Oshkosh, Wis., as pastor of the First church and later became pastor of the State Street church of Rockford, Ill., giving fifteen years to work in these two places. For a number of years he was instructor in Bible history, ecclesiology and Christian doctrine in the Northern Baptist Seminary, Chicago. Some three years ago, advancing years and failing health compelled him to relinquish his duties, and he went to Pasadena, Calif., making his home in that place until his death.

Doctor Abbott was wholeheartedly patriotic and intensely American. As a boy in the teens he enlisted in the Union army and this same burning love for his country was manifest to the end of his life. As a preacher he was clear and convincing, vigorous and strong, positive and winsome. He was a wise and helpful pastor, aggressive and kindly, firm and fearless. As a teacher he was the incarnation of sincerity, brotherliness, and love. As a husband and father he won and kept the affection and loyalty of his household.

Doctor Abbott leaves a wife and five children. He had three sons and three daughters, Prentice W., of Medford, Mass.; Mrs. Marion Onion, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Miss May D., deceased, who was with her father in Pasadena, caring for him when she herself was taken; Carroll B., of San Francisco; Allen C., of Seattle; and Mrs. Helen Messner of Rockford, Ill. He leaves parishioners who are now scattered in many places, and students who are all over the world. They will all rise and call him blessed.

A memorial service was held at the Northern Baptist Theological seminary on Wednesday, Feb. 24. The burial took place in Medford, Mass., on Feb. 25.

Samuel H. Meyers

BY W. P. LOVETT

Detroit Baptists, particularly Woodward Avenue church, suffered a tragic loss in the unexpected death of Samuel H. Meyers, for more than seven years assistant pastor of Woodward Avenue church. As the great Woodward Avenue institution is at the heart of Detroit filling with wonderful success a place of continued usefulness, so Mr. Meyers was at the heart of this great church, always eager and efficient in assisting the pastor, Dr. John W. Hoag, the officers, and all of the members, particularly the young people, in initiating and promoting a great array of original projects whose success has spelled spiritual victory.

Mr. Meyers who was fifty-eight years old, graduated from Ohio Northern University, and spent a time in business at Columbus, Ohio and Chicago. Coming to Detroit in 1912, he served first Westminster Presbyterian, and later Woodward Avenue Presbyterian churches, as educational director and assistant pastor. His denominational connection has always been Presbyterian, but Baptists have never been conscious of it except as an asset to fraternal activities.

It is doubtful if any great metropolitan church in any city has enjoyed a more fruitful ministry in the office of assistant pastor than that furnished by Mr. Meyers' record. He and Doctor Hoag have worked together like twin brothers, each supplementing the other. In the Sunday school he originated ideas developing into organizations which remarkably enlarged the work both in size and value. Evangelism and education have gone on parallel lines. A great ministry for young married people and unattached youths and maidens has told mightily for good in the down-town district. The B. Y. P. U. of seven years ago has been multiplied by five in number of unions, and more than double in enthusiasm and real educational program.

As an administrator, Mr. Meyers has been a master of assemblies, fitting into every possible situation in the interests of harmony and progress. He was adept in directing congregational singing in a way which contributed much to the great Sunday evening evangelistic service of Woodward Avenue church. In his relations with all other religious organizations in the entire community and state, Mr. Meyers was a powerful, though modest, leader. He was one of the organizers of the new Lincoln International club.

The unfortunate situation in which Woodward Avenue church finds itself began with an injury suffered by Doctor Hoag through a fall on the ice; he was compelled to submit to hospital treatment followed by a southern trip which promises full restoration of vigor. In his absence, the church secretary, Miss MacKinnon, was taken seriously ill and was not yet recovered. These conditions greatly increased Mr. Meyers' responsibilities, and he literally burned himself up. Three weeks before his death, he collapsed after a brief noon-day talk before the Lincoln International club. He was taken home and never recovered.

An impressive memorial service in the church was conducted by Supt. H. C. Gleiss, Dr. M. C. Pearson, secretary of the Detroit Council of Churches, Dr. Mark F. Sanborn, pastor of the First Baptist church, and Rev. W. B. Gantz, representing the Presbyterian denomination. Interment was in his home town, Stoutsville, Ohio. The sympathy of churchmen throughout Detroit is extended to the bereaved family and to Woodward Avenue church.

Maine Notes

By E. C. WHITEMORE

Ten additions to the church in Farmington, four by baptism, encourage Pastor Wallace S. Boardman and his co-workers. This addition will mean new strength for the church. Seventy at the young people's service, 275 in morning congregation, and 300 in the evening indicate that the work is going forward. Financial support of church and worldwide work is significant. The young people will cooperate in the observance of self-denial month.

At cottage prayer meetings in Passamaquoddy and Enfield, under the lead of Pastor C. L. Smith, eight young people have begun the Christian life. These churches also will share in the self-denial month for world missions. The size of a church does not always indicate its significance.

The missionary education conferences conducted by Rev. Floyd L. Carr and Missionary M. L. Streeter have been held in Portland, Brewer, Waterville, and Livermore Falls. Methods for the development of a missionary church have been well presented and the actual service that the gospel is rendering in mission fields has been brought home. The new organization for boys, "The Royal Ambassadors," of which Rev. H. A. Welch of Brewer is high counsellor for Maine, was attractively explained. The conference helped the churches to do their duty all the time, instead of making spasmodic campaign efforts to do it occasionally.

Cortland, N. Y., Association

By G. A. FAIRBANK

We hear good news concerning the Marathon church since the coming of Rev. Russell Moore about seven months ago. He came directly from the Louisville seminary from which institution he graduated last year. The church has recently received eleven persons, five by letter and six by baptism. Early in the year the church had a week of personal evangelism with several conversions reported and an increased interest on the part of all. Pastor Cutton and some of the people of the First church of Cortland assisted in starting this lay evangelistic campaign. This was followed by a series of evangelistic meetings conducted by Evangelist Weakland in which there were several more decisions for Christ and a general uplift of the spiritual tone of the church. The church is not asking aid from the state convention this year as it has done for several years. It had on Jan. 31 paid 87 per cent of its benevolence quota. Thus the church was ahead of what was due at that time. It stands second in the association in this regard. The Virgil church stands first having already paid its full quota. A woman seventy-eight years old has requested baptism but will wait until she can be baptized in the stream outdoors. There has been an addition to the personal family of the pastor. On Jan. 28, a son, Robert Arthur Moore, came to bring joy to the hearts of father and mother.

Pastor and Mrs. Cutton of the First church, Cortland, had a son born shortly before Christmas. In honor of this the church presented Mr. and Mrs. Cutton with an even $100 at Christmas.

Since the coming of W. T. Barnes to the Summer Hill church as pastor that church has also decided not to ask help from the state convention. A strong band of tithers has been organized. This is an open country church and has a devoted membership willing to go on for greater and larger conquests of self and others for Christ and his cause.

Pastor Fairbank completed five years of service in the McGrawville church the end of February. There are three other pastors in the association at present who were there five years ago. Rev. F. W. Allen who is in his seventh year with the Memorial church of Cortland; Rev. E. E. Knapp, who has been with the Etna church for nine years and Brother A. R. Tice who has served the church at Solon for seven years. These latter two give only part time to their churches. Mr. Tice who was injured by his automobile running over him last fall is able to be out at present.

Rev. C. J. Knepek has resigned the pastorate at Pitcher, having accepted the call of the Duaneburg-Florida church at Delanson. He entered upon the new pastorate March 1. The church at Pitcher asked Pastor Knepek to reconsider his resignation but he concluded not to after having resigned. He has been with the Pitcher church for about two years. There have been several additions to the church, some by baptism and others by letter during his pastorate. Some improvements have been made to the church property. We regret his leaving the association but we rejoice in the larger opportunity which will be his in his new field.

Pacific Coast Letter

By LEONARD W. RILEY
The Spirit of Evangelism

The spirit of evangelism seems to be abroad in the land. Our pastors are quite generally following the advice of Paul to Timothy, "Do the work of an evangelist." While some professional evangelists are in the field, the greater part of these meetings are conducted by pastors. The results of such cooperation are likely to prove more satisfactory than those following in the wake of the average professional campaign. The results in the long run of years are still more likely to prove substantial and permanent if the pastor finds himself able to do his own preaching.

Trawin at Eugene

During the month of January Dr. Charles L. Trawin of Eugene, Ore., preached every evening and twice on Sunday. For the first ten days his subject was "The Holy Spirit." During the last ten days he preached a series of twelve sermons on the book of Revelation. The large audiences were attracted by no other than the power of a clear presentation of the vital truth of the gospel. The results are a marked increase in the spiritual life of the church and a substantial ingathering of young people and of men and women of mature age. Mr. Fred G. Fisher of Chicago was song leader and added much to the success of the meetings, which were followed by three sermons from Evangelist Harry Anderson.

Boynton at Seattle

The First church of Seattle, Dr. Ambrose M. Bailey, pastor, was greatly blessed by the coming of Dr. M. P. Boynton and his wife from the Woodlawn church of Chicago, where Doctor Boynton has labored for the past twenty ty-nine years. Doctor Boynton delivered thirty messages during his fifteen days' stay, speaking not only for the church but for other organizations in the church and the city. Already ninety-one applications for membership have been made, while the hand of fellowship has been given to thirty and twenty-three others have been baptized. Doctor Bailey writes that, "Boynton proved a genuine find for us and brought us a great blessing."

West at McMinnville

The First church, McMinnville, Ore., Dr. M. E. Bollin, acting pastor, has seldom enjoyed any series of meetings as much as those conducted by Dr. James S. West, of the First church, San Francisco. These meetings closed on Sunday, Feb. 21. The number responding to his invitations, while not large, has been gratifying. The fruits have not yet been gathered. Doctor West has spoken frequently to the faculty and students at the chapel services in a most acceptable way. He has preached the truth as revealed in the word concerning God, sin, and salvation through faith in Jesus Christ. It has been most refreshing to hear a man preach these truths in that loving, persuasive manner in which such message surely is designed to be proclaimed. Doctor West evidently has neither time nor disposition to denounce those extremists who are beclouding the real issues of revealed religion in the minds of so many people today. May God bless him and give us many more like him.

Smith at Tacoma

Dr. John Bunyan Smith of San Diego, Calif., spent Feb. 14-28 with the First church of Tacoma, Dr. C. Oscar Johnson, pastor. Good reports are coming from this meeting.

While this effort was going on the other Baptist churches of Tacoma were similarly engaged, Dr. J. M. Currie preaching at the Sixth Avenue church, Dr. E. H. Hicks, at Bethesda, Rev. A. McIntosh at Fern Hill, Rev. Eric Lundholm at the First Swedish, Rev. W. A. Litphard at the First German, Rev. E. K. Williams at Bethlehem, Rev. C. H. Graves at Borean, and Rev. J. C. Kellogg, at "K" Street.

Good Work Elsewhere

On Feb. 7, Rev. John M. Currie closed a meeting with the Fremont church, Seattle, Rev. Elbert H. Hicks, pastor, which resulted in ninety-five professions of faith. Already forty-nine have united with the church, thirty-one by baptism, with others to follow.

A two-weeks meeting at Colfax, Wash., Rev. J. L. Perringer, pastor, was conducted by Rev. J. E. Naylor, director of evangelism for the East Washington and North Idaho Convention. There were thirty confessions of faith, ten of which were baptized on Feb. 14. The singing was under the direction of Richard Dierks.

Convention Pastor Rev. J. E. Kanarr is rejoicing over a meeting held at Emmett, Idaho. Already he has baptized twenty, with others to follow. He was assisted by the Doctor Hubbard evangelistic party. Mr. Kanarr has organized this church in such a way that specific tasks have been assigned to more than fifty of the members. In this way the responsibility is divided and the field systematically cultivated for all departments of church activity.

University Baptist Church

The right man with the right kind of equipment is able to meet a magnificent opportunity in any one of our great educational centers. Not many of our university students today are attracted by organizations with poor leadership and poorer equipment. The Baptists of the Northwest ought, therefore, to rejoice over the achievement of Rev. Frank B. Matthews in placing the first unit of a splendid equipment along side the University of Washington. The educational plant recently dedicated and the ground on which it stands, have cost approximately $105,000. The architecture is Gothic and beautiful. The construction is solid brick and concrete with stone trimmings. In arrangement the departmental idea of Bible school work prevails. There are eight separate departments, each with its own assembly room and separate class rooms. There are forty-seven rooms and the plant has ample space to care for a school of 800. Plans are already drawn for an auditorium which will cost an additional $90,000. Meanwhile services are held in the social hall of the educational unit. The building is equipped with all the modern conveniences for effective church and educational work. Let us hope that the building of the auditorium itself may not be too long delayed.

Death of C. R. Lamar

Rev. Charles Robert Lamar passed away at Springfield, Ore., at the age of seventy-three years. He was born at Andersonville, Tenn., and spent the earlier years of his life in Tennessee. Twenty-five years ago he came to the Pacific coast and gave fifteen years of faithful service to various churches in Oregon, Washington and California. He was ordained by the Grubville church of Grubville, Mo., in 1883. For the past ten years he has lived in retirement at Springfield.

Other Items

On Sunday, Feb. 14, Rev. F. R. Leach at Bremerton, Wash., baptized six, which brings the additions up to sixty-two since Mr. Leach's pastorate there began last June. Doctor Leach has been elected to fill a vacancy on the board of managers of the West Washington Convention.

Rev. V. W. Dyer of Rangoon, Burma visited Bellingham, Ferndale, Lynden Laurel and Sedro-Woolley churches during the week of Jan. 24-29. He has also spoken recently to the faculty and students of Linfield college and at other points in the Northwest. His messages are unusually effective and should be heard by as many of our churches as possible.

At the close of the mid-week meeting more than seventy-five members of our church at Lynden, Wash., surprised their pastor, Rev. T. M. Marshall, with reception and program, in which the heartily expressed their appreciation of him and his work. Such events are always helpful and should occur much more frequently than they do.

Rev. W. E. Monebeck this month is preaching a series of four sermons on the general topic, "How They Differ"—"How the Bible Differs from all Other Books," "How Christ Differs from All Other Religious Leaders," "How the Christian Differs from All Other People," "How the Church Differs from All Other Organizations."

Dr. and Mrs. George E. Whitman, of China, are supported by the First church of Tacoma. Recently certain members of this church made Mr. Whitman happy by the presentation of a new Remington portable typewriter.

The American Baptist Publication Society has just published a tract on "The Saving Experience," by Dr. T. J. Viller, pastor of the First church of Portland, Ore., which is well worth the reading and may be secured from our publication society.

The budget for 1926 adopted by the First church of Seattle, calls for a total of $50,870 of which sum $22,000 is for missions.

The Baptists in Esthonia

By ADAM PODIN

To describe the situation of the Baptists in Esthonia it would help me to take clear by looking back in the not far away past when they were looked upon as the most feared and despised people. No wonder that from the highest officials, church pulpits down to the lowest policemen all condemned them as such, and in many cases they were outlawed and found no protection. This I have been overcome by persistent work, Christian life, prayer and preaching the old apostolic gospel. Great change has been wrought and Baptists have gained full confidence by the people everywhere.

Esthonian Baptists are all loyal to God and his word, which is no more than right. Where there is a right witness in a Baptist chapel the places are full and the blessing follows. Our situation is firm. We are respected and esteemed by all as trustworthy people, and to prove this I can say that prison doors, leper asylums, other government buildings are open, waiting for the gospel messenger. I think the time is not far ahead when the Lutheran and Methodist churches will be open without money and without price, people begging us to take possession of them, being tired of empty words, ready to listen to the message that leads to truth and life.

The past was like a cold winter, and the future could be compared with a fine summer. We are looking forward to a great harvest.

With the help of the English, American and Canadian Baptist boards we could educate our first group of preachers in our seminary who graduated this spring. They are working in many work places of Esthonia. It is a great delight for us as their parents to hear of their victories all along the line. With the help of those preachers we have drawn up this plan:

1. To work systematically through our Sunday schools to reach the child throughout the whole land, using various methods and helps, music choirs, Bible courses, illustrative pictures.

2. Our net has been cast to reach the young people in our university, the towns and the country, to lead them on the way to real enjoyment of life and satisfaction. As we have good fellowship with believers from other evangelical free churches, this helps us greatly to reach our point.

3. The Scripture distribution association, burdened with a heavy load of books, still peddles on faithfully and sends patient and silent messengers into thousands of houses and families from which we expect much fruit.

4. Our organized woman's society with its own officials at the head has tended to do its duty during the winter to bring the gospel to its own sex and kin.

5. The new students in the seminary give me much hope of their calling.

Every week-end they are out preaching in different parts of the country, spreading the sound doctrine of the Baptists, and are welcomed by the people.

To sum up the various branches of our mission work, you can clearly see the deep longing and prayer in our hearts:

God speed the day when those of every nation

"Glory to God," triumphantly shall sing,

Ransomed, redeemed, rejoicing in salvation,

Shout, "Hallelujah, for the Lord is King!"

Capitalizing Baptist Genius

ALLYN K. FOSTER

He asked a distinguished college president the other day—a man with whom he had been in college many years ago: "Will you give me a job in your college?"

"No," was the crisp answer.

"Haven't I got brains?"

"Yes," he replied.

"Then do you mean to tell me that you cannot place the maturest products of my life at the disposal of your students? I am now at top speed, my health is good, you admit that my brains are still functioning. I have amassed considerable experience and have carried with a fair degree of success many responsibilities. In short, I know to some extent life, thought, religion and I want to be of use to a younger generation."

The answer this college president made was perfectly natural. "We have to think about pensions. In the natural course of events you probably would not be going strong for longer than ten years."

This is not written to criticize the policy of modern colleges—much as it may be deserving of criticism—but to raise a larger question as to what a great denomination like the Baptists does with its maturest men and women. When they reach the sixties and particularly when they reach the end of the sixties, must we necessarily put them down in alcohol (denatured, of course)? Ought there not to be a Court of Honor composed of these experienced exponents of Christianity? They are still active, vigorous in their thinking, and radiant with light. What happens to them for the most part? They drop out, that is all. In this matter we are very unthrifty. Several examples will illustrate. Cannot this great denomination capitalize the genius these names connote?

Last spring George E. Horr resigned from Newton. There is no greater intellect among Baptists, in my judgment, than is Doctor Horr. Can we use him? Cornelius Woelfkin soon closes his pastoral experience of forty years. Are there no wires along which the radiant energy of a life like that can be scattered? William C. Bitting has finished a magnificent term of militant service for the cause of Christ, and still keeps his golf score at par, with body and mind as vigorous as ever. Shall we count such a live wire a "has been" or can we use such men as he? And what

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count on You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, 2320 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

"Tonight we will have a few greetings from friends and then a couple of messages concerning our prison work.

"Chas. F. Leek, Southern Baptist Seminary, Louisville, Ky., says, 'Deep appreciation for the splendid cooperation you have given the seminary.'

"Joseph C. Hazen, pastor, North Orange, N. J.: 'Congratulations on the World Survey Number. In my humble judgment it is the best you have issued.'

"Paul E. Alden, Home Department, Foreign Mission Society: 'May I express our hearty appreciation for your assistance throughout the entire effort of the Lone Star Campaign. Your cooperation has contributed largely to its success.'

"Mitchell Bronk, Editor Adult Division, Publication Society: 'I have been noticing a steady improvement in the paper. Especially during the past two months have your issues been exceptionally excellent. I think you are showing great good sense and fine judgment in your treatment of the denominational problems.'

"E. M. Stigers, Director of Educational and Religious Department, California State Prison, San Quentin: 'I have been reading THE BAPTIST from its first issue and have been delighted with the improvement that I think has taken place from year to year. At the present time I think you are giving us a paper which would be difficult to surpass.'

"Now listen to this bit of news fresh from the field: 'On Sunday evening, Pastor Herbert C. Carnell of the Bay View church in Milwaukee, gave a monologue on "Jack's First Sunday in Prison," to a full house. The prisoner appeared in uniform. The lesson to children and parents was very impressive. In the state prison at Waupun there are about twenty prisoners that give their faith as Baptist. The Bay View church has seen here an opportunity to do some good and has secured permission to send to that institution ten copies of THE BAPTIST to be placed in the general prison library for the use of all the prisoners. "Cast thy bread upon the waters; and it shall return unto thee after many days." This church hopes by this ministry of friendship to keep in touch with these prisoners during their sojourn there and thus help them find their place again in the life of the denomination when they are released.'

"Tonight we want to introduce one of the young men from a prison in an eastern state. Twenty-five young men in that institution are receiving THE BAPTIST weekly. He writes, 'I do not know how to thank you for your kind thought in helping these boys who have fallen by the wayside. In behalf of the fellows who have already received your valuable paper, I want to assure you that they look forward from one week end to another; and, believe me, when by some delay they do not receive it on time, they quickly report to the chaplain's office in order to find out about the delay. So you may feel assured that you are not forgotten by the boys. Enclosed you will find a list of new names of other Baptist boys and in behalf of them I wish to thank you in advance for the subscriptions for which they are now eagerly waiting. May God bless you in your daily works and may this year be indeed a happy one for you and yours.'

"Recently a minister's wife gave us ten dollars to send the paper to the boys in prison and these were her words: 'This is given in answer to prayer. This money was laid aside a dime at a time for some special use that God should direct. WCOY was his voice.'

"The office boy will now report a conversation heard recently in his alley. The mother yelled out the window: 'Willie, stop making your little brother cry.' Willie replied: 'I ain't a-makin' him cry. He's dug a hole and now he's bawling cause he can't take it into the house.' The office boys says if a lot of grown-ups would quit bawling around about this doughnut stuff and go to work getting subscriptions for THE BAPTIST they would be happier and do a lot more good. What's the use bawling about doughnut holes, anyhow? WCOY now signs off. Put the doughnut stuff into cold storage."

has become of John Humpstone? Have we forgotten his masterly ministry in Brooklyn? Can Baptists show a finer culture, a mellower spirit or greater pulpit power? Of course, each of these men has his continued ministry, but they belong to us all and they ought to be used throughout the length and breadth of the country during their ripest years.

Let our board of education send these men to the colleges over the country, or send them to the churches on a ministry of reconciliation and friendship. What a blessing it would be to some small town church to have any one of these men for a few weeks. Let the Publication Society make them write a few little books that will hand on the tradition and power of their ministries. Of course these are only a few of the men; many more men and women will be thought of at once.

Are we capitalizing our Baptist genius?

Obituary

J. W. Case died, Feb. 5, at Luverne, Minn., after an illness of three weeks. He was born 1859, and reared at Waverly, Ia., marrying Miss Lucy A. Lorenz at Rockford, Ia. He was educated at Iowa state teachers college and Colgate seminary. He engaged actively in the ministry thirty-five years, holding pastorates at Detroit, Mich., Erie, Pa.; Rochester, N. Y.; Cleveland, O., and spending the last three years at Le Mars, Ia., and Luverne, Minn. The children are Percival H. of Syracuse, N. Y.; Florence E. of Erie, Pa., and J. Harold, who is attending the Iowa state college.

With the Board of Missionary Cooperation

What we hope and believe is that no more than a temporary setback in missionary giving on the part of Northern Baptist churches occurred in December. During that month an amount equalling only 88.5 per cent of last December's receipts was sent in from the state convention offices. Previous to this the month-by-month percentage of receipts from the states had been steadily climbing above last year's record, ever since July when it first crossed the 100 per cent mark. In November, 1925, the state offices sent in an amount equal to 121.9 per cent of the money collected in November, 1924, thus making the total seven months' receipts for this year equal 106.5 per cent of receipts for the same period last year. Unfortunately December did not continue the upward trend, and so the eight months' percentage was lowered again to 103.3 per cent of last year's record.

A number of factors lead us to believe that this decline is only a temporary one caused by local conditions at this particular season of the year, and that we shall soon swing back into the stride which we attained in July. Chief of the reasons for this hopeful attitude is the fine spirit prevailing since the conference in Chicago. With so much understanding of our united program, and so much willingness to cooperate abroad in the denomination, there seems to be little doubt that we shall raise the relatively small budget for this year. But it is as well not to let over-confidence prevent us from keeping a strict watch on our actual week-by-week and month-by-month achievement, lest through procrastination we fail to accomplish what we assuredly have within our power.

At the beginning of the calendar year there remained to be raised 56.2 per cent of the fiscal year's budget; nearly 60 per cent of the money to be collected in a little over 30 per cent of the year. It is easy to see that redoubled effort will be required of all of us so that we may close the year with honor. It need not be the desperate strain of some former years, but a steady, purposeful endeavor bringing us each week substantially nearer our goal.

As a means of giving recognition to he states improving on their last year's record, there has been instituted this year a Northern Convention Honor Roll. It shows every month the list of states which have sent in more money from the beginning of the fiscal year than they did for the corresponding period last year. The nineteen states named hereafter are on the most recent list, covering the eight months' period from May 1 to Dec. 31, 1925. They are arranged here in the order of the percentage by which they surpassed their last year's record: East Washington, South Dakota, Idaho, Nevada, Utah, Montana, District of Columbia, Arizona, Southern California, Kansas, New Jersey, New York, Vermont, West Washington, Colorado, Connecticut, West Virginia, Michigan, and Rhode Island. Ohio and Delaware should be given honorable mention for coming within $200 of being on the honor roll.

Here, There and Everywhere

PASTOR M. P. BOYNTON, of Woodlawn church, Chicago, was greeted by an unusually large audience Feb. 21, following his return from Seattle, where he assisted R. A. M. Bailey in evangelistic meetings.

A CHAPTER OF ROYAL AMBASSADORS has been organized in the First church, Caldwell, Idaho, with Kenneth Orcutt, Marjorie Skidmore and Raymond Skidmore as chief officers.

TRINITY BIBLE SCHOOL of Omaha, Nebr., has successfully completed an unusual course in teacher training. There are four high schools and a normal training department in the public school system of the city of Omaha. The heads of these schools, without exception, are Christians, and although each one is of a different denomination, they all accepted a place on the faculty of the Baptist teacher training school.

SINCE REV. C. J. BENDER left the church at Watertown, Wis., last September, Rev. E. H. Otto has been serving the church until the new pastor comes. The Rev. G. Wetter of Alpena, Mich., has accepted a call to the church and expects to be on the field about April 1. The work in all its departments is in good condition.

OFFICERS CHOSEN FOR THE coming term of the Baptist ministers' conference of New York City and vicinity are C. H. Kinnels of Bayonne, N. J., president; Walter G. Simon, 260 East 176th street, New York City, vice-president; Frank S. Guyer, Jersey City, secretary and treasurer. On March 1 the conference gave a complimentary luncheon at Park Avenue church in honor of Dr. Hervey Wood, the oldest member of the conference.

DEACON BENJAMIN F. BARGE, of the First church, Yakima, Wash., died Feb. 10, at the age of ninety-two. He was born in New England, educated at Yale. He lived much of his active life to education-work in the South, Middle West and Northwest, completing his career as an educator with the establishment of the normal school at Ellensburg, Wash., and serving as its president for three years. Later, prominent in business in the Yakima valley, he took a leading part in the development of the First church of Yakima.

TANTON PARK CHURCH, Detroit, holds the Lord's Supper monthly alternating morning and evening. The evening service with its "upper room" atmosphere is noteworthy for the number of participants.

A RECEPTION FOR 150 NEW members received into the First church, Anderson, Ind., in 1925, was held Jan. 26. A program of music preceded the reception. The address of the evening was delivered by Rev. W. G. Everson, pastor of the First church, Muncie. Rev. S. W. Powell, pastor of the church, was prevented from being present by illness but sent a greeting to the new members. Mr. Powell was confined to his home for two weeks but was able to be in his pulpit again Feb. 7.

I Offer You $15 a Day

Make $15 a day selling this wonderful new household article that has taken the country by storm. It is CED-O-BAG a moth-proof, damp-proof, dust-proof, germ-proof storage bag for clothes, blankets and furs. It is the greatest, fastest selling household article that has come on the market for years. Every housewife wants one, buys on sight.

CED-O-BAGS are made from rubberized fabric which has been chemically treated. They are patented. Nothing else like them. Instead of a small easily torn paper bag or a clumsy, expensive cedar chest, a CED-O-BAG provides adequate space for two to four garments. And yet, with all of these distinctive advantages CED-O-BAGS are priced for quick sale.

Ced-O-Bags Offer Big Profits

There is a chance for you to clean up a lot of money in your town at once just by taking orders for CED-O-BAGS. L. H. Green went out and made a clear profit of $12 in one afternoon. J. V. Davis took five orders in one evening and was $5 richer. Edith Phillips made $53 in one week's spare time (evenings.) You can do as well, or better.

No Experience Needed

You don't need experience or training. Every home in your town is a live prospect. All you have to do is show the housewife a CED-O-BAG and take her order. We deliver and collect. You get your profits at once, and move on to the next house and take another order. Everyone buys. Geo. Jones took 22 orders in two days spare time and had a clear profit of $22. 21 agents report an average profit of $3 an hour.

How Much Money Do You Want?

Would you like to make an extra $100 or $200 a month, in your spare time? Would you like to gather a lump sum of $500 or $600 in a couple of months? If you would, here is your chance. Mail me the coupon and I will tell you all about this money-making proposition. I will show you how you can make $15 a day or more in this easy, pleasant, engaging work. I will show you the way to quick profits—big profits. Mail the coupon now.

Come in As You Are

BY HARRY S. MYERS

After one crosses to the west of the Mississippi in his transcontinental auto tour, he discovers that he has entered a different world. Tourist camps are greatly improved, and much more numerous. Restaurants and hotels are much more conscious of his presence and respond more carefully to his existence. It is common to be greeted by a big road sign that reads:

Atlantic Hotel,
Dumfreesville
Special rates to tourists
Come in as you are

More than once we were suspicious of the "special rates" and felt that they were higher not lower! The waiter met us at the dining-room door with a pleasant, "This way please. Would you like to wash?" Any casual observer knew that we needed to wash!

The welcome was real. In one place at dusk we entered the College inn on Main street. It was a high-grade restaurant and just what seemed to us able to supply that awful hunger after 291 miles since breakfast. We were seated in the center, right in the middle, dirt, holes and all. We were conscious of raising questions in the minds of other guests, but the management was as courteous and kind as if we had been wearing the clothes we wore today at the other hotel.

Come in as you are, is winning many friends to the great kindness of the West. Only once did we see a church with a similar invitation. Alas many churches were not on the main thoroughfare. Perhaps they reserve such signs for Sunday. In many tourist camps there were evidences of invitations to churches. There was a desire to reach the wandering autoist, but the "Come in as you are" invitation seemed more doubtful to the churches than that to the places of business.

We want more "Come-in-as-you-are" churches.

EMERSON AVENUE CHURCH, Indianapolis received seventeen new members during January.

NORTH SHORE CHURCH, Chicago, recently received twenty-three new members.

PASTOR EDWARD DERBYSHIRE of Valle church, near Marietta, O., has begun the issuance of a chatty parish paper.

NORTH SHORE CHURCH, Chicago, received forty-two additions Feb. 14, making seventy-eight in two months. Crowds are largest when Pastor Virgin announces doctrinal sermons.

REV. ROBERT A. ASHWORTH of Yonkers has given to President Yugoro Chiba of the Baptist Theological Seminary of Tokio, at his request, the translation right for Japan of his book entitled "Being a Christian," and a Japanese edition will be issued in the near future.

HAYDEN HEIGHTS CHURCH dedicated a new building Jan. 31. The house is convenient for church work and cost $10,000.

mentary way I had been compelled to preach to them. But the flash of intelligence by the campfire the night before explained it all. The moment the word "Saviour" dawned upon his darkened vision, all the scattered fragments of truth that had been floating about in his darkened mind fell into line, and became one glorious revelation.

I had spoken it from childhood; he preached it for years; but somehow, became luminous with meaning the night. Over against the frightful night that settled down around me, the flashed a light unutterable, and a scarred hand traced in letters of glory "M-U-T-H-A-N-I-A."

sting three weeks. Dr. James W.ramer of Denver, Colo., was the teacher, and Mr. Frank E. McCravy of Laurens, S. C., led the song services. The visible results were 135 additions to the church. Dr. James Whitcomb Brougher came two days after the special meetings closed. He had a great crowd to hear him, and his address stirred the people deeply. The special meetings carried the membership beyond 1000. Average attendance of the Bible school was 1037 for the year 1925.

AT SHARPSBURG, PA., Rev. B. A. Wilson, pastor, over $800 has been raised toward debts, and twenty-two new members received into the church, nineteen coming by baptism.

BUIE'S CREEK ACADEMY at Winston-Salem, N. C., has broken ground for a new $50,000 building. It is to be known as "O. Rich memorial," built from funds left by Mr. Rich for Buie's Creek academy. The building is to be used for auditorium and a new administration building, and is to be ready by Sept. 1. Enrollment for the year is 725, representing seven states, seventy-seven counties and Cuba.

WOMEN OF WILMETTE, ILL., church have formed a mothers' club.

FIRST CHURCH, Sharpsburg, Pa., has erected an electric cross at the entrance to the building and installed a new heater for the baptistry and kitchen.

JEFFERSON AVENUE CHURCH, Detroit, has the unique device of publishing the list of subscribers to both the local and benevolent budgets who are paid up to date by number instead of name.

A HUNDRED AND THIRTY-EIGHT women and girls, the largest number ever present at such a function at First church, Port Allegany, Pa., sat down to a banquet, Feb. 3, to be served by thirty-two husbands, brothers and sons.

TOTAL INVESTMENTS of the old people's home at Maywood, Ill., amount to $287,-079.28.

SCHOOL OF MISSIONS at First church, Oshkosh, Wis., closed Feb. 10 with a debate by four men on a resolution that Christianity is growing stronger in the United States. Dr. Joseph Robbins spoke delightfully one evening.

JOHN POWELL LENOX, writer and lecturer died in Chicago, recently at the age of seventy-four. He was the oldest living member of the First Baptist church.

THE PULPIT of the First church, Oakland, Calif., was supplied Sunday, Feb. 14 by Drs. Frank W. Padelford and Melbourne P. Boynton.

AT FIRST CHURCH, Osage, Iowa, 145 were present at the regular church night supper, and 128 remained for classes.

PASTOR F. W. BENJAMIN held a series of meetings at the mission station of First church, Chadron, Neb., resulting in forty-five professions and thirty-two baptisms.

PARK STREET CHURCH, Pittsfield, N. H., notes an attendance of 125 at prayer meeting out of a membership of 260. Individual members have presented to the church a baptistry, new hymnals, a lantern, an electric sign and a cash gift of $1000. The church has granted to Pastor John A. Swetman a vacation to visit his old home in England.

RUTHERFORD, N. J., Baptist young people presented a special program, largely musical, Jan. 31, at the regular evening hour. The topics treated were unusually broad and vital. Participants were Messrs. John R. Thomas, Judson Jessup, Romer Hunt, William Davids, John Griffin, Charles Steck and Caldwell Dunham; Misses Dorothy Voll, Florence Taylor and Sue Berry, and Mrs. G. South.

THE PASTOR OF THE CHURCH at Burlington, Utah, presents to his people telling mimeographed essays on practical and vital religion.

PASTOR RUSSELL BROUGHER, granted a vacation in order to recuperate his health, will be absent from his pulpit for a few weeks.

Denison University For Men and Women

Nearly a century ago far-sighted men of faith laid the foundations of Denison. The outstanding purpose then was to furnish a thorough college course under distinctively Christian auspices. That purpose marks the character of this Christian college today.

Announcement was made at Carleton college, Northfield, Minn., on Feb. 15, by President Cowling, that its $2,300,000 campaign was successfully completed and all deficits made up. Rejoicing among Carleton's friends is universal, for this splendid institution is now in a position to minister more largely to the needs of the young people of the Northwest. Of the amount raised, $1,200,000 is for endowment and $1,100,000 for buildings, equipment and current expenses. While this does not satisfy all of Carleton's needs, it does mark the beginning of a new epoch in its history. To be the ideal college for a thousand students is the ambition of Carleton, and the plans for such an achievement were submitted to the general educational board of New York some time ago. That board, the Carnegie corporation and Mr. James Harkness of New York made gifts amounting to $700,000, and the remainder was raised by friends of the college, mainly in the Northwest.

The March or the April number of the Kansas Baptist will contain a write-up about Ottawa University, showing campus scenes and the buildings. Only the main facts in the history and life of the university will be included in the write-up.

The attendance in Ottawa university in the first semester of the present college year is 419 in the college and 115 in the conservatory. The number of registered students to date, counting each individual only once, in both the college and conservatory is 552.

PARISH PAPERS

Any church, school or class can publish a parish paper by using our co-operative plan. A parish paper fills empty pews, keeps community informed, speeds up church work. Free Samples and Particulars. Our plan provides a paper for your church without cost to you. The National Religious Press Grand Rapids, Mich.

WALTER L. DEFRIES, pastor of the Christian church at Ocean View, Del., was examined and recognized as a Baptist minister at Dover, Del., Feb. 4, upon the recommendation of a council. Rev. H. C. Broughton, president, and Rev. Samuel C. Welsh, secretary of the Delaware State Convention, were respectively moderator and clerk of the council. Other ministers participating were George D. Allison and A. F. Williamson.

PASTOR RALPH E. KNUDSEN's church at Glasgow, Mont., has fifty-five members, more than half of them non-resident. This little band had an average attendance at Sunday school of 100 during the last quarter. The school is well graded under the superintendency of Mr. Jesse Eugene. The pastor's wife has organized a junior union with fifty members.

REV. LESTER CLEE is teaching a class of 800 men at Rutherford church, N. J.

AT THE COMMUNION SERVICE in January, Pastor Leroy E. Viets received forty-nine new members at Boone, Iowa.

REV. C. H. WILLIAMS, son of Sir George Williams who founded the Y. M. C. A., died recently in England after serving one church thirty-five years.

SECOND CHURCH, Chicago, parish paper contains a halftone of Doctor Byrne, who has been a member of the church fifty years, and has been one of the most helpful leaders and givers among the Baptists of the city. He is now eighty-five years old and still active.

FIRST CHURCH, Hastings, Neb., Dr. Alfred S. Cross, pastor, will dedicate a new church building on Sunday Mar. 7. The evening service will be broadcast over KFKX. Dr. F. H. Divine of Brooklyn, N. Y., will speak morning and evening. Baptists who cannot attend their own services may "listen in."

IT IS ESTIMATED that 5000 people pass through the church portion of the Baptist-Temple, Rochester, N. Y., every week, served by a staff of ten paid workers and hundreds of volunteers. The staff has been increased to add a business manager, a neighborhood worker, a director of religious education and a steward. There are banquets and suppers served every night in the week and a cafeteria operates from 12 to 2 o'clock each noon; a free organ recital every Friday noon, neighborhood school for children every Saturday afternoon, boys' and girls' clubs meeting every night in the week, and a well baby clinic in operation. The Sunday services continue to report standing room only, and the loose offering for this year are estimated at $15,000. Four floors of the fourteen-story structure are set aside for church purposes and are in constant use. Dr. Conrad Moehlman of the Rochester Theological Seminary is conducting a class from six to seven o'clock Sunday evenings on the subject "Is Religion Disappearing?" Dr. Orlo J. Price, secretary of the Rochester Federation of Churches is conducting a "Who-So-Ever" class Sunday afternoons at four o'clock on the subject "What's in the Bible?" This latter class is for firemen, policemen, domestics and other folks who cannot come to the regular church services. The only mistake recognized in the building of the gigantic temple is that the structure is not large enough for the many uses to which it is put. The board of trustees operates the temple building, led by Mr. Arthur Castle, chairman. The annual budget about to be presented to the church represents the huge sum of $139,000, which includes current expense, benevolence and building fund. Rev. Clinton Wunder is completing his fifth year as pastor of the church. This is the ninety-second year of the history of the church "in the heart of Rochester."

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for Mar. 14

THE LAST WORDS OF JESUS WITH HIS DISCIPLES.

Lesson Text: John 14:17. Golden Text: John 14:6. "I Go"

The personal pronoun is pronounced in the last words of Jesus to his disciples as reported by John. One has only to read these chapters casually to appreciate this fact. It is as though Jesus had been silent so long about things which lay closest to his heart that now as the hour of his departure approaches he breaks over his reserve and pours out a flood of personal experience and testimony. He had intimated before that he would suffer an early death at the hands of violent men but now he tells them plainly in the monosyllabic words, "I go." This startled them and threw them into confusion, and it was this confusion that called out the comforting words which open with chapter fourteen and close with chapter seventeen.

"I Am"

The disciples must have been familiar with this primitive verb on the lips of Jesus. It runs all through the Gospel of John and is not a stranger to the other Gospels. It was in this way that Jesus concreted what the Jewish philosophers had made abstract and unintelligible to the rank and file of the people. Thus the bread of life turned out to be Jesus himself, and in the assimilation of the Spirit of Jesus by men there came to know eternal life by actual experience. Thomas was in doubt about the way to the place of many mansions until he discovered that Jesus and the life that Jesus lived was the way. So runs on. "I am the door," "I am the good shepherd," "I am the true vine." If the question is one of entrance, protection or sustenance in the divine life it is answered concretely in Jesus.

"I Send"

Jesus went away in the flesh but made arrangements to send the eternal Spirit of truth to take his place and make his eternal "I am" operative among men amidst all the changes that they might see. One might sometimes think from the way certain people cling to the patterns and practices of the past that the "I go" of Jesus had left a vacuum that has never been filled. But the "I go" of Jesus was immediately followed by the "I will send" the Spirit of truth "that he may be with you forever." Those we who live in the twentieth century may enjoy the presence and guidance and power of the living Spirit of eternal truth just as the first disciples and the members of the early church enjoyed the presence and guidance and power. Is it an inspiring thought to discover that Jesus is still with us in the person of his Spirit and that we do not need an infallible church to mediate his ministry to us? All we need is the energy and steadfast will bent on discovering the will of God in order that we may bring ourselves into full harmony with it.

New Books

Inescapable Christ, by Walter Russell Bowie. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.
 Many a preacher would be lifted out of the ruts and given a new spirit and a new message from reading this interpretation of Christ by a practical pastor, a cultured scholar and a virile thinker. These men have said so well what Christianity means in this time of transition. Modernist and traditionalist alike may reflect, ponder and learn. The sentences are sermons; the reader wants to go out and proclaim their message. It is one of the prophetic books of modern Christianity heralding the coming revival that will build around the full spiritual, ethical, scientific and social gospel of the Kingdom of God.

—U. M. MCGUIRE.

Measure of a Man, by Arthur W. Spalding. New York: Doran. $1.50.
 Under a number of interesting headings Mr. Spalding discusses the growth of youth to manhood, indicating the essentials of real character. He discusses the problems boys have to meet, answers the questions they so often hesitate to ask and helps to give them a broad, sane outlook. The understanding and friendly nature of these lectures made them so popular where they were first given that the boys requested their publication. This is a splendid book for parents and for all who engage in any kind of activity with boys.

—C. R. OSBORN.

Sermons and Christmas Sermons, by Representative Preachers. Edited by F. J. Orth. New York: Doran. $1.50.
 Many ministers find that special day sermons are after all the most difficult to prepare. For a little inspiration and variety of treatment this volume might be of service in preparing sermons of this kind, although one wishes that there were a greater number of usable illustrations. The sermons come from illustrious preachers in English pulpits. Although of different shades of opinion and there is a common emphasis upon the incarnation of God in Jesus Christ and the great place which that truth should have in all our preaching today. Each sermon contains much devotional thought that should make it helpful to the layman as well as the minister.

—C. R. OSBORN.

Canadian Preaching. Eighteen Canadian sermons edited by W. Harold Young, A. B. D., Minister of St. Paul's United Church, Toronto. Introduction and biographical sketches by the editor. New York: Doran. $2.00 net.
 One instantly gets a sense of motion as he begins this book with Dr. Richard Derr's sermon on "Faith". No content religion in this volume. In every sermon the reader is challenged by the bringing of old truths into new word and new settings. The Christianity of an ancient static apocalyptic world functions powerfully in a modern world of science and progress. We feel these ministers are worthy successors of English and Scottish divines, and easily are peers of great preachers in the United States. These Canadian prophets have nothing to defend but righteousness. Indeed one is made to feel their spirit of daring as we read of their experiments in changing historic creeds and denominational forms. It is their loyalty to the spirit and message of the Book that leads them to demand new prophetic emphasis and organic change. These men live and work above the present doctrinal strife.

—W. F. HUXFORD.

William Robertson Nicoll, Life and Letters, by T. H. Darlow. New York: Doran. $3.50.

A human and colorful picture of an extraordinary personality. Tracing the career of the founder and long-time editor of the British Weekly from the hills in the highlands of Scotland, where his life rose in 1851, to his home in Hampstead, a suburb of London, where he passed away in 1923, the biographer holds the attention of his readers with increasing interest through the 450 pages of the book. Indeed one gets the feeling that he is not reading a book, but rather sitting with Nicoll at his own fireside in the long room flanked with thousands of books on either side and hearing him talk or dictate his numerous articles for the press. Or in company with the subject of the biography and James Barrie he is making America a visit and seeing the United States through the eyes of an observing Scotchman. Every chapter of the book is an open window through which the reader sees William Robertson Nicoll in action. All the moods, motives and methods of a great man are revealed with rare fidelity to truth. Numerous extracts from his letters reveal the soul of the man as no amount of commentary on the part of the author could do. Robertson Nicoll was a unique blend of poet and partisan, merchant and master of literature, statesman and mystic, prophet and politician. With characteristic Scotch thrift he could drive a good bargain without violating the ethics of honesty or putting too great a strain upon his Calvinistic conscience. At the same time he could produce a poem or write an editorial as far removed from the market-place as the heavens are above the earth. Under his management the British Weekly became a property of great commercial value, and the editor shared in the financial prosperity of the paper. But he remained the same democratic soul devoting all his powers to the common weal. The biography is well done because it reincarnates the spirit of a great leader who lived through the most momentous and significant period of the world's history.

—JOHN A. EARL.

The Patrimony of Life, and other sermons, by Hobart D. McKeehan. New York: Revell Co. Week-Day Sermons in King's Chapel. New York: Macmillan Co. $1.50 each volume.

The Rev. H. D. McKeehan is pastor of the Reformed church, Huntingdon, Pa. These sermons in subject-matter, in style of presentation, in epigrammatic expression are excellent. The preacher could have afforded without weakening the sermon, to give more concretes for abstractions and particulars for generalities in the discussions. The last sermon of the book on the divinity and authority of Jesus Christ is in merit beyond all praise.

The sermons of the other volume were delivered in the "oldest pulpit in the United States" by representative preachers of different denominations. While they were delivered in "Boston's busiest corner at the hour of noon day" crowded congregations met the speakers at each service. The sermons are marked for their simplicity and practicalness, and also their spirituality. The preachers seem to have discovered and appreciated the real needs of men immersed in business responsibilities and adapted their message to those needs. Withal the craft of sermon building has not been overlooked, for they are the work of masters.

—H. O. ROWLANDS.

Navaho Tales, by William Whitman 3rd. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.75.

These tales are genuine native myths of the Navaho Indians, told and illustrated so as to reproduce the atmosphere and flavor of the old haunts of the tribe in New Mexico and Arizona. No myths in the world better express the genius of a primitive people in its effort to interpret its own wonder world, and none are better adapted to the purpose of wonder stories to be told to children. One who received his impressions of the Navaho character from Capt. Mayne Reed's stories of the wild west half a century ago, can highly appreciate this opportunity to hear from the lips of the Navahoes themselves an interpretation of the soul of their people.

The Saving Sense

He: "Why don't you wear your new cheesecloth dress?"

She: "Don't be silly. I haven't any cheesecloth dress."

He: "Why, you just showed it to me yesterday!"

She: "That's a dotted Swiss."

He: "Well, if a dotted Swiss isn't called cheesecloth it ought to be."

The boarders were insisting among themselves that after Mrs. Smith, their landlady, had served them a meal from a ham there would be no perceptible difference in its weight. So Pierson bribed the cook to weigh it before it was cut and it was found to weigh twelve pounds. While some of the boarders inveigled Mrs. Smith into the parlor, Pierson and his co-conspirators went out to the kitchen and weighed the ham. It weighed twelve pounds and four ounces! They betook themselves in glee to the parlor, but had no more than seated themselves when Sam appeared in the doorway brandishing the carving fork.

"Dis here fo'k, I finds it in de ham way ober to de back side so's you couldn't see it. Dere wa'n't no fork in de ham when I weighed it afore suppa."

Five-footer: "I'm over my ears in debt."

Six-footer: "Well, that's not so bad—look at me; so am I."

Grandpa had come to visit his little grandson. Wishing to find out how Jimmy was getting on at school, he asked:

"If you had ten apples and I gave you two more, how many would you have altogether?"

"I don't know, grandpa," replied Jimmy. "We always do our sums in beans."

Among the "Specimens of Irish Wit" is the pithy reply of the driver of a jaunting car to a passenger who had made an impatient remark about the time he was taking to wrap himself up: "Yes, in truth, sir, what's all the wurrold to a man whose wife's a widow?"—Christian Leader.

A Scotch minister was walking through a street in a village one misty evening when he fell into a deep hole. There was no ladder by which he could make his escape and he began to shout for help. A passing laborer heard his cries and looking down, asked who he was. The minister told him, whereupon the laborer remarked: "Weel, weel, ye needna kick up sic a noise. You'll no be needed afore Sawbath, an' this is only Wednesday night."—Christian Leader.

Folks, Facts and Opinion

The early inevitable seems to have arrived. Nobody who knows human nature could have expected that a few self-selected nations could permanently hold a monopoly control of the council of the League of Nations. And already it is reported that Poland, Belgium, Spain and Brazil will demand permanent seats in the council. Ultimately a composition of the council must be reached that will satisfy the sense of both equity and safety in the nations concerned. It is possible that extensive changes in the constitution of the league will be required within a few years.

Murphysboro church, Ill., destroyed by a tornado, and for lack of means to rebuild, still in ruins, may be compared with Park Avenue, New York. The Park Avenue trustees announce that they expect to realize $1,750,000 from the sale of the present building. For the rest they say: "The proceeds of the sale will be put into the new building and a sum equal to this has been pledged by a member of the church, and while no general canvass will be made for contributions, some members have already volunteered to make additional gifts. Certain features of the church it is expected will also be financed by members as definite memorials. If still further sums are required to carry out the plans, a small group of our members have already agreed to guarantee such further financing."

What men's class in a Baptist church in America can beat this one in Wales? A Greek class for the special study of the New Testament in original Greek, has been organized under the auspices of the Workers' Educational association, at Rhosllanerchrugog, by Rev. J. Powell Griffiths, B. A., Baptist minister there. It is attended by thirty-two Welsh miners (the maximum number allowed) and has proved very attractive. Mr. Griffiths has been most successful in training working men students. Several of them have passed the matriculation examination of the different universities while working in coal mines.

How the better thought of Japan as well as of the United States is dealing with the problem of international relations may be seen in the following excerpt from a book recently written by a leading Japanese student of these problems: "To-day, America and Japan are facing each other across the Pacific ocean and permanent peace in the regions of the Pacific should be maintained by the joint cooperation of the two nations. Hence, we cannot and must not leave these important questions to demagogues and yellow journals alone. Our two peoples must study the problems and join their efforts to solve the difficulties for the maintenance of cordial relations between the two countries."

The city of Belfast, Me., has begun to operate a railroad thirty miles long which it has owned fifty years. The Maine Central railroad has been operating it but refused to renew its lease because the road did not pay. In such cases public ownership and operation become practicable and orthodox.

Is civilization senile? The following note is clipped from a current periodical: "Either it is a disillusioned age, past its excellence, or the writers, publicists and preachers to whom we look for light and guidance, and from whose relics, in the future, its quality will be gauged, are in a conspiracy to misrepresent it. So deeply infused is their thought with the quality of mental fatigue, so uncertain is their gesture of groping for remedies; that, in order to institute a comparison, we are forced to carry our imagination back to a period of which scant record exists, and reconstitute, so far as sympathy and historical understanding can reconstitute it, the state of mind of civilized mankind during the most tragic epoch of the world's history known to us—the century and a half that preceded the downfall of the Roman empire. Current discussions of the value of Christianity may well consider what has to offer for a state of mind like that. Can the gospel of Christ restore youth and vitality to a senescent society?"

Regulations recently adopted in China for the control of education contain the following provisions: "Any institution of whatever grade established by funds contributed from foreigners, if it carries on its work according to the regulations governing various grades of educational institutions, shall be allowed to make application for recognition at the office of the proper educational authorities of the government according to the regulations as promulgated by the ministry of education concerning the application for recognition on the part of educational institutions. Such an institution should prefix to its official name the term 'Szu lih' (privately established). The president or principal of such an institution should be a Chinese. If the president or principal has hitherto been a foreigner, then it must have a Chinese vice-president, who shall represent the institution in applying for recognition. If such institution has a board of managers more than half of the board must be Chinese. The institution shall not have as its purpose religious proselytization. The curriculum of such an institution should conform to the standards set by the ministry of education. It shall not include religious courses among the required subjects."

Massachusetts will breed elk. Two blind trainloads containing 620 elk have been delivered from the national bison range in Montana to the elk breeding and grazing association at Middleboro. The weight of each animal is about 350 pounds.

Is another trek of God's fugitives passing by? It is a stray news paragraph in a corner of the paper, but it says: Mennonites who a few years ago sold out their farms in Western Canada and trekked to Mexico, settling in the valley of the Rio Grande, which they pictured as a land flowing with milk and honey, are seeking to return to Canada. Crop failures and famine have brought disillusion." Do we recall the story right? Were not these Mennonites in both Canada and the United States rated as pacifists during the great insanity a few years ago? And for their pacifism were they not harried out of both countries to Mexico? Perhaps there is an epic of high spiritual adventure in their trek there were any De Quincey to write

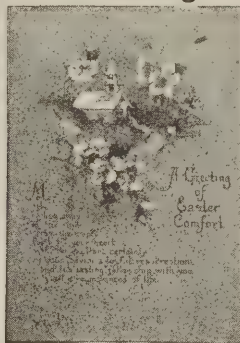

"If foreign missions cannot change its character, the Asiatic peoples propose to rid themselves of it," writes Robert E. Lewis in the Outlook of Feb. 10. Mr. Lewis was for ten years international secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in Shanghai, China. He says: "The outstanding question for the church of Asia is not a question of theology or of organization, but one of freedom. With the rising tide of nationalism and the capacity for leadership on the part of the orientals themselves, 'foreign missions' is considered to be a reflection upon their capacity and in some cases upon their national sovereignty. At home and abroad foreign missions carries with it an implication that the beneficiary nations and peoples are backward and dependent. This runs counter to the rising tide of nationalism in Asia. This is not an academic question. It is being discussed in Asia as one of the leading international problems. If foreign missions cannot change its character, they propose to rid themselves of it. It will require the greatest effort of modern Christian statesmanship to bring about this realignment. It is possible. Nationalism is now running high in China; it defies a world power of two. It has taken a high moral key. It would not use force. It uses the more powerful boycott. It demands that 'economic imperialism' shall cease, and it takes its case very specific and understandable. To trifle with it has cost the leading nations many millions of dollars during the past six months. The Chinese demand that the foreign representatives of Christianity who live among them shall invariably take sides either for the rights of China and for high moral judgment or for their motherlands and the present defiance of right on the part of those lands. This is the hour of the greatest peril to Christianity in China, and of the greatest hope—peril if we continue foreign control over any part of it, any of its personnel, its finance, its policies. We must set Christianity free."

By a vote of fifty-two to forty-two the lower chamber of the Dutch parliament refused to concur in an appropriation required to maintain the legation to the Vatican. Immediately after the vote the four Catholic members of the queen's cabinet resigned.

Rev. Clinton Wunder, pastor at the Baptist Temple, Rochester, N. Y., in reply to the complaint that the preachers are radical, raises the fundamental question as to the nature and purpose of preaching. He says that in the very nature of the case, preaching is telling the people how God would have them live and where evils exist to call for their thorough extirpation. Such preaching to those who are pleased with things as they are, always seems radical and dangerous.

It is the board for Christian work in Santo Domingo which releases the following news note, that seems almost monotonously familiar: "The most interesting political topic of the year is the new convention between the republic and the United States, modifying that of 1907 and providing for a new loan of $25,000,000. Sharp opposition to this proposed convention developed in the lower house, which was passed, however, by a narrow margin, by the use of certain parliamentary procedures of questionable character and by the imprisonment of a few of the more vociferous of the opposition.

Bruno Bauch says this fine and hopeful thing concerning the relations of the intellectual life to the economic life in Germany: "It was just the dominance of economic interests over intellectual interests in all countries of the earth and particularly in the field of politics, which led to the catastrophe which has certainly fallen upon Germany most heavily, but which—to make this clear we need only think of materialistic Marxism and bolshevism with their dangers for the whole world—can lead to the darkest and most woeful doom for all lands and nations if politicians do not, before it is too late, gain an ethical point of view, such as would yield to intellectual interests, in truth and in deed, not alone with fine phrases, preeminence over economic interests. Life itself has taught us this in Germany with peculiar emphasis. And we have tried to give this lesson a consistent basis in the ethics of our time."

Perhaps the gravity of the loss of faith in government by the people in the United States is exemplified nowhere better than in the case of Walter Lippman, who but a few years ago was spokesman for liberal if not radical democracy. One of his recent utterances is this: "Open diplomacy is suited only to a pacific world in which there are no dangerous decisions to be made, in which any question can be debated and bungled without fatal damage in the rough and tumble of legislatures and elections. The internal peace of the United States is so profound that the methods of congress are at the worst an inconvenience. But the peace of the world is so fragile that these same methods would convulse it in an unending agitation." But the fact that democracy, itself a modern experiment, has not yet developed an adequate technique does not invalidate the democratic principle. It simply shows that competency is the price of success in any government.

The American University at Beirut, Robert College at Constantinople and the American College for Girls at Constantinople, have just completed successfully a joint campaign for $2,500,000, and will now undertake jointly another campaign for an additional endowment to the amount of $6,500,000.

Premier Mussolini is reported to have ordered Senator Cremonisi, his autocratically appointed governor of Rome, within five years to rebuild the "Eternal City" to a splendor as of the age of Augustine. Possibly the report is a mistake. Possibly this is another freak of a crazy ambition. Possibly the premier, under pressure from prevalent unemployment, can think of no better remedy. But certainly the plan will evoke the question why American taxpayers should be required to bear the expense of restoring imperial splendor to Rome.

Philadelphia is in the way of trying an interesting experiment in wage rates applicable to the employes of the municipal railways. "Wages for each class of employes intended as payment for average service as rendered elsewhere are at the outset established by the general committees; changes in the wage base thereafter to be in accordance only with the rise or fall in the purchasing power of the dollar. Such changes are to be in relation to the changes in the composite cost of various standard market baskets, as determined upon by the general committees." The plan is said to have been approved by such economists as Irving Fisher and Jett Laucks. If it works it will hold tremendous possibilities of readjustment and peace with regard to both wages and prices.

What ails Massachusetts? Do the newspapers misrepresent her? They tell the story that the municipal authorities hearing that Scott Nearing was to speak in Paine Memorial hall—significant name— forbade the meeting. The "Cradle of Liberty" seems to have found some of its uses since that infant left it. Perhaps the historic succession is appropriate. Garrison was dragged through the streets of Boston by a mob.

The Japanese word for leper literally means "heaven-cursed sick people," but there is a tendency to outgrow the superstitious attitude and to regard lepers just as any other kind of sick people to whom we owe a debt of sympathy. Twelve centuries ago the Empress Komyo broke all precedent by interesting herself personally in the lepers. There is a legend that as an example to her people, who stood in terror of leprosy, the empress herself bathed and ministered to a leper woman whereupon the spirit of Buddha emerged and blessed the kind-hearted Komyo. In spite of the twelve centuries which have intervened, there is still much terror in the hearts of the Japanese toward leprosy. The belief persists that the disease is hereditary.

The storm of controversy which has arisen among Canadian Baptists over the appointment of Professor Marshall to a position on the faculty of McMaster university seems to puzzle the British Baptists. The Baptist Times comment upon it in this fashion: "It is not at all clear what Mr. Marshall has done to merit such attention. In this country Mr. Marshall was well known as an evangelical pastor. The article he contributed to this paper gave no hint of any departure from the Baptist faith, and we are not aware of anything that he has written that gives a grounds for opposition to his appointment. Should Mr. Marshall decide to return to England, there would be a number of churches glad to call him to the pastorate. We wonder whether Professor Marshall is the occasion rather than the cause of the controversy."

Under a law enacted by the colonial government of Massachusetts seven years before the American Revolution, Anthony Bimba comes before the court in Brockton, Mass., charged with blasphemy for having said as reported in the papers: "Priests, pope and bishops are nothing but monarchs, tell them to pray and we workers have been praying for 2000 years, and what have we got? Through prayers we will get nothing. Still, some people believe in God. The priests tell them there is a God somewhere above the clouds." It is believed the picture somewhat to find the witnesses for the prosecution are Lithuanians. Thousands of people throng the streets every day who swear with their lives what Bimba said with his lips, and no policeman interferes with them. If Massachusetts has a law which those words are punishable, it needs another dose of Roger Williams.

Handing Down the Unified Budget

THERE is no necessity for debate on the principle of local church autonomy among Baptists. All types of Baptists accept without dissent the undeviating practice followed from the beginning of each local church being competent to determine its own affairs without interference from the outside. This has been called congregational government to distinguish it from episcopalian and from presbyterian government, or government by the congregation rather than by a house of bishops or by an authoritative synod. We are not here discussing the relative value of these three distinctive forms of church government, but simply pointing out the fact that Baptists have always been governed by the local congregation rather than by councils and courts somewhat remote from the local church. While signs of a departure from this practice have appeared from time to time in Baptist history the practice is still unimpaired and promises to continue without serious break. For this reason we have consistently proclaimed in these columns the utter futility of all attempts to commit local Baptist churches to a creedal statement imposed upon them by another body or to compel them to accept certain rules which would abridge their liberty in receiving and dismissing members. Should such creedal statements be handed down by a convention no local Baptist church need pay any attention to it save as the statement might reflect the general views of the church on Christian doctrine. But even then such statement would have no binding authority over the local congregation unless the members of the church called together by due notice voted to accept the same. This rule holds for all other actions taken by an outside body of Baptists designed to limit the local churches in the free exercise of their autonomy. The autonomy of the local church must be respected and the voluntary action of the local congregation must be left untrammelled if Baptists are to maintain the principle of spiritual democracy unimpaired.

We say all this and shall continue to say it consistently in spite of its serious implications in several directions. One of these implications we mention here. The other implications we shall leave for definite editorial treatment later. The unified budget of the denomination is usually presented to the Northern Convention by the finance committee at the annual meeting of the convention. The local churches as such have had nothing to say about the making of this budget. All the initial steps in the making of the unified budget which covers city missions, state conventions, home and foreign missions and the work of the boards of the convention, are taken by the finance committee in council with the officials of these agencies. When ready for presentation in its final form it is then brought before the delegates at a session of the convention and voted upon. Thousands of local churches know nothing about the budget until it is sent to them by the executive secretary of each state convention with a letter apportioning their share of it and asking each church to accept its allotment. Let it be said to the credit of many of the churches that they accept the apportionment as suggested and discharge their obligation fully before the end of each fiscal year. But many more churches do not pay any attention to the budget as handed down to them. If they give anything to benevolence as represented in this budget it is without system and in small doses.

Is not this part of the price we pay for failing to utilize the latent powers of local church autonomy? The initiative and referendum so much talked about in politics a number of years ago is to the point here. Some simple, workable system should be devised by which all the local Baptist churches cooperating in the work of the denomination through the established agencies of the Northern Convention, could take the initiative in helping make the unified budget. The referendum also might be utilized by sending back to the local churches for final action such questions as ought not be settled by the convention without a vote of the local congregations. Until something like this is done we see little hope of awakening a much larger sense of missionary responsibility and substantially lifting denominational morale in hundreds of our local churches. We may go on denying the statement that the unified budget is handed down to the local churches, but our denial, justified as it is by the circumstances, will not explain the palpable fact that no practical way has yet been discovered for utilizing local church initiative in creating the budget and handing it up to the Board of Missionary Cooperation for collection.

We are doing the very best that can be done with existing machinery to respect local church autonomy and yet raise sufficient funds to maintain our great missionary enterprise at home and abroad on a static basis without making an inch of advance. Had not provision been made this year for a special fund of a quarter of a million dollars in addition to the regular denominational budget, we would have been compelled to retreat from several important foreign mission stations. It is not yet certain that we can continue to hold these threatened stations, because if the full denominational missionary budget is not raised by the close of the fiscal year, April 30, the Lone Star fund will be absorbed in the general deficit and certain foreign mission work will have to be abandoned for want of adequate support. There is really nothing about the unified budget of the denomination that any local church may not understand. It has been cut to the bone and we are quite well satisfied that the local churches themselves, had they taken the initiative in building the budget, could not have done a better job. The expense of raising the money is only a very small per cent of the total budget, and the missionary organizations sharing in the distribution of the budget have been compelled to do their work on a most economical basis. In fact our economy has ceased to be constructive and is now in danger of becoming destructive. As long as the budget has to be handed down to the local churches under the present arrangement and until a better plan is found and put in operation may we not urge the churches to exercise a larger measure of reasonable faith in their representatives who are charged with the responsibility of conducting the affairs of the denomination? We believe they are worthy of our love, our confidence and our cooperation.

A Tonic for the Pessimist

FROM the Christian World we quote the following: Heitman, one of two members of the crew of the "President Roosevelt" who lost their lives in the heroic four days' struggle in mid-Atlantic to save the crew of the "Antinoe," was a German, engaged to be married to a girl at Bremen. His fellow-seaman tried to persuade him not to go with the lifeboat. "They are British," they said. From the lifeboat, pointing to the "Antinoe," he replied, "They may be British, but they are my brothers." This man had everything to live for. He was young, vigorous and hopeful, on the eve of his marriage to the woman he loved. But the call of brotherhood in the hour of danger drowned all other calls as this powerful man, a bold swimmer, tried to drive the lifeboat towards the sinking ship. He went down with another shipmate as a huge wave engulfed the lifeboat, and the first attempt to reach the stricken crew of the "Antinoe" failed. But there were others on the "President Roosevelt" captured by the same spirit of brotherhood that moved Heitman and his companion to vicarious sacrifice, and for four days they battled with the elements, losing six lifeboats in repeated efforts to rescue the perishing. On the fourth day, when the sea had somewhat subsided and the sixty-mile-an-hour gale had slowed down, the twenty-five exhausted men were taken off the "Antinoe" by two lifeboats. When safely transferred to the "President Roosevelt" and after first aid had been rendered to the rescued men, a tender thanksgiving service was held in the social hall. All knelt in prayer and sang hymns. A sermon on "Providence" was preached by Doctor Cochrane, pastor of the American church in Paris.

We do not take space to tell this story thinking that will be news to anybody who reads the newspapers. We tell it here for its moral value and for its inspiration content. There is much suspicion in the world. Anti-th and anti-that are rampant. Race and religious prejudice fatten on ignorance, isolation and tradition. War stalks in the distance as the established practice for settling international quarrels. The reign of Christ in a kingdom of God is still largely a beautiful dream. The pessimist is not without justification for his mood. But stories like the one told in the preceding paragraph pierce the gloom like a beam of sunshine that breaks through heavy clouds piled up for days against the blue of the open sky.

Taking Self-Sacrifice Seriously

IT seems like an anti-climax after telling the story of Heitman to come down to the thing we Baptists talk about as self-sacrifice during the month of March. To aid us in practicing a bit of self-sacrifice before Easter, pasteboard boxes printed in two colors have been sent out to all the churches of the Northern Convention to be distributed in the homes of the members in the hope of augmenting the regular offerings for missions. There are these homes hundreds of young men and young women who would gladly duplicate the heroic self-sacrifice of Heitman if the occasion demanded it; but they smile indulgently when mother puts the pasteboard box on the mantle or on the dining table to receive the odd change of the family before Easter. Somehow the penny bank does not harmonize with the big things which the church ought to be engaged in conserving and advancing. It seems almost like children playing with toy boats on a placid pond as compared with the lifeboats of the "President Roosevelt" tossed on waves seventy feet high. We may make fun of what has been called "the youth movement" of this generation, and we may sympathize with those mature men and women who do not take it seriously, but is it not a fact that upstanding young people who think things through and who are eager for tasks worthy of their ideals, cannot be won and held to the church by a program of pink teas and social respectability? Under the circumstances the self-denial paper bank is a worthy aid to a great cause; but its psychology is not designed to arouse the enthusiasm for the kingdom of God in the world which it deserves, or to put self-denial on a level with the heroism of Heitman.

Therefore we hope that the paper banks which have been distributed so widely among Northern Baptists will be taken for what they are worth and used for what they are designed, viz., to keep before the family the saving idea of self-denial during the period of the year that brings most vividly to memory the supreme sacrifice of our Lord. But we pray that no family unless it is very poor will dare to make the loose change which may be accidentally or incidentally dropped into the pasteboard box the measure of that heroic thing we call self-sacrifice. Drop in all the loose change you can spare, but come on Easter Sunday to the church with currency and checks commensurate with the needs of the world and with the love of him who though rich, yet for our sakes became poor that we through his poverty might become rich.

The World in Transit

en Billion Dollars' Worth
International Capi Belli

Secretary Mellon has more than a glimpse of wisdom about war debts. He is reported to have said: "The United States cannot expect to collect in full the $10,000,000,000 war debt owed it by Europe unless it is prepared to go to war to enforce payment." Does it follow that only those nations may expect reductions in the debts which are prepared to go to war for that purpose? Is this the reason American militarists insist so strongly on military training in the schools? Perhaps not. Perhaps instinct rather than reason operates in both directions. But behind those debts lies the possibility of a deep and long estrangement that may lead to war.

an Armies and Navies Exist Such Japanese Invasion?

Bigger than a man's hand is the cloud that threatens the future supremacy of the white races in the world's economic life. In July the British cotton manufacturers in Bombay found themselves, it is said, with a large accumulation of unsold goods on hand. They announced a cut in wages of about 11 per cent. Indian workers to the number of 125,000 struck. The imperial government was imposing an excise tax on cotton goods manufactured in India. To relieve the manufacturers, the excise tax was removed. The strikers had won. What gave rise to the trouble? Japanese cottons were coming into India and underselling both British and Indian cottons. To meet that competition something had to come down—wages, salaries, profits or taxes. Taxes yielded with the least resistance. Such competition will be operating presently along the whole economic frontier of Asia and Africa. A tariff can close the home market against it, but what can close the world market? And the field of economic competition is rapidly shifting to the world market. Where and how are we going to sell our national surplus? And failing to sell it, what are we going to do?

Seems Hard to Keep Those Englishmen Down

A little while ago Englishmen and the rest of us were discussing the prospect of the economic and political collapse of Great Britain. But according to the way of these British, it is only when things begin to be desperate that they wake up and show their mettle, and they do it in their own peculiar style. In this instance a Tory government deals the socialist program and runs off with it. That is, the Baldwin administration proposes, as a government enterprise, to harness to electricity every bit of natural power in the island, coal, waterfalls, tides and all, and both literally and figuratively to electrify British industry. This is the answer of the government to the socialist demand for the nationalization of coal mines. It shows an intelligent understanding of the economic and social meaning of superpower and a purpose to make that power a public service rather than a private graft. If J. B. makes up his mind to do that thing, that thing he will do.

Those Who Would Live Together
Must Learn to Work Together

But a few years ago economic competition was understood to be, and was, the basis of modern civilization. But almost over night a reversal of thinking has occurred. In the churches, in the schools, in Kiwanis and Rotary clubs, pronouncements of chambers of commerce and labor unions and in current books and periodicals, there is a distinct shift from the maxims of competition to those of cooperation. And the practice of cooperation is making surprising progress. The older systems of Europe have continued to grow. Notably in Great Britain the Rochdale experiment, now a century old, has come to be one of the most extensive and reliable business enterprises of the country. Modern civilization tends to adopt as its principle of association a time-honored slogan: "Who best can serve and best agree."

Has the Dawes Plan
Saved Germany?

Edgar Ansel Mowrer, one of the foremost foreign correspondents of the American newspapers, describes the economic balance in Germany which has followed the adoption of the Dawes plan in the following words: "The equilibrium between capital and labor was broken. While wages were arbitrarily stabilized at a level only slightly above that before the war—and have since risen very little—prices were artificially stabilized at a level high enough to protect the producer against all real and imaginary risks—in all cases at least 50 per cent above the pre-war figure, and in some 100 per cent higher." The meaning of this development for Americans would seem to be that when German wage-workers set themselves in earnest to secure an equitable adjustment of wages to prices, the mortgage held by American capital upon German land, factories and railroads will pledge America to oppose the efforts of the German workers. Imagine the psychology of German labor under the impression that it is enslaved by American capital. Good statesmanship will try to avoid creating that psychology.

Why Not Propose Cancellation
For Adequate Compensation?

Few Americans probably ever favored the flat cancellation of the war debts without consideration. Certainly no debtor nation proposed any such thing. But there is a well-known principle of law that in assessing the compensation due to an owner whose property is taken for the public use, account shall be taken of the benefit that such use brings to him in return. Suppose it could be arranged so that the relinquishment of American claims could be negotiated in terms of friendship, of tranquillity among nations, of economic recovery for the world, of organized peace and of disarmament; on such terms, would not relinquishment be ample compensation to America herself for any financial sacrifice involved? In fact the only criticism that has been offered against the settlement of the Italian debt has been that its effect was to bolster up the dictatorship of Mussolini. Americans are willing to put money into liberty, justice and human welfare; but they would like to be assured of full and prompt delivery of the goods.

Listen to This Whisper
From Dreamy Hawaii

The date is Feb. 20, and the papers say: "Great excitement was manifest today on the campus of the University of Hawaii over the compulsory military drill controversy which began yesterday when Ka Leo (The Light), a student's publication, violently attacked the system in vogue, comparing it with German pre-war practices. When the classes voted on the question today, the majority opposed to compulsory drilling was so large that the votes were uncounted." And to that degree which is less than zero, does the great Japanese Peril reduce itself where the Americans are near enough to see what is in it. The mind of Hawaii, as represented by its university group, scouts militarism. It is mightily heartening for lovers of peace.

The Consecration of Conversation

"These words shall be in thy heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them."

By ROBERT A. ASHWORTH

IT is said that speech is silver but silence is golden. There are those who achieve a reputation for extraordinary wisdom by mere parsimoniousness in speech. Thomas Carlyle inveighed against the amount of talk in the world. Yet it should be noted that Carlyle's gospel of silence occupies some thirty octavo volumes! A little reflection should convince us that the world is very largely run by talk, and that the character of the persons who do the talking, and the quality and content of the talk determine history.

Among the weightiest injunctions of Moses to his people was that they should talk: "Thou shalt talk of them!" What does this great prophet and leader say that his hearers should talk about? Obviously about religion, of which he gives them the essential principle. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart and with all thy soul and with all thy might. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thy heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house and when thou walkest by the way." He tells them that they shall first have this love of God as a personal experience: it "shall be in thine heart"; and then that they shall teach it and talk about it.

Jesus repeats this injunction. He agrees with Moses as to the central principle of the religious life, and adds to it love of the neighbor, enjoined by the same great teacher. He was always urging his disciples to enthrone these principles in their hearts and to practice them, and then he bids them talk about them. It is true that in special circumstances he bade the recipient of the divine goodness "tell no man," but his command to the healed demoniac was more typical: "Return to thy house, and show how great things God hath done unto thee."

His Witnesses

Further, after the resurrection, when the task of recruiting the kingdom of God was definitely committed to the disciples, this was the means that he commanded them to use. "Go and teach," he said. "Ye are my witnesses." It was his only dependence. He looked toward a day when all men and nations should come beneath the banner of the cross, and the only means that he suggested through which this should be brought about was talk. One was to tell another, and that other others, and so on in an ever-widening circle.

This method proved to be efficacious. It was the method, and it explains the success of the apostolic church and also of the church of the first centuries. The new truth went from mouth to mouth. "We are but of yesterday," wrote Tertullian, "yet we have filled your cities, islands, towns and boroughs; we are in the camp, the senate and the forum. Our foes lament that every sex, age and condition, and persons of every rank, are converts to the name of Christ." At length Christians talked the empire out of its conceit for paganism into the religion of Jesus, and Christianity became the religion of the state. It was a great triumph for conversation!

While it is true that under the preaching of Peter three thousand were converted in a day, this was a sporadic and unique experience. The early Christians did not practice mass evangelism. It was not by its public services, but by the private influence of its members over those with whom they came into contact, day by day, that the church won the world. The individual captured the individual for Christ. Their method was determined in part, perhaps, by compulsion. They could not hold mass meetings: public assemblies were forbidden to them. The church of their day was cruelly persecuted and harassed. The sanctuary was a place of peril which only the devout attended, and its services were held in secret. But their method was determined doubtless also by choice. They pursued it because it was efficacious.

The word evangelism today has acquired an almost technical significance. It suggests mass meetings, great tent, perhaps, and sawdust, with much publicity and noise; at any rate, some special form of activity for reaching men by wholesale, distinct from the usual and normal methods of the church. The early Christians would doubtless rejoice, while they marvelled, at the privilege of free assembly that is ours today, but would they not warn us from that far-off century that while we take advantage of this great opportunity we should be heedful lest we substitute it for their earlier method that work of individuals for individuals, that won their first victories for the cross?

No Sincere Effort Fails

We note today a reaction in many quarters against some forms of mass evangelism that have been prominent elements in the religious life of our land in recent years. Certainly they have been grossly abused. Instances of superficiality, and of vulgarity and of the invasion of the sacred precincts of personality have been many and conspicuous. It is curious that in the effort to win men to Christ some have thought it proper and necessary to lower, instead of heighten, those elements of human dignity and good taste that should certainly if anywhere, be associated with the approach of men to God. Yet, with all its faults and failures, it is evident that God has been able to use even the crudest efforts so they were sincere, for the progress of his kingdom.

If some forms of public evangelism are discredited in the minds of certain people and have been laid aside, what is being substituted? What is left for the recruiting of the kingdom? The charge is widely disseminated that the so-called "liberals," whose numbers steadily increase in every communion, are doing little or nothing in this direction. Men say, "The old-fashioned revival meeting got results and still gets them. It brings men to God. What do you who object to it practice in its place? How are you bringing men to God?" The question is fair, and constitutes a challenge that cannot be avoided. If the implied indictment were true, liberalism would have no future; it would already be hopeless and decadent. For if the kingdom is to prevail there must be constantly added to the church "those that are being saved." The church that is not growing is declining if it is not dying.

We need nothing so much today as a revival of Christian conversation. "Thou shalt talk of them!" We need to raise up a generation of witnessing Christians. There is truth in the dictum of Emerson, so often quoted, "What you are speaks so loud I cannot hear what you say"; but when this is taken as an excuse for the neglect of Christian testimony, and a dependence pon what we call "unconscious influence" for the recruiting of the kingdom of God it is the occasion of failure and the source of disaster. Christians must talk of them! I do not know what you believe, or what are your ideals or purposes or allegiance unless you talk of them. And if I am indifferent to them I shall never be persuaded to adopt them unless you speak of them and speak persuasively.

Preaching will not suffice. If the world must wait to be brought to Christ until it is brought by public preaching it will wait forever. Let us make no mistake: most of the fruit of the kingdom is hand-picked. The Christian church began when Andrew brought Peter to Christ, and Philip brought Nathanael, and it has been continued by the same sort of process.

Religious education will not suffice if it means merely conveying facts or making our children cultured and scholarly; but only if it leads to the shaping of attitudes, the inspiration of purposes, the determination of ideals and the direction of conduct. That process of education is incomplete, if not a failure, that does not bring the pupil into a relationship of voluntary and devoted allegiance to Jesus Christ as Master and Lord of life.

"Thou shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way." You are not theologians or trained teachers, perhaps: but you can talk! You do not know all the roads by which men can come to God; but you know how you came. Can you not talk of it? Can you not guide men over the path you have yourself traveled?

The Christian life is first an experience and then a testimony. Some cannot witness because they have not seen anything. They say that deafness and dumbness go together—that deaf-and-dumb people are dumb because they are deaf. If they heard something they could say something. Is this the reason there are so many dumb Christians?

Side-Lights on Inspiration

Inspiration is the breath of God inspiring us to further endeavors.

BY F. W. NORWOOD

DR. CHARLES E. JEFFERSON, in his book upon "The Character of Paul," advises those who wish to study the life of the great apostle to leave the epistle to the Romans until the very last. He says that it is the worst possible point to begin with if one wants to make Paul's acquaintance. It comes first in the canon of the New Testament mainly because it is the longest of his letters, and because it was written to the church of the world's metropolis. It is the most formal and ambitious of his letters, and it is also the most obscure, provocative and perplexing.

It can stand upon its own ground, and needs no apology at this time of day. It runs the whole gamut of excellence. Its purple patches are the everlasting delight of Christian men. Its dynamic quality has vitalized religion through all the succeeding centuries. It has fascinated and nourished all the theologians, and with the Galatian letter created the Protestant reformation and the Methodist revival. What it has meant to the saints and reformers passes all computation. It is so great and grand that to drop a disparaging hint seems like sacrilege.

Yet a greater than Paul said that the wheat and the tares will grow together until the end of the world; and nothing can save Paul from the charge of having led men into some of the bitterest of religious feuds, unending theological disputes and inveterate obscurantism.

Doctor Jefferson loves Paul almost to the point of adoration. He declares that "he is indeed Paul the great. His name is above every name except the name of Jesus. Like his Master, he was great because he was the servant of all. John Chrysostom wrote a memorable sentence when he said of Paul, 'Three cubits in stature, he touched the sky.'"

But he has been bold enough also to write the following passage:

"Good men in their desire to become like him have turned their back upon science and philosophy and art, upon business and politics and amusements, some of them even on married life itself. Everything not connected openly with religion has been condemned as worldly and dangerous. Under the influence of Paul men have become monks and hidden themselves completely from the world. Others have not gone into a cell or a cave, but have carried the monastic idea into their life. Listening to Paul's exhortation, 'Come out from among them and be ye separate,' they have refused to have anything to do with politics, or to take part in any moral reform, or to give support to any movement for the advance of education or science or art. Nothing has been of moment to them but the saving of their own soul. Under the guidance of Paul, men have pushed the doctrine of obedience to disastrous extremes. They have urged submission to despots, no matter how tyrannical, and obedience to husbands, no matter how inhuman, and obedience to slave-owners, no matter how cruel, and have all the while claimed that they were following the instructions of Paul. Under the sway of Paul's letters devout men have become afraid of philosophy and hostile to science and suspicious of art, and exceedingly wrathful against every form of amusement. If the church is frequently accused of narrow-mindedness and bigotry, it is because of the attitude of men and women who have been misguided by Paul."

It would be easy enough to show that those unfortunate results were the fault of Paul's interpreters rather than his own. But let that pass.

It is a healthful sign of the times when one man, and he an admiring disciple, can utter such apparently contradictory statements. It is the dawn of a new day. But yesterday those two paragraphs could only have been written from hostile camps. On one side would have been those who held that Paul was infallibly inspired, and who would utter no syllable that detracted by a single iota from his glory. In the other camp would have been found those who admitted no excellence, but fiercely thrust at every defect.

We are getting more sane because the Spirit of truth is at work in the midst of the world. It is not a world of perfections and infallibilities, but of searchings and strivings after the ultimate truth. The friends of the Bible no longer regard it as a collection of proof-texts to be attached like labels to particular problems. Problems are never twice precisely alike. Those of each generation are as different from the last as a boy of sixteen is different from the same boy at six. Our labels require reinvestigation as much as the problems themselves. The truth of one generation becomes the error of the next if it fails to grow. Truth is not a post but a growing tree.

To quote Doctor Jefferson again: "Paul was quick in every movement and the spirit of headlong haste is in his style. He had no time to be careful, even of grammar. When grammar got in his way he smashed it. He sometimes forgot what he was going to say. He did not always complete his sentences. He had not time. He never dreamed he was infallible. Had he known it he would have thought twice before writing some of the things he wrote. He did not know he was writing for the ages. Had he known this he would have finished some of the sentences which he left incomplete. He had no ambition to be consistent. His mind was fixed on more important things. He had no time to build a philosophical system. That is a laborious undertaking, and requires a deal of leisure. A man who thought that men had hardly time to marry would hardly be likely to take time for building up a system of theology. He had simply a few ideas which burned in his blood like fire, and it was his business to drive these ideas home, and to do it at once."

A March, Not a Bivouac

The inspiration of the everlasting Spirit does not leave us marking time, making a quagmire of the place where Paul stood, but marching on with him as he himself would have marched had he lived on into our time. Would to God that we could learn that inspiration means a march and not a bivouac. The city of God is not reached by pitching a camp, but by marching. The camp is but a resting place along the line of the advance. God gives us a few inspired seers, but their function is not to call us to halt. The supreme test of the inspiration of the Bible is its ability to keep us marching. It is not inspired if it keeps us arguing about customs and conditions that have passed away. Paul's strongest fight was concerning circumcision and uncircumcision. The controversy is now specifically unimportant. In Paul's day it meant the right of the Gentiles to share in the religious privileges of the Jews. The rite itself is for us merely a question of hygiene, but the principle means whether the outcasts of our own society shall share the privileges of the fortunate, or whether the yellow and the brown and the black among men have equal rights and duties with those whose skins are white. Paul would have been with us in these demands had he lived on until our time. We are not with him, but have long forsaken him if we merely use his phraseology about a problem that no longer exists.

Thus, inspiration is what its name implies. It is the breath of God inspiring us to further endeavors, not a cold wind freezing the forces of the kingdom. And Christians, if they would follow Paul, must be pioneers for the advancement of the kingdom of God.

We are inspired, not if we know truths that are hidden from our fellow-men, but if we can come where they are, and lift the common things of life into the realm of the love of God. Thus if the epistle to the Romans is the most abstruse and polemical of all Paul's letters, the last chapter is the most exquisitely illuminating concerning the nature of true inspiration. Yet it is merely a postscript conveying Paul's greetings to his close acquaintances.

Since I am reviewing Doctor Jefferson's book, let me quote him once again upon this chapter:

"Every sentence is redolent with the aroma of the heart. We can understand every word which he writes. Probably the most neglected of all his pages is the last page of his letter to the Romans. That is a page which most persons nowadays skip because it is so crowded with proper names. It contains nothing about the sovereignty of God, or the person of Christ, or the meaning of the atonement, or the immortality of the soul, and therefore it furnishes no grist for the theological mill. But it is one of the most illuminating of Paul's productions. It is a fine illustration of what inspiration can do. No man could write such a chapter unless he had in him the spirit of God."

No fewer than twenty-nine individuals are mentioned by Paul as well as their households and associates who are not named individually but grouped together. They were mostly poor and obscure. Some of them were slaves. Some of them had known little but trouble. Yet the absorbing care of his own full life did not elbow them out of Paul's mind. For each one he had a word of exquisite grace. They crowd the chapter, but they are each distinct in his thought. "Help Phoebe; help her in every way you can. She has been a helper of many, a helper of me." "Give my affectionate regards to Prisca and Aquila. They hazarded their lives for me and worked long by my side." "Remember me to Persis, who did a lot of hard work, and to Mary, who did so much for us all." "Give my kind regards to Rufus, that choice disciple, and also to his mother—she was indeed a mother to me."

If we could understand the significance of this chapter, we could also understand the raison d'être of the present-day revolt against religion. The high doctrines of the faith are not repugnant in themselves, but they are when they are left by themselves. Men actually hunger and thirst for assurance of the sovereignty of God; an ungoverned world is as distressing to their thoughts as is a raging fire. The person of Christ is no less alluring than of yore; the need of atonement with God is painfully acute; there is no more wistful question than that of immortality. But torn from their everyday setting, made the subjects of dry, dogmatic immobility, or worse still, wrangled over by secretaries, they leave the heart cold if they do not drive it to anger.

The dust grows thick upon long rows of the theological treatises, but the human heart aches for fellowship. Paul's postscript consoles where his long argument may only confuse. Prisca and Aquila, Rufus and his mother and the rest listen with respectful silence while Paul's letter is read, but their eyes glow and moisten when they hear his postscript. The world has not greatly changed since then!

Life

BY EDNA LINSLEY GRESSITT

HEALTH traveled with me down the years,
And we were glad together.
We kept the Road of Doing-things
In every sort of weather.

Then Health passed on, I know not where,
Though I called him night and day
And buoying Work grew crushing Toil,
I sank beside the way.

"If I can do no more," I cried,
Then what is Life to me?
But Peace and Patience came to soothe
And said, "Now you can be."

Death and the Life Beyond

IV—Does Death End All? The Human Cry for Survival

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

WE now enter into the very heart of the great question of survival. It has already been touched upon the surface; it is time to go beneath. We turn first of all from the scientific to the human side of the matter and inquire what contribution humanity has sought to make in answering the incessant cry, "If a man die shall he live again?" Protesting voices have always been heard, and always will be. But who are they that have fought fiercely against the idea of human survival and exalted the notion of extinction at death? They have not been the most human beings, with a very few exceptions. Some essential part of their humanity has been suppressed. Either they have treated the matter as a purely academic one or they have been obsessed by physical science or they have failed to discover God in life or they have missed Jesus Christ or they are childless and have never known loss or they have made a sorry mess of their lives. In practically every case it will be found that some human quality is missing or that it has been stifled. In the spacious days before the great war, when men, in comparatively easy times, discussed religion as one of the many subjects which might or might not be true, it was possible for the world to be impressed with such a poem as James Thomson's "City of Dreadful Night", with its terrible pessimism and its fierce challenge:

"We do not ask a longer term of strife
Weakness and weariness and nameless woes.
We do not claim renewed and endless life
When this, which is our torment here, shall close,
An everlasting conscious inanition.
We yearn for speedy death in full fruition,
Dateless oblivion and divine repose."

The man who wrote these lines was a clever intellectual, but he suffered from a bruised humanity. At the age of nineteen he met Charles Bradlaugh, the English atheist, and became his disciple. What moral fiber he possessed was soon destroyed. After thirty years of a miserable career, he died, a besotted drunkard, in a public hospital. Who can withhold from him a genuine pity and who can fail to understand why he did not desire the prolongation of an existence which had become a very hell? But who could wish to accept this perverted genius as a genuine exponent of a sane and wholesome human desire? The monoclasts have rarely been humanly attractive. Over against their vehement protests we must place the universal cry of humanity for survival. Discords here and there do not invalidate the truth and beauty of harmony. We must listen to the constant stream of music rather than to the occasional screams of static.

History Tells Story of Man's Faith

It is in history that man has preserved the story of his life as well as the story of his deeds. History is the record of human life and thought. It shows man in concrete action—mental and physical—from the beginning. The former view is entirely inadequate which represents history as consisting of a collection of narratives more or less related to each other. The scientific historian, collating materials which are available for his purpose, presents what may be called a collective human biography. The historian shows us man as man, man essential as distinct from man accidental, man corporate as distinct from man individual. Today the human story is being reread in the light of psychology, in order that the inner life of man may be known. In the name of psychology we invoke history to inform us what man as man has believed concerning the life beyond. During recent years science has rendered one of the most signal of its great services in conducting us to the very beginnings of the human story. It has taken us back long before Israel appeared on the scene; long before the time of writing. It places us close to that dim borderland where substantial fact and insubstantial legend meet. We are enabled to reconstruct the life of Egypt, Babylon, Assyria, Phoenicia at the very cradle of the race. Scientific history reveals to us in these remote periods every possible variety of religious belief and practice and almost every possible variety of social life, from the most repulsive and degrading to the most refined and civilized. Amid all that astonishing variety we clearly perceive one strange and consistent thing—namely, that in all epochs, among all peoples, in every territory and throughout the whole hierarchy of the human family, there was, and is, a definite belief in the survival of man beyond the tomb.

Material Witnesses

Three things attest this universal belief. First, the monuments that men erected. For ages men regarded the Pyramids of Egypt with astonishment as being among the rare marvels of the world. But they and their neighbor, the Sphinx, were always enveloped in mystery. Why were these colossal structures involving so much architectural skill and slave labor, constructed? Human ingenuity exhausted itself in seeking to penetrate the mystery of the Pyramids. Today the key is in our hands. These tombs of the kings—for such they were—were erected not only to guard human dust and to preserve a human memory, but to witness to their belief in the future life. The Egyptians believed that the souls of the departed were in some way still related to the bodies they had discarded, and that periodically they revisited them. The tombs were filled with all kinds of furniture, linen, and material for games, while food also was placed in a certain place, so that the dead, when they returned, might find familiar and pleasant surroundings, together with some entertainment. The whole world has looked on with wondering eyes during the last five years as the secret of the kings' tombs has been revealed. The Pyramids, however, represented only one form of monument. Other kinds were in use in other parts of the world, one of the commonest being the "house tomb". In Africa, in the north of America, in the old and new worlds alike, these monuments have been found. These were built in the form of houses containing chambers, for the use of the spirits of the departed who were firmly believed to return at certain times. The evidence along this line is overwhelming. To Sir James Frazer, in particular, the world is indebted for a mass of evidence that is irrefutable. These universal monuments attest, in the most emphatic manner, human belief in the after life.

Next to the monuments we must consider the religious rites which men performed. Sacrifices and incantations were offered at the tombs. Men sought to talk with the dead. Necromancy was practiced and prayers offered. In certain parts of Africa, even until yesterday, when a great chief died, all his wives and slaves were put to death at the same time. Formerly it was believed that this inhuman holocaust was nothing more or less than murder in cold blood. We now know the real reason was the belief of these people that their chief was still living, and that he would still need his wives and slaves, who were therefore dispatched and sent after him to the world beyond. This shocking act was their savage testimony to a belief in a future life. Evidence of this kind, again, is overwhelming. The monuments that have been built and the rites that have been practiced everywhere, attest the universality of belief in a life beyond the tomb.

Added to these are the doctrines which men have professed concerning the future. Since the discovery of the Egyptian "Book of the Dead" we know certainly what that highly civilized and ancient people believed concerning the life beyond. At death all souls were weighed in the scales of justice, the good going to the god of light; the bad to the god of darkness. None were exterminated; all passed onward to a life beyond. Hindus and Chaldeans believed in the reincarnation; others in the transmigration of souls. Again the evidence along this line is overwhelming. It has become oppressive by its very vastness. We are entitled to say that in some form or other belief in the hereafter was universal. It took every kind of expression. Often it was confused; very often grotesque. It was full of illusions; yet if we descend to the bottom of it all, below the monuments, below the rites and doctrines, we shall find a radical belief in the reality of a life beyond. Superior persons dismiss all this evidence with a superb wave of the hand and with the utterance of the word "heathenism"! Could anything be more irrational? Is this enormous mass of material which our foremost scholars have with such pains collected, worthy of no better treatment than an ignorant shrug of the shoulder? All these facts have to be explained. Whence came this belief which resulted in the erection of the Pyramids and house tombs? Whence the creation of these rites, the birth of these doctrines? Everywhere men saw themselves limited by the material, yet in spite of what they saw they believed in the illimitable. They saw the bodies of their fellows laid in the tomb, yet they believed that the real men were not there. All around them they beheld the spectacle of death, yet despite all they believed in the dominance of life.

An Instinct of the Soul

It is a marvelous thing, this universal war against the evidence of the senses, this refusal to believe in the finality of death. One of two things must be true; either these beliefs and practices expressed a natural instinct of human life, or they expressed a colossal and universal error. How can we explain them? Shall we say with some that their origin was a belief in ghosts? But that explains nothing. It simply pushes back the mystery a degree farther. Why should men believe in ghosts? Shall we, with others, find their origin in the practice of ancestor worship? But this again explains nothing. Why should men worship their ancestors if they were dead and done with? Equally foolish is it to pretend that dreams can explain a belief which at the highest captures the finest minds of the human race. We must abandon all these puerile explanations. One thing alone explains the mystery; one key alone fits all the facts. The universal belief arises from the nature of man; it expresses an ineradicable instinct of the soul. Two thousand five hundred years ago, in Athens, the greatest teacher of his day—one of the white souls of the world—was awaiting the hour of sunset. At the moment when the sun touched the horizon he drained the cup of hemlock and lay down to die. His disciples gathered around him for a final conversation. They asked him where he wished to be buried. And the master made answer in immortal words, "Bury me if you can catch me". When Socrates spoke thus to his troubled friends he spoke not for himself alone but for humanity. He voiced the universal instinct that is found in every breast. Mankind has never believed that death ends all.

This instinct is supported upon two great laws: the law of progress and the law of justice. First, the law of progress. The story of the human race is one of progress. During ages so vast in duration that the brain reels in trying to grasp the reality, our planet was slowly fashioned for the habitation of man. Fire and water fought titanic battles; there were violent upheavals and terrible eruptions. Then came the period of calm and reconstruction. Strange flora and stranger beasts arrived. Slowly the wilderness of the world became a habitable garden, and then at the time appointed by the touch of his Creator man appeared. Man, racially, has progressed, and the progress of the race is repeated in every individual. Each individual begins with infancy and passes through various stages until maturity is reached. Of all creatures man is the slowest in reaching perfection. He is the only creature with a prolonged infancy and childhood. Every other creature, save man, is born clothed. Man remains defenceless and dependent over a longer period than any other animal. Compare a baby six months old, with a tiger or shark, or an eagle of the same age. The physical advantage is all on the side of the creature of prey. The physical reason for this unusually slow growth of man has never yet been discovered and probably never will be. There is no inherent physical reason why the beast should be better off than the babe. Is there reason, then, mental? But animals reason as well as men. We possess no monopoly of reason. Our reason, however, is superior to theirs since it can advance to the highest logic. Is man's slow development, then, on account of the higher reason? But why, if our ultimate destiny is the same as that of the animals? If man is only an animal physically considered, he is worse off than the inferior animals. The real reason for man's slow development is neither physical or mental—it is spiritual. It is because there is a worthy goal for our life that we are conducted along this particular route. The law of the higher progress is written deep within our nature. We are haunted with the sense of incompleteness. We are always seeking the good just beyond. The lower down in the spiritual scale that we permit ourselves to be, the easier it is to be satisfied, as are the animals; the higher we rise, the more we are tormented with desire. It is always the "beyond" to which we aspire. In this true men differ radically from the animals which are content with the present. The man who has wealth or happiness wants more. He is tormented with disquiet. He is always bent upon gaining his chief good. It is God he wants, although he may not be aware of it. "Thou hast made us for thyself, and our hearts are disquieted until they rest in thee." Progress is essential to the nature of man.

God's Masterpiece

Now it is a simple fact that the instincts of all other creatures are met by nature. In the late autumn multitudes of migratory birds, drawn by a mysterious instinct, gather at a given rendezvous. There comes a night when, after what looks like conference, the birds fly round and round in great circles. On the following morning not a swallow is left. During the night the winged host has crossed the sea to spend the winter in a warmer climate. Probably one-half of the migrants had never left these shores before. They were hatched out in the early summer. But an inner instinct called them away from coming frost and snow to the warmer land. That instinct never betrays a bird. The warm land exists and the little creature, obeying the call, finds it and dwells there. If the instinct of a swallow is met by the substantial reality of the land it needs, will the in-instincts of men for their fuller life be derided and dashed to pieces? Are men of less value than swallows? We do not doubt that man, upon this planet, is God's masterpiece. Will he wilfully destroy his masterpiece? Has the world been slowly prepared through long ages for man, has the human race been slowly guided to its present high estate, has the individual been schooled and disciplined simply that he may obtain a fleeting glimpse of his chief good and then perish into nothingness? If so, then we have to declare that the building is not equal to the foundation. The vast process of the world for the making of man ends in an abortion. Can we really believe that the Creator has undertaken, on so vast a scale, the preparation of his child for life, with the sole end of limiting his career to a few dreary years upon a small globe where at the utmost he can only begin to learn a few things? The fact is that perfect development is not possible in this life. There must be a further life to enable us to reach our goal.

There is another thing, also, to be considered. Man is the only creature here below that is permanently bound to his kind. The ties that bind animals to each other are tender and easily severed. Parents and offspring part, never again to know each other as such. It is otherwise with man. We cannot forget the loved ones to whom we are bound by spiritual affinities, and who have gone from us and with whom we desire reunion. Are these bonds, so strong and tender, to be ruthlessly destroyed? If there be a life beyond where the human story can be resumed and completed, then the present life can only be described as wasteful, untruthful and cruel. If there is nothing beyond then there is no heavenly father, no heavenly home and man is made to be the sport of an irrational power for which there is no name. Against this conclusion the human instincts have always rebelled.

The second fundamental law is the law of justice. There is an eternal order in this universe, a law of equilibrium. Every thunderstorm proclaims it. Nature never fails to restore equilibrium where disorder and displacement have occurred. Physically this is demonstrated everywhere. But the same law operates in the moral world, and its demonstration is given in human history. Whenever tyranny and evil have disturbed the human order, the overruling power which directs all things has set in motion other forces which have restored order to the world. This principle of equilibrium underlies and explains the wars and upheavals which have marked the course of man's life. The final word has been with order. The eternal justice finds an echo also in every man's soul. It registers itself in conscience. The flush of shame which mounts to the cheek after the commission of an evil act, the disquiet of the spirit, the fear of discovery, the ringing of the sleighbells in the ears of the innkeeper Mathias, the invisible stain in the hand of the bloody Macbeth—these are advertisements within man that there exists an eternal law of justice. No amount of philosophical reasoning can silence the awful bells which ring in the conscience of a bad man. But justice is not always vindicated in this world. Life is full of inequalities and disproportions. "From age to age Tiberius wears the purple, while the pride and flower of humanity is crucified between two thieves." Seducers of innocence, robbers of widows and orphans, corrupters of the public life often escape their retribution upon earth. Society reserves the wealthy seducer and allows his poor victim to go to the devil. Money can triumph over human justice. These disproportions must be set right. The law of equilibrium must operate morally and completely as it now operates materially. If death ends all what a godsend to the villain! What a desolation to the oppressed! If death does all God receives a triple wound. His wisdom is wounded, since he has no proportion between means and ends. His goodness is wounded since he has no answer to the soul's deepest cry. His justice is wounded, since he allows evil finally to triumph. Humanity also receives a triple wound. Our nature is mutilated, our desires mocked, our progress arrested. This cannot be. Man's universal belief in the life beyond is well grounded in instincts which rest upon eternal law. We can say with John Fiske, "We believe in the future life as a supreme act of faith in the reasonableness of God's work."

Why the Preacher Is a Radical

BY CLINTON WUNDER

TRUE preaching has never been conservative. Twenty books of the Bible were written by prophets. Such names as Jeremiah, Isaiah, Amos and Jesus spell prophecy. Luther, Calvin, Talmadge, Beecher, Spurgeon, Wesley, Rauschenbush and Fosdick are prophets. The prophet is one who speaks as the inspired representative of a divine being, interpreting the divine will.

It is simple and safe to speak of the past. It is dangerous to deal with the evil of the present, and prophecy for the future brings down suspicion upon the prophet's head. Prophets whose words we study, treasure and preach were unpopular men, persecuted, hated, condemned, imprisoned.

Pressure is brought on the pulpit today to remain conservative and to preach the comforts of the status quo. Scores of special Sundays are urged upon the preacher. If he accepts these designations he has little time for prophetic preaching. He is told politics and attacks upon the government are taboo. In theology he is supposed to preach what the majority of his church desires.

What course shall the preacher pursue? There is but one course open. He must keep close to God, and interpret fearlessly the divine will as convictions are formed in his mind. No one is entitled to write the creed for the pulpit, nor the pulpit to write a creed for the congregation. The minister preaches the way to the abundant life, the kingdom of God as the fulfillment of Christ's gospel within you and without you. He urges his hearers to seek and permits them to possess what they find, though it may differ from his own.

If the pulpit grows sterile, complacent, self-satisfied, conservative, the people perish and the growth of true religion is retarded. True religion is never conservative and never stationary. This generation, like all others, is making the mistake in believing religion is a pill possessing cure-all powers made centuries ago, quickly swallowed and bound to bring relief for all the ills of the soul. On the contrary, religion is a seed, which must be planted, watered, warmed, grown, cultivated and harvested, then planted again and this process continued. True religion is ever growing, enlarging, expanding and developing. Jesus himself was constantly saying, "Ye have heard it said of old times, but I say unto you."

The pulpit must always lead, point the way to goals farther along the pathway toward the kingdom of God. Centuries before Christ was born, Jeremiah the prophet condemned the self-satisfaction of his generation in the words, "The people love to have it so." The old sins of conservatism, complacency, idolatry, prostituted wealth, greed, adultery, persecution, selfishness and ignoring of rights of others were common then as now. When the American pulpit becomes merely complimentary, neutral, and devoting itself to the defense of all existing claims, true religion will be dead except as some new reformation will come and some new Luther arise. Is the American pulpit too radical? No, rather too conservative. The followers of Christ are followers of one who was branded, persecuted and crucified as the greatest radical of his day.

The Devotional Life

The Song of the Ever-Present God

BY CHARLES ARTHUR BOYD

HOW precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! How great is the sum of them! If I should count them, they are more in number than the sand: When I awake, I am still with thee."

"Still with thee"—"thee"—the God whose power has created me!—the "all-creative One" whose thoughts toward me are so numerous that the numbering of them is as impossible as the counting of the grains of sand upon the sea-shore! "with thee"—whose preserving power has cared for me during the hours of slumber; "when I awake, I am still with thee!"

Seraiah had felt the comfort of his presence in the days of the exile in far-away Babylon, now he is feeling that same comfort in Jerusalem, even in its present imperfect state, and his song breathes his assurance of the continuance of that blessed Presence through all the coming days.

Seraiah's song is a most uniquely personal one—he has emphasized again and again his joy in the personal relation which he felt so keenly and strongly binding him to his God.

A Righteous God

But that God is not only an all-knowing, everywhere-present, creative God, he is also, and especially, a righteous God.

Since God is so wonderfully thoughtful and kind and near, and his acts so consistently righteous, is it not one of the strangest things in the world to find that there are men who dare to "speak against thee wickedly, and take thy name in vain?"

And, inspired with so real a devotion to God as he has expressed in the earlier stanzas, how can the singer do else than condemn without reserve such an attitude toward a God of such love and thoughtfulness?

So may we find, even in what seems at first reading to be hardly in keeping with the rest of the song, a real tribute of devotion and loyalty to God:

*"Surely thou wilt slay the wicked, O God;
Depart from me, therefore, ye blood-thirsty men.*

*For they speak against thee wickedly,
And thine enemies take thy name in vain.*

*Do not I hate them, O Jehovah, that hate thee?
And am I not grieved with those that rise up against thee?*

*I hate them with perfect hatred:
They are become mine enemies."*

LET us interpret the name Jesus applied to himself. He is the Son of God; but in speaking of himself he always used the term, "Son of man." More than sixty times it appears in the Gospels. This term is closely related to his birth because the Messiah did not come as the angels came, full grown and for only a brief call. He came in the regular way by birth. And he grew up in the regular way through boyhood to mature manhood. He was indeed the Son of man in this human sense. Jesus as "the Man," brings us close to the true interpretation of a title that has baffled Bible students. In fact as Jesus spoke the native tongue, the phrase in Aramaic simply meant, "the Man."

A true priest of God, Seraiah had no place in his philosophy of life for any spirit of compromise. God's enemies were his enemies and would continue to be so as long as they continued to defy his God.

The sun had disappeared beneath the waves of the western sea and the sunset glow that had filled all the sky was fading when Seraiah suddenly realized that the swift darkness of the eastern night would soon be upon him, and that he must speedily retrace his steps to the city.

The Way Everlasting

Before he turned away from the heights, however, he turned and climbed to a point whence he could look away, over Jerusalem, far away to the west. And, standing there motionless for an instant, he watched the last golden glow die out of the western sky. And as he thought of that unknown path to that land of mystery at the end of the west, beyond the "uttermost parts of the sea," he sang the closing stanza of his song—softly breathed it as a prayer out of the depths of his soul:

*"Search me, O God, and know my heart;
Try me, and know my thoughts;*

*And see if there be any wicked way in me,
And lead me in the way everlasting."*

And the quieting peace of the nightfall seemed to echo over the hillside—"Lead in the way everlasting;" not a temporary, limited way was the way in which God would lead—but—oh, glorious thought for Seraiah and for all to whom this song has become precious through all the years since that sunset time on Olivet—

He will lead all who are willing to follow:

"In the way everlasting."

Meeting Helps" on C. L. P. Topics for Mar. 28

Notes: All references hereafter made in these "Meeting Helps" will be to the following books: "Modern Discipleship and What It Means" by Woods; "Twelve Tests of Character" by Fosdick; "The Man Nobody Knows" by Barton; "Gates and Keys to Bible Books" by Robinson; "How We Got Our Bible" by Smyth; "A Short History of the Christian Church" by Moncrief; "Peasant Pioneers" by Miller; "God's Dynamite" by Lerrigo. The books may be obtained from the American Baptist Publication Society. A few others may be added later.

This is based on the last chapter of "Peasant Pioneers" beginning on page 16 and continuing to page 191. For this meeting, perhaps you can use the following story as a basis for presentation:

Two knights rode into a forest, from opposite directions. In the middle of that forest hung a large shield. First one knight came to it and stood gazing at it. The other knight approached. He said to the other, "Isn't it wonderful—so golden and shining?" "Golden?" said the other. "Why that shield is beautiful because it is so black." They argued, and finally drew swords against each other. While they fought, a wind came up and blew the shield part way around. Then the one who claimed that the shield was gold saw that it was also black, and the other saw that it was also gold.

Previous to the meeting fix up a "shield" to hold in front of the young people, this to be the United States or Canadian emblem on one side, and just black on the other. In meeting, hold this shield up, the black side toward the audience. Ask them what they see. Then tell them what you see. Turn the emblem about so that they may see the other side.

The parallel may then be drawn as to whether or not we look at both sides of the "foreign" question before we judge—whether or not we see the other fellow's point of view on the subject. Now that only so can the Slav and American appreciate each other.

The Students Speak Silently

To create a united and active student opinion favorable to the immediate entrance of the United States into World War and to arouse students of the United States to a more intelligent interest in and effective influence upon the determination of the foreign policy of the United States."

Such was the purpose of a campaign which the Council of Christian Associations promoted for three months last year. The campaign was promoted through literature, speeches and conferences. Wherever possible, both sides of the matter were presented so that the students in the colleges would have information pro and con.

Later a poll was taken and the result shows that between 25 per cent and 35 per cent of the eligible student population of America voted. This was over two and one half times as large as the student straw vote registered on the presidential election a year and a half ago.

What does this mean? It is merely an indication that many of the students of America are interested in the political questions of the nation, and especially so in this one of the World Court.

Further, of the 130,000 votes polled, 85 per cent were in favor of America's entrance into the court on terms probably acceptable to the administration.

It is a good thing that students are taking this interest, and that a Christian council sees the importance of taking an intelligent, vital interest in things political.

Too long the church has stood by without taking an active interest in the affairs of state. For too many years it has thought it best to keep its hand out of politics. But now it has awakened to the fact that good citizenship is a vital part of Christian living; that to emulate the teachings of Jesus Christ it is essential to engage ourselves actively in the affairs of mankind, whether that interest lead us into realms international or national.

And here the church is again urging that people—students—be informed on matters of interest to the country. Whether or not the lawmakers were influenced by the attitude of these students, it is hard to decide. Let it remain that the students did show an interest and that the majority opinion was in favor of this first step in world peace.

A few years ago, the students of China took an active part in the government of the country when they revolted against some of the political practices of the officials. The country has since been guided by the thought of these young people who are interested and able to help determine the political life of that nation.

It seems to have taken America a little longer to realize that the Christian students of the land might be able to help the nation. But now the church is awake to the power of a unified Christian effort and is on duty. Long may it stand!

In a Letter

And now I must tell you what a wonderful thing has come to our B. Y. P. U. or rather as a result of our prayer circle. We're going to really and truly do some personal evangelism. Our pastor is going to conduct a personal workers' class for us after prayer meeting on Wednesday. We already have our list started; each of us is going to take one to three names and "win them to Christ." I'm so happy that something practical is developing. I feel now that I'm living up to my pledge. Won't you pray for us too? If I could help some one to accept Christ I believe I'd be the happiest person in the world.

Isn't it great to be alive—to love, to laugh, to give?

A March Suggestion

If you want to keep the matter of "self-denial" before your people, you might have a dinner. The room may be decorated to suit any country you may wish to bring to the attention of those present: China, India, Japan, etc. Every other place at the table should be vacant. After the meal, the one in charge may explain that each person was having as his guest him who said, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." For as they helped to fill that bank they were helping to feed those in other lands—and in our own—who did not have food. Through them, they were ministering to him. He was the Silent Guest. A self-denial bank may be placed on the plate, and the person next may place money therein.

If you cannot have the dinner, perhaps you may suggest that each family do this at least once each week, and so have the Silent Guest all through the month.

Guiding Little Children

BY CATHERINE BOOTH-CLIBBORN

"I WANT to go into the garden," said a little girl to her mother, as I was preparing to leave a house in which I had been a guest. "No," replied the mother, "it is too wet, and you must do your home work." "Good-bye," said the hostess to me in the hall, as the luggage was going into the taxi. "Come again—Good-bye." "Mother, I want to go into the garden." "No, dear, not now." "Good-bye, dear friend," I said. "Mother," the child persisted, tugging at her dress, "I want to go into the garden." "All right, go!" That is ruination, yet how often we all see it enacted!

Children will rapidly fall into line if well trained. Let me give a few instances.

I was out walking in the country. On the opposite side of the road was a little boy about three or four years old. His mother was laden with parcels after shopping, and looked particularly tired. "Cawwy me, cawwy me, cawwy me," he said, tugging at her dress all the time.

"I can't Harry, I have too many parcels to carry."

"Cawwy me, cawwy me," he continued, until I could stand it no longer. Crossing the road, I said:

"No, you walk up the hill yourself, with those beautiful little legs God has given you. Go on! Not another word."

Off he started, went straight along, looking back at me, with wide poen eyes.

"Ah!" sighed the mother, "I have never seen him obey like that in his life."

"But, my dear friend, this is your fault," I replied.

When he got to the top I talked with him a few minutes. And now he wanted to help mother!

I had four little boys following each other, two of them with only sixteen months between, exceedingly different in character. In fact, there is such variety in the temperaments of the children that many have remarked that one would never have said they belonged to the same family! Two of these little boys began to quarrel. This occurred again and again, until I called them up and said, "Who clothes you?"

"You, mother," was the answer.

"Who feeds you?"

"You, mother."

"In whose house are you?"

"In yours."

"Well, if that is so, I am not going to have my peace disturbed by quarrelsome children, and if I find any more

THEY see amiss who picture Time as

A stooping baldpate with its wrinkled hand
Clutched on a scythe. Not so I under-

My comrade of a life time who has told
This listening heart from childhood manifold Strange stories of the past as through the land
We ran together, while the glad winds fanned

But these mortal limbs may not much quarreling, I shall be obliged to put you in separate rooms upstairs upon bread and water for the day."

The quarreling recurred. It was a beautiful day, and it cost me a great heart struggle to undress the little boys and put them to bed, but I had said it and must keep my word. When the afternoon came, a lady in the home and my secretary said, "You are not going to keep those little fellows upstairs this afternoon?"

I answered in the affirmative.

"It is absolute cruelty," they observed. Wearily the hours passed. I confess I could not keep my mind on my work. Two little letters were brought to me. Here is one which I kept:

"Darling mamma,

Picked Up in Passing

What's wrong in the following sentences?

"I simply can't find time for the persual of books."

"This data is correct."

"The work has been aggressively persecuted."

"It was he who you saw."

"Just between you and I the whole scheme is a fizzle."

"He was dripping with presperation."

"I contend that the question is ir-revelant."

No, the persons who uttered these sentences are not uneducated—they are merely a little careless.

I regret my naughtiness today and have asked God to forgive me, and am so happy to tell you he has pardoned me. Now I come to you and ask you pardon. From today I will try to be really good. Pardon me for I have been very selfish. I do love my little brother and I will not tease him any more or answer back.

Your own son, who regrets so much Augustine."

I went upstairs about four o'clock not being able to resist longer, and the two little boys flew out of bed into my arms, asking me to kiss them. We knelt down together and had a blessed little prayer meeting, and I can assure you it made a mark upon their future conduct.

"Take this child away and nurse it for me," said Pharaoh's daughter to one who proved to be the child's own mother. The mother did something finer than nursing the child for a princess; she nursed and trained him for God, so that "he chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." He became great, very great as a leader of the people of God. But who first led the little child?—From "Our Children," published by George H. Dora Company.

What This Country Needs

HERE is some quaint and piquant philosophy which appears in the St. Paul Crescent under the above caption:

What this country needs is not a new birth of freedom, but the old-fashioned $2 lower berth.

What this country needs isn't more liberty, but less people who take liberties with our liberty.

What this country needs is not a job for every man, but a real man for every job.

What this country needs isn't to get more taxes from the people, but for the people to get more from the taxes.

What this country needs is not more miles of territory, but more miles to the gallon.

What this country needs is more tactors and less detractors.

What this country needs isn't more young men making speed, but more young men planting spuds.

What this country needs is more paint on the old place and less paint on the young face.

What this country needs isn't a low rate of interest on money, but a higher interest in work.

What this country needs is to follow the footsteps of the fathers instead of the footsteps of the dancing master.

BOYS and Girls

Tubal Explores the Inside of His Head

BY MARGARET T. APPLGARH

MISS Amanda sighed. And whenever Miss Amanda sighed there was theinkle of little black jet ornaments rising and falling on the yoke of her black taffeta dress. (Her second best dress, was—put on in honor of Newton Fairfax's return from college.) Her taffeta skirts were the dear old-fashioned and that billowed around her like black ink waves, with herself as an island in the midst of them. But Miss Amanda hated them that way. She even liked to hear the little jet ornaments tinkle when she moved. But what she did not like, was to look through the honeysuckle vine and see Tubal leaning against the hitching-post.

Tubal was black. Very black. Black from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet. And yet one wonders if he was as black as Miss Amanda painted him!

"I reckon you never laid eyes on a boy as lazy as Tubal," she was saying to the young man who was just home from college. "I reckon if I don't call him, he'll go on leaning against that hitching-post till the day of judgment, and that's all he's good for; leaning . . . and forgetting. Tubal just naturally can't remember to do a single thing you ask him to do. If you say: 'Tubal, go and mow the lawn,' he'll say: 'Yass, Yass, Miss Amandy Miss, I'se gwine do it for you, s'kerly!' But he moons off into one of his day-dreams and that's the end of the lawn. He's a little black nuisance, and I've told his mammy a hundred times that if she doesn't whip him and make him better, I won't have him around the place. Indeed I won't! He's just a lazy good-for-nothing, the kind of boy that will grow up into a perfect terror in jail and in jail as sure as my name's Amanda Fairfax. Indeed he will!"

Young Mr. Newton Fairfax suddenly became interested enough to lean forward and peer through the honeysuckle vine himself. For it isn't every day in this year that you get a chance to see a lazy good-for-nothing who's going to end in jail. Mr. Fairfax wanted to see how they looked in the middle of the hitching process. But he was disappointed for Tubal did not look like anything particular—except, of course, a pair of black legs, a pair of patched trousers, a rope suspender and one very round, shiny head.

"Is he getting any education, Aunt Amanda?" asked the young man just home from college.

"Education?" gasped Miss Amanda

The Explorers' Club

spreading her delicate white hands like peninsulas on the billowy black taffeta ocean, "Why, Newton dear, it's a right hard thing for even an ambitious negro to get an education in these parts, and I reckon no teacher living could teach Tubal anything. In one ear and out the other."

Mr. Fairfax laughed: "I'm going over to tackle this three-foot black terror for myself." So he strolled down the porch steps toward the hitching post.

"What you thinking about, Tubal?" he called to the small black statue leaning there.

Tubal rolled the whites of his eyes in embarrassment: "Nuffin, Mistah Fairfax, sah! Ain't nuffin in my head, 'deed there ain't!"

"Nonsense, you can't tell me you weren't painting a little dream in your mind's eye. Come on now, 'fess up!"

Tubal rolled his eyes and squirmed: "Deed I'se not thinkin' nuffin."

Mr. Fairfax sat down on a garden seat and regarded the boy who was going to be a terror some day: "A penny for your thoughts!" he smiled, and laid a bright, new penny on the bench.

Tubal looked at the penny. And the penny certainly looked at him! Both longed to belong to one another, obviously, so Tubal plucked up a little more courage: "You'se sure enough gwine to laugh at me, Mistah Fairfax, sah, 'cause why I'se making believe I'se—no! 'deed I can't tell it! 'Deed I can't! Not to you, Mistah Fairfax. 'Deed I can't."

"Oh, come on!" ordered the young white gentleman.

Tubal hitched up his one rope suspender, and swallowed bravely: "Well, I'se just makin' believe that I'se—you! Only black see? Yes sah, makin' believe I'se you, only still black. Figurin' out how I'd admire to go off to one of them fine colly (college) place where you-all goes to. Yes sah, with a pile of books as high as the barn door! I'se just pretendin' how my mammy she'd hold up her hands and holler: 'For de land sakes, if dere ain't my li'l Tubal settin' with all de udder fine schofards! And my sakes, if dat li'l colored kid of mine ain't readin' out of one of 'em books . . . oh me! oh my! readin' jess as easy as de white folks read!' So that's what I'se moonin' about, Mistah Fairfax, sah. I reckon I'se plumb foolish; I reckon there ain't nebber been a colored boy could do such things as all that—colly, and books, and all."

Young Mr. Fairfax grabbed Tubal excitedly by the arm and set him down on the seat by his side: "Tubal, my boy, I'm so proud of you I could eat you alive! For that's a great dream, and what's more, it's the kind of a dream that can come true, for I know of a certain colored boy who's done every one of the things you are aching to do."

Tubal grinned bashfully from ear to ear: "Reckon mebbe he ain't poor like me."

"Poorer!" said Mr. Fairfax.

"You don't say! Well, reckon likely he had one of them colly places right close by."

"Don't you believe it. It was five hundred miles away, and he had to walk every inch of that long way for days and days."

"Do tell!" gasped Tubal, "reckon that's quite some li'l walk!"

"Indeed it was! Perhaps you'd be interested to know that the reason Booker was poorer than you was because he lived back in the days when he and his family were all slaves, and his little log cabin had only an earthen floor, the roof leaked abominably and there was no glass in the window. Booker's shoes were wooden ones, with rough leather on top, and how they squeaked when he walked! Booker's shirts were made of rough flax and after he grew up he wrote a book about himself in which he said those dreadful shirts felt like prickly chestnut burrs against your body for several long, horrible weeks until the worst of the prickles became partly broken in. That was really being poor, wasn't it?"

Tubal nodded, spellbound.

"Even after America freed all the slaves, Booker's family were as poor as ever, and although he was very young and small he had to earn money in big salt furnaces by going to work at four o'clock in the morning—even before the sun was up!"

Tubal sighed sympathetically.

"But just like you, Booker wanted to read. He never met a single negro who could read, but plenty of them wanted to, so a little school was started. But would you believe it? He couldn't go, because his family made him work in those salt furnaces! But did he let that stop him? Not a bit of it! He took lessons at night, and although he must have been mighty sleepy, yet Booker actually learned more at night than the other children learned by day. So finally his family decided he could work in the furnaces from four in the morning till nine, then go to school."

(He concluded)

Among Ourselves

West China Letter

By JOE TAYLOR

WE have just had another "shoot up" of the city of Chengtu. To be exact, it was on the morning of Saturday, Jan. 16, before daylight, that we were all wakened by the sound of rifle firing. Some of the folks in the city got up and dressed, for they did not know just what might happen. There are two places where missionaries in West China have learned to "gird up their loins"—one is on a houseboat on the Yangtze when you are entering a rapid; the other is in any city or town where there are "ructions." On that morning referred to there certainly were things doing, for the clatter of the bullets could be heard on the roofs and against the walls of brick houses; if the buildings were of lath and plaster, the bullets came right through and in some cases killed the occupants of the rooms. All this was staged before daylight, and that only made the confusion worse confounded.

A Sidelight

What was it all about? That is a little difficult to tell: but it appears to have been the result of an attempt on the part of some of the military leaders now in Chengtu to get rid of one of their number and at the same time deprive him of his ammunition. His troops had to leave the city and they did not just know where they were to find another such nice town in which to stay and batten on the poor citizens. So they decided that before they left, they were going to have what they could get. Hence the firing in the early morning. Lots of stories are afloat and one can choose which to believe; but a little sifting reveals the fact that this was another case of looting on the part of the departing troops. They shot into a school building and killed between ten and twenty students who were asleep in their beds. Then they went in and robbed the dead bodies of these boys. In other places they broke into homes and took the bedding and clothes from the folks and sold them for one-tenth of their value. Imagine a city wall forty feet high; on the top, soldiers, fresh from murder, with bedquilts and clothing for sale, and a motley crowd at the foot of the wall on the outside of the city buying this bedding scarcely yet cold from the one who was wrapped in it for the night. This was what was going on in Chengtu, Szechuan, while the international commission was gathering in Peking to see whether China should be allowed to abrogate the "unequal" treaties. There were about fifty citizens killed in addition to the more than ten students.

And what is to be done about it? On May 30, 1925, some students were shot in Shanghai, while they were breaking the laws of the International Settlement, by policemen who were on duty. One need not express any opinion as to the right or wrong of that deed; for the judicial commission appointed by England, France and America has heard the evidence in the case and has rendered its decision. We know already what part of that decision is. The Shanghai municipal council must pay $70,000 and two police officers have resigned. Already the council has sent its check to the commissioner of foreign affairs in Shanghai and the money will be distributed among those who were wounded and also among the relatives of those who were killed. That is that. But how about this cruel and wanton shooting here in Chengtu? There are hundreds of students in this city and nearly twenty of their fellows were murdered in their beds. Yet, so far as one can learn, not a whimper has been heard from the student body. They have been robbed by soldiers who have taken over their school buildings for barracks and have burned the desks and other furniture; yea, even have chopped up the doors and windows for fuel. Yet those same students who were shouting themselves hoarse last-May and June because some Chinese students had been shot in an endeavor to prevent them and the rest of the mob from storming a police station, do not even whisper of what they call justice.

Soldiers and Robbers

It is this callousness to the wrongs and oppression which this people suffer on the part of the students and upper classes that discourages one as he looks out for a possible saviour for China. From of old, the students in China have been a privileged class and much fuss was made in Shanghai over the shooting of some of them. Here in Chengtu nothing is done about the murder of nearly twenty. Speaking to one of our teachers, who sees the wrong and feels it, he said: "Soldiers and robbers are synonyms." He is right; but it will take a long time to convince the reading public of America that he is right. They drink in all kinds of pap ladled out by the propagandists; but refuse to learn the real condition of affairs in this war-ridden country. Is it not possible to get some of these awful facts before the American public? The people are oppressed and have no means of redress; the militarists are ruining the country; the courts are corrupt; travel is unsafe and, in not a few parts of this province, impossible; women are attacked by brutal soldiers on the streets of Chengtu and when they attempt to resist being raped are shot in cold blood. And this same story about Chengtu can be duplicated from other cities. I wish every reader of THE BAPTIST could have the privilege of reading some of the annual reports sent in by the workers of our mission. Some of them will probably be printed in the annual report of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society but that, I fear, is equal to burying them.

Yet the church of God makes progress amid all this welter of battle, murder and sudden death. Those same annual reports that don't get before the churches in America are replete with miracles of saving grace. From all the districts came reports of special meetings as the year 1925 drew to a close. It is interesting to see that one Chinese pastor reports a large class waiting baptism but it "is too cold." His church is housed in an old Chinese building where there is no plan for heating it. What the church needs is a new building adapted to the new life that is coming in China. If some church in America that has got its own new building erected and paid for, still wants to "build" I can show them the best place to make an investment. Foreign missions have been suffering lately because of the epidemic of building which has struck the churches in America. Surely this will pass soon and then there will be a splendid opportunity to "go and do likewise" for some of the churches on the mission field. Here in West China, these new organizations are not able to erect their own church plants and need to be helped. Would it not be a good thing to form an organization in the home churches to "build another church"—not in America but out on the foreign mission field. Think about it.

Boston Letter

By CHARLES H. WATSON

Dr. Beaven at the Social Union

FOR the March meeting of the Social Union, Dr. A. W. Beaven of Rochester, N. Y., chose a vital theme and handled it with hot conviction and masterly ability. For nearly an hour hardly a man of the 400 present escaped him. They had the look they wear when reality arrives and speaks. Subject "The Challenge of Youth to the Church of Our Generation." That our youth could find so brave a voice, with a "tho art the man" accent, hauling the reverend daddies in Zion over the coals, was a revelation. It was a realistic description of palpable and prolonged mismanagement. The speaker had a poor opinion of some brands of protracted ecclesiastical "statesmanship." His plea for our modern children, so wide open ingenious evil at every exposure, as unforgettable; also that we behold them with sympathetic eyes, and "get somewhere" for them. It was well worth the long journey from Rochester to fetch us such a message.

Dr. F. F. Peterson of Portland, in just five minutes, took us to the Ocean Park summer assembly, and made us forget the ocean, as the growing hum of religious education pervaded the park. That speech was multum in parvo.

James Percival Abbott

The passing of Doctor Abbott at Pasadena, Calif., and his burial at Medford, Mass., on Feb. 25, brings up early and pleasant recollections of his first and longest pastorate at Medford, of twenty years. After graduating at Town and Newton, he at once took a position among the strong men in our ministry. The First church at Medford is practically his monument, and the church at West Medford is of his planting. Thus he divided his nearly fifty years of ministry between the East and the West, giving the last thirteen years to teaching homiletics and preaching in the Northern Baptist Theological Seminary at Chicago. Doctor Abbott was a man of vigor and conviction, loved his ministry and gave himself wholeheartedly to it, and had those pronounced human elements, and a sense of humor, that bound to him a host of friends. At the final service in Medford, Pastor Denton J. Neily, and C. H. Watson, a friend of nearly fifty years, officiated. Other services were at Pasadena, Chicago and Rockford, Ill.

A Tale of Twenty Years

In a period of shortening pastorates, this refreshing to be reminded of one strong and strong in one of our solidest churches, situated in a quiet, conservative community. Dr. Carey W. Chamberlin has just been looking over his twentieth milestone at First church, everly. To achieve a steady growth, and continuous inflow of more than a thousand new members on such a field, means deep ploughing, and patient sowing and reaping. The grateful and appreciative people made note of the anniversary, and gave full recognition of untiring devotion of a really double team. Mrs. Chamberlin is an unvociferous, but equal partner, in the pulling of the chariot.

William Frederick Wilson

The death of Pastor Wilson at Amesbury came as a sudden shock. He had begun his second pastorate there, and we were looking for signs of his aggressive consecration. His great pastorate was at the strong church at West Woburn. Everything seemed to develop there under his eight years of animated and resourceful leadership. He was a Brown and Newton man, and among his Newton classmates were Doctor Bustard, Randall Capen, Professor Donovan, Allan Hoben, Charles Whitingale, and John F. Watts. Pastor Wilson was a rare combination of modesty and initiative. Easily his intense industry tempted him beyond his strength. He was a brother beloved in every relation, and had a clean and creditable record.

Rededication at Arlington

Dr. Henry S. Potter's program of dedicatory services filled a whole week with rich features, when the restored and beautiful sanctuary was entered and enjoyed by the people. The plan of the Gothic building was so massive and correct, and so much had been saved from the flames, that only slight changes in the interest of convenience and increased facilities, could be made. These, together with the restoring of the ornately beautiful features of the sanctuary, of course rolled up a large bill of expense. But the old willingness of the people, and Pastor Potter's able and vigilant leadership, took care of everything. The pastor chose to preach the dedication sermon, as he had the best right to do, and all the streams of his interest and enthusiasm poured into it, and made it real and glowing. In the dedication service proper, Ex-pastors Wood and Watson had a part. In other feasts of the dedication week, Dr. A. T. Kempton, Bishop W. F. Anderson, Governor Fuller, and Dr. J. H. Franklin were the chief attractions.

Building at Woburn

By a singular fatality both the Woburn and the Arlington churches had fires, both had to face the task of rebuilding, one of them now finishing and the other beginning, and both of the churches are historically one. When the Woburn church was founded, they took half of the root of the Arlington church and planted it in Woburn, so that in 1881 both churches rightfully celebrated their centennial. Too bad they could not have rebuilt and dedicated together.

But Woburn is coming along finely. Charles B. Dunham, architect of the Arlington church, is taking care of them and the new church will be a colonial beauty. It will stand nobly in the city square with just the right foreground and background. Baptists will be proud of it. See then how a calamity challenges the spirit of a people. After the fire, hope seemed quenched, courage low, a merger was considered. But the insurance came, and the decision to rebuild was a bracer to pastor and people. The fires of purpose and sacrifice melted all into a unity, now everything is coming. They will build the house, pay for it, and be happy in it.

A Great Centennial

Alas, that letter-writers, tethered to libraries, cannot range over the state and get heat at first hand from such wonderful celebrations as the centennial of the old First church, Lowell! They had all the historical material, and the personnel, both lay and clerical, to make the occasion memorable. Were not three ex-pastors at hand—Ford, Wallace and Babcock—men who always make a fire? Then that young warmer from the south, Pastor G. D. Feagan, who already had filled everybody with glowing summer heat in the face of a northern blizzard, was he not animating everything from start to finish? And does not every great Baptist occasion secure the presence and the sensible eloquence of our good Baptist governor? Yea, verily! Thus was it clearly a centennial experience at Lowell.

Some News Items.

The Bible and missionary conference projected for our four Boston associations for Feb. 10, and from which we expected so much, got into the track of our severest winter storm, and of course had to fail, but we had abundant leisure to take a referendum on the blizzard itself, and unanimously it was voted a howling success! But announcement was made that the conference would again be attempted March 10.

The coming of Rev. W. Douglas Swaffield, another Brown and Newton man, from Keene, N. H., to our strong church at Taunton, is an ideal arrangement. He is from a preaching family, is capable and well-seasoned after sixteen years of successful ministry, and has hosts of friends in the state.

By a piece of rare good fortune our Boston City Mission Society has come into possession of a fine and commodious property for its West End community house. It was planned and built by the Trinity church during the ministry of Phillips Brooks. The location is perfect, all the facilities completed and adequate, and there is an artistic chapel that will strongly appeal to the predominating Italians in that quarter. And there is a playground attachment. The entire outfit was a bargain, and affords ample facilities for a varied work which under the leadership of such an executive as Doctor Forshee is certain to expand, with the help of his devoted assistants.

An appropriate service of dedication was attended by a large company of Baptists, with addresses by some of our prominent pastors and leaders in state and home missions. As a notable advance in city missions it is decidedly heartening.

Protestant Missionary Societies Oppose Intervention in Mexico

SAMUEL G. Inman, secretary of the committee on cooperation in Latin America, representing nine Protestant mission boards working in Mexico, denied emphatically that Protestant missionary societies are among those who are alleged to be putting pressure on the United States government to intervene in Mexico, as reported in a Washington dispatch to a New York daily.

Protestant mission boards have always opposed such intervention, and so far as close contact with their leaders reveals at the present time, the secretary is prepared to state that they would resent the endeavor of any forces favoring such intervention to identify these boards with such a demand.

At a recent meeting of several of these boards to consider this question, the following resolutions were adopted:

"This conference recommends to the various boards of missions having work in Mexico that they make no representation at this time as to the status of the foreign missionaries in Mexico to the governments of Mexico and the United States.

"We feel it to be highly important that all foreign missionaries in Mexico observe the spirit of the organic law regarding the exercise of ministerial functions, and that in all concrete situations they should exercise much prudence. We express the hope that these missionaries may discover ways and means by which, within the constitutional provisions, they may be able to continue forwarding the interests of the evangelical movement in Mexico.

"Regarding church property, it was suggested that the boards might take up with the Mexican government the question of accepting title to said templos, as an expression of our good-will and with a view to freeing them from taxation and guaranteeing them to the local congregations for church services. Regarding school property it was recommended that the committee on cooperation in Latin America be requested to direct its committee in Mexico to study and report upon the problem of the proper manner of holding such properties under the provision of the constitution of 1917."

Regarding the alleged movement of the Mexican government to send out of Mexico all foreign missionaries, a cable from the president and secretary of the Mexico City evangelical committee on cooperation, received today, says: "Facts misrepresented in press. No evangelical missionaries expelled nor schools closed." This would seem to indicate that the case of Rev. J. A. Phillips of Piedras Negras, reported in the press recently, was due to local conditions.

These provisions of the constitution providing for the larger direction of religious movements by Mexicans themselves have been well known for some time and Protestant missionary organizations in the United States have been urging their missionaries and their members to live within the Mexican constitution.

Edward M. Stephenson

By WILLIAM E. CHALMERS

REV. EDWARD M. STEPHENSON, D. D., died at his home in Camp Hill, Pa., Feb. 18. He had had a stroke of paralysis about a year prior to his death, from which he did not fully recover. Doctor Stephenson was born in Carnforth, England, Nov. 25, 1853. At the age of three years his parents moved to Canada, thence two years later to the United States, settling in Sparta, Ill., near St. Louis.

After having taught for some time,

Doctor Stephenson heard the call to become a minister of the gospel, was ordained in New Buffalo, Mich., in 1879, and took up his first pastorate at Richmond, Mich. Other pastorates were at Cassopolis and Pentwater in the same state. Following these he took the course at Baptist Union Theological Seminary, Morgan Park, Ill., and then resumed pastoral work in Michigan at South Haven, Ovid, Jackson and Grand Rapids. He was then appointed missionary for the American Baptist Publication Society in Michigan, succeeding Rev. E. D. Rundell. This work necessitated long cross-country trips, sometimes with a heavy bag of tracts and books. After some trying experiences he suggested the use of a wagon for transporting himself and his precious books. The idea proved practical and later the first wagon was replaced by a larger one permitting the addition of a camping outfit. He thus became the pioneer of colportage service, traveling widely, seeking out lonely homes and bringing cheering religious messages. Doctor Stephenson then was made district secretary of the Northwest for the Publication Society, having his headquarters in Chicago. He remained there for four years, when he went to Colorado as director of religious education, giving untiring and efficient service in this field until 1911. During this time he received the degree of doctor of divinity from the University of Denver. He also served the old University of Chicago as its field agent.

Doctor Stephenson possessed a rare combination of missionary zeal and educational vision. He was an early leader in the new field of religious education. When the Publication Society undertook its first series of teacher-training textbooks, Doctor Stephenson was asked to write the volume on child study.

The ten years beginning with 1911 were devoted to religious education in Pennsylvania, where he laid strong foundations. In his later years he served as librarian of the department of religious education, then retired as an honored pensioner of the society. During his long service he made many friends, who will read this notice of his death with sorrow. Funeral services were conducted by Dr. W. E. Chalmers, with whom Dr. Stephenson was associated in the work of religious education.

Rhode Island Notes

By LILLIAN M. CHACE

THE women of our state have achieved a notable victory in raising their quota in the golden anniversary fund. This quota, which amounts to $11,550, not only has been fully pledged, but more than $5000 have been paid in. Rhode Island was the first state in New England and the second in the Northern Baptist Convention to attain its goal.

It is interesting to repeat the words of one of our French missionaries, who says, "Our Sunday school is giving us abundant joy. Some of our youngsters are coming from a great distance. Most of them love the Lord Jesus and will be in the near future, we believe, faithful followers of him." Only composed of an average of twenty-seven pupils, the Bible school has given during the year a total of $80 for the missionary societies, the French colportage work in New England and for benevolent societies in the city or out of the city."

The Pawtuxet Baptist society, assisted by the ladies' aid society, tendered a public reception to the new pastor, Rev. John S. Blair, and his wife, on the evening of Jan. 9. The reception was followed by an installation service in the church. Speakers included Rev. William Reid, secretary of the Rhode Island state convention; Rev. B. T. Livingston of Boston; Rev. F. H. Spear of Pawtuxet; Rev. R. M. Plumb of Edgewood and Rev. Whitman L. Wood of Lakewood.

Rev. and Mrs. Whitman L. Wood observed the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage Jan. 11 in the Lakewood church, of which Mr. Wood is pastor. Over 200 guests, many of them from out of town, were present at the celebration. Dr. Frank Rector of Pawtucket gave the address of the evening. A gift from the three churches and friends, amounting to $325, was presented to Mr. and Mrs. Wood. Greetings by mail and telephone were numerous.

We sorrow because of the death of Rev. Francesco Cali on Jan. 18. He was pastor of the First Italian Baptist church in Buffalo, N. Y., for the past twenty months. Previous to this time he was pastor of the First Italian Baptist church of Providence. He laid the foundations of a strong church in a growing Italian colony in Providence. He was highly esteemed by his brethren of the English-speaking churches. Just before his resignation they honored him by election as moderator of the Warren association, the third oldest Baptist association of churches in the United States. Mr. Eli did much to inspire the American churches to undertake the erection of the fine Christian center plants in which Italian churches are now housed.

Detroit Baptist Doings

By ALBERT H. FINN

It has been our privilege of late to have with us Doctor Brougher, and later Doctor Robbins and Judge Witty. Doctor Brougher came in January and spoke at a great mass meeting in the Woodward Avenue church, when representatives of our churches crowded the vast auditorium to its limit, and then some. It was an afternoon meeting, on Sunday. Doctor Brougher never did better; he made a profound impression. I am sure there will be rich fruitage in many ways from his masterly address.

On Feb. 19 at the Beulah church a sisterhood dinner was given when Doctor Robbins gave us an intimate and vivid word picture of the foreign fields. It was a wonderful address. Judge Witty broke the tenseness of the hour with several of his good stories and then launched into an extensive discussion of stewardship, as an able jurist might be expected to do. Judge Witty does not believe the law of tithe has ever been abrogated, and that we, as churches, can ever be honest with God until we pay our just dues to the giver. Well that we are and have. We do what we want to do. The difficulty is in our own hearts and lives. It was expected that the attendants at the dinner would take the messages of the hour back to their own churches.

Detroit has already entered upon its pre-Easter evangelistic campaign. The Detroit Council of Churches, is a co-operative body of seventeen Protestant communions that is working out many constructive movements along sociological, educational and evangelistic lines. It would be impracticable for any one denomination to accomplish. This pre-Easter campaign is one of its outstanding annual achievements. Eminent preachers from various communions are engaged to speak daily at noon in one of the big down-town theaters, and at least in one of the large church auditoriums.

Mr. George W. Truett, of Dallas, Tex., the Baptist representative and we look forward with great expectancy to his coming. He is to preach March 9-19 successively in Keith's theater and in the Woodward Avenue church every evening. Speaking of the Woodward Avenue church reminds me of the distressing experiences that great church has been passing through. When on a holiday visit in Connecticut, Doctor Hoag, the pastor, was seriously injured. He returned home and preached as usual, but with pain and difficulty. He grew worse and went to the hospital where the physician discovered infection, and for a time despaired of saving his life. He recovered sufficiently to go South for a period of recuperation. Miss Mac Kinnon, financial secretary of the church, was also taken ill and is still away from her duties. In February, the assistant to the pastor, Mr. S. H. Meyers collapsed at a dinner meeting while he was speaking most earnestly. Pneumonia developed and he died; his funeral was held from the church on Feb. 22. Walter W. Smith, chairman of the board of trustees has been in the hospital and later laid up at home with a serious illness. Mr. Smith is one of those rare laymen who fill a large place in the life of a great church in a quiet, effective manner. And yet the Woodward Avenue church is carrying on in a splendid manner. Doctor Gleiss, President Hoben of Kalamazoo college, and Spencer of Hillsdale college, have been occupying the pulpit. Doctor Hoag has fully recovered and is expected back on the scene before this letter will be printed.

Rev. Albert G. Johnson, pastor of the Temple church, is making a real impression upon that great church and the city. His latest is a Bible conference with Dr. and Mrs. Frank M. Goodchild as the principal speakers, with Detroit talent to fill in. It was held Feb. 28-March 7. We are glad to welcome Doctor and Mrs. Goodchild to Detroit.

Expansion

At the February meeting of the board of managers of the Detroit Baptist Union, it was developed that the need for new church edifices or enlargements within the Metropolitan area during the coming year will aggregate $1,500,000. Detroit has been carrying on heroically for six or eight years but each new year seems to make larger demands. When we remember that for several years a population equal to Dayton, Ohio, or Des Moines, Iowa, has been added each year to Detroit, can we approach our Detroit problem here with any sense of appreciation?

Mr. and Mrs. Lankin have been compelled to retire from the management of the Baptist children's home because of the serious illness of Mr. Lankin. They are in Pontiac at present and Mr. Lankin is improving.

Fathers'-and-sons' dinners have become deservedly popular in Detroit, and many Baptist churches joined the long list of celebrants. The spirit of comradeship of father and son encouraged at these gatherings is a splendid promise for the future of our homes and our churches.

Among the Baptist churches in our Metropolitan area that will early enter upon building projects of either new buildings or enlargements are: First, Highland Park, Grand River Avenue, Birmingham, Halsey, Conley Memorial, Northwestern, Inkster-Westwood, Immanuel, Jefferson Avenue, Bethel, River Rouge and Olivet. These are the white churches. Our negro churches are also greatly in need of new or larger buildings. Vice-President Ernst, of the Detroit Baptist Union, estimates that $450,000 will be necessary to care for the building needs of our negro Baptist churches during the coming year.

Churches Astir in Quincy, Ill., Association

THE Quincy Central church, under the leadership of Rev. Robert Van Meigs, has enjoyed a year of growth in every department, both spiritually and financially. The Sunday school and young people's services are well attended. The correlated program of religious education has proved of inestimable value in the enlistment and training of all ages from the kindergarten to the adult, and the monthly religious educational conferences have been helpful. Following its usual custom the church will hold a pre-Easter revival at which time "The Kindigs" will assist the pastor. During the past four months this church has responded to appeals as follows: Lone Star fund, $203.71; Murphysboro church, $252.50, a slight excess over its quota; the Near East Relief, $340. Until April 30 efforts will be directed toward raising the $2600 mission budget in full.

Immanuel church, in the newer residence and factory district of Quincy, Harold S. Lucas, pastor, is in a most flourishing condition. The members have been granted a letter of dismissal from the Central church and are taking steps to incorporate as a separate body. With a membership of 116, they are having an average Bible school attendance of 160, winning the Musselman cup last year for the largest average attendance among the schools of Quincy. All departments of the church have been organized and services are well attended.

The work at Barry is moving with a swing under the leadership of Rev. T. Elmer Jones. The church is out of debt and has made some improvements on its building. A pre-Easter revival is in progress.

Rev. Alex Jones holds services once a month at Hull and Timewell, both churches have good Sunday schools.

Rev. J. Brainard Brown reports the Clayton church in good condition financially and spiritually. Pastor and people are exercising supervision over Keller-ville and Pea Ridge churches, which are pastorless.

Griggsville is pastorless and the outlook is not so encouraging, but it holds Sunday school and missionary meetings. Mt. Sterling, also pastorless, is planning pre-Easter meetings and keeping up the work in other departments. Plainville, Kinderhook, Pittsfield and Pleasant View are also pastorless, but have good Bible schools. These churches are hoping for increased attendance with the return of better roads and weather.

Rock Springs, Wyo., After Fifteen Years

By J. F. BLODGETT

WHILE we are not in the orange section of California, there are some orange trees in Santa Rosa, loaded with edible oranges, the flavor of which I proved today. On the evening of the twelfth of February I left this land of the walnut, prune, pear, peach, orange, apple, green hills and valleys, with the grass already six or eight inches high, and violets, daffodils and many other flowers in full bloom, and struck a beeline east for Rock Springs, Wyo. When I looked out upon the morning at Truckee, scarcely more than 200 miles on my journey, the whole earth was covered with glorious snow, and a team of Arctic huskies, harnessed to a sled, awaited the arrival of the train. What other state can boast such contrasts?

It was a great pleasure to return for a few days to the state of Wyoming where ten years of my life were spent on the home mission frontier. The occasion was the celebration of the fifteenth anniversary of the organization of the Baptist church at Rock Springs, Steven D. Pyle, pastor. Friday night, Feb. 12, there was a banquet, with orchestra, flowers, chicken, history, letters from former pastors and state workers; speeches, jokes, jubilation. The celebration was continued over the following Sunday, and I was glad to stay, and to preach at the closing service Sunday night. Rev. J. C. Clark of Emerson, Iowa, pastor when the church was built in 1913, spoke most ably and acceptably at the morning hour.

Rock Springs is one of the places where men are trying to get out some of the 19,000 square miles of coal stores in the state of Wyoming. This industry has built up a city of eight or ten thousand people made up of some two score nationalities. In 1911 the Home Mission Society and state convention, represented by Rev. Hal Fudge, then state secretary, and Rev. Mr. Howell, state field worker, organized a church in Rock springs. Was the organizing of a church justifiable? Have the investments in life and treasure by secretaries, missionaries, pastors, members, home and state mission boards been good investments? It would seem so from results. In this hard frontier field this astonishing thing has been done: In fifteen years our work has grown in equipment from nothing to a serviceable though inadequate plant, all paid for; offerings for local expenses from nothing, through a period of dependence on the boards to an assumption of self-support at a salary of $3000 per year and $100 toward auto upkeep; in missionary giving from nothing to an annual budget of $1000. All honor to all men, women and agencies that have contributed to the above glories and triumphs. By no means the least among them is the present unassuming and able pastor, Steve Pyle, who, denied because of health the opportunities of service on the foreign field, turned his great talents and heart to the service of God in this last home mission frontier in the far West.

With the Board of Missionary Cooperation

Here Are the Facts

THERE have been some requests from local churches for a simplified statement of the exact status of payments on our unified missionary budget for the current year. The necessary interval between collection and remittance of money from donation sources (reports being rendered monthly by the various state offices) has the result that our statements refer to an actual condition that existed about one month earlier than the date of publication. In the present instance the record of accounts is summarized as of Jan. 31, 1926. Here are the facts:

For the fiscal year 1925-26:

We pledged ourselves to pay $5,360,000. That is the total amount of missionary funds for which the churches are responsible.

To Feb. 1, we had paid $2,686,029. Remember that this is a nine months' record.

Leaving a balance of $2,673,971. Which we have until April 30, to pay.

That is to say, at the close of the first month of the present calendar year, we had received on the unified budget from donation sources $2,686,029, being about two-thirds of the amount actually due from those sources at that time, and about 50.1 per cent of the budget for the fiscal year. This left exactly three months in which to raise substantially half of the budget for the entire year, which is due to be paid in full on April 30, 1926. The year's budget, previously and frequently announced, is $5,360,000, which fixes the amount to be collected between now and the first of May at $2,673,971.

On Jan. 31 last year we were still further behind. Instead of having 49.9 per cent of the budget to raise, as we have this year, we had then ahead of us a sum equaling 57.7 per cent of last year's budget. Our present situation is somewhat better, but it is easy to see that we cannot win in a walk. There will have to be serious and sustained effort on the part of a good many Baptists before we can sound the trumpets of victory.

As a matter of fact, the entire situation hinges upon the local churches. By April 30, each church in the convention, according to whether or not it has paid its missionary quota in full, will have shown in effect the degree of its interest in Baptist missions.

Practically every church in the Northern Convention has, or should have, some definite missionary goal, whether it is a quota suggested by the state convention office and approved by the local church, or an amount adopted by the church itself as its objective. On the sum total of all of these local church missionary goals, our unified budget for missionary work is based. It becomes apparent therefore that if each Baptist church will fix its attention during the weeks which remain between now and April 30 upon the gathering and sending in of its own individual missionary quota and will resolutely refuse to accept failure in this task, our missions will be safe. And all honor to the churches who over-subscribe their quotas, for they will make possible future growth and expansion.

Dr. W. H. Bowler, the executive secretary, has spent most of February on a journey of varied activities and magnificent distances. He has attended many conferences and reports encouraging activity in every state visited. This trip took Doctor Bowler to the Pacific coast, but then he goes from the Atlantic to the Pacific with such frequency that he is no stranger on either shore. Probably no man in the denomination comes nearer to being a trans-continental commuter—literally so, for Doctor Bowler lives in Jamaica, on Long Island and when he starts from Seattle or San Francisco for home he not only goes clear to the Atlantic coast but a little beyond. Conditions since the establishment of the Board of Missionary Cooperation have been such as to require an extraordinary amount of travel on the part of the executive secretary. Fortunately Doctor Bowler is one of those who can travel without excessive fatigue. When he gets back to New York after a little jaunt of two or three thousand miles he generally rests just long enough to hang up his coat and hat and then plunges into such relaxations as correspondence and committee meetings.

Reports from church officers in places where Doctor Brougher has spoken are unanimously favorable. Imagine a degree of interest which compelled Milwaukee Baptists to abandon the idea of having Doctor Brougher speak in a church and to engage instead the auditorium, the building in which the Northern Baptist Convention met two years ago. In that vast and admirable hall, which no delegate to the 1924 convention will ever forget, Doctor Brougher spoke to an audience of such numbers as justified the local committee in making the arrangement.

In some states follow-up campaigns are being organized to carry the message and inspiration of the Brougher meetings to sections remote from the cities which Doctor Brougher visits. In those cities themselves the results have been quite remarkable. The secretary of one important city association writes: "For your information and cheer let me tell you our people are taking hold of the budget in a great way. A marvelous change has taken place in the last two months and instead of knocking there is boosting; instead of apathy, real enthusiasm. We are going over the top in every church save perhaps one, and I intend doing my best to have that one come up."

churches of California. The members of these bands agree to pray at a certain time every day for the success of Doctor Brougher's campaign and the whole denominational cause.

Mrs. Robinson, who is carrying on field work in the western states tells us that at the headquarters of the Northern California Convention they have instituted a daily prayer service from 11:45 until noon. Using the Book of Remembrance to guide their thoughts and petitions, the entire staff joins in prayer for kingdom interests. Pastors and lay workers drop in whenever possible to take part in the service.

Secretary Shanks wrote last month that Idaho Baptists had been checking up on receipts to Jan. 15, and found that they had approximately their one-twelfth for the month. "We were within about $600 of being paid up to date at the end of six months," he adds, "and have not fallen behind more than $200 since. This is going to make it comparatively easy for us to complete our state quota by April 30. In fact, I believe that we will go more than $1000 over our quota and that without any high pressure drive at the end of the year. This will put us in splendid shape for starting next year on the basis of one-twelfth of our quota each month."

With half our budget to be raised in three months, February saw the speeding up of work in most states. Methods at once practical and simplified are in favor this year, as witness the single checking-up meeting proposed for the evening of April 7, in order that all churches may at one and the same time contemplate their record of missionary contributions and to make special arrangements, if necessary, to insure the fulfillment of quota obligations before April 30. Some secretaries are organizing special campaigns of their own to help achieve the desired result. In Rhode Island Secretary Reid is planning, through mobilization of his state, to secure the full quota by the end of April. He is calling the special effort an "Easter victory campaign" and its immediate object is to get eleven-twelfths of the state missionary quota paid in by Easter Sunday. For this purpose the state has been divided into twelve districts with the churches grouped according to proximity. Each district has a committee including a key pastor, a layman, a laywoman and a young person, and there is also a central committee which will head up the work for the entire state. Conferences have already been held with the district committees about getting the local churches to pledge their cooperation to the movement. An effort will be made to get the latter to analyze their local budgets for current expenses in the same thoroughgoing manner in which the missionary budgets and apportionments are presented. The campaign will be advanced by men's and women's mass meetings; by the distribution of missionary literature; by stereopticon lectures on missionary subjects; by an influx of home and foreign missionaries and missionary secretaries into the state during March and April; by the presentation of religious pageants; by an every-member visitation, Mar. 28 to Apr. 4; and by the self denial offering on Easter Sunday. The committee plans to create the missionary atmosphere by publishing articles on Baptist mission work in the local newspapers, and they have written in to the Board of Missionary Cooperation for material for this purpose. This seems to be a splendidly worked out campaign, and we shall be greatly surprised if it is not an immense success. We outline it here in the hope that it will offer suggestions to other state officers who are planning to put on an intensive effort during the closing months.

A Brooklyn pastor came into the stereopticon office in New York a few days ago and asked: "Are my slides ready?" They were and soon he con-

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, 2320 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

"Tonight we are going to read you a letter from a good friend of THE BAPTIST. He is the chaplain of a large penitentiary in a northern state. You will be interested in what he has to say. Here it is:

"Dear field editor: I had a survey made for you in January. But when it was completed I thought there might be some mistake, so I had my clerks go into it again to make sure of the facts. They did and I was more surprised than ever. But it is now correct to Feb. 15, 1926. Of course the prisoners are going and coming so that the daily check varies.

"There are some good colored Baptists here. They greatly outnumber the white ones. These colored people are loyal to their faith. Most of them can read THE BAPTIST. I could not believe that there were so many colored Baptists here, hence the second survey. This is how it stands today:

"White prisoners listed as Baptists, 40. Negroes listed as Baptists, 456. These colored people will appreciate THE BAPTIST more than the white prisoners.

"The Roman Catholics are about 49 per cent of this prison's population. Baptists take the second place numerically and the Methodists stand third.

"There are 136 white Methodist prisoners and 347 colored members of that faith. Not a Methodist Advocate or piece of Methodist literature comes into this prison to any of these people that I know of. But I went after the Methodists and told them what THE BAPTIST was doing for the Baptist prisoners, both white and black, and now they are going to send me 100 copies of the Classmate, a Sunday-school paper. These we will use weekly for our prison Sunday school composed of prisoners of all denominational faiths.

"I wish to compliment you for what you are doing for your people here. I will help you all I can to place the papers carefully."

"About this time of the year every normal person is poring over seed catalogs and planting imaginary gardens and flowerbeds with finest seeds. The lure of the out-of-doors is getting into our blood. Some of us will plant honest-to-goodness gardens. What a joy to turn the moist earth and plant the seeds and bulbs! And then to watch them grow. Oh, joy!

"But tonight as we are sitting around the family hearth, why not try visualizing these hundreds of prisoners that fill our reformatories for whom there will be no garden, no planting, no springtime. Just the same routine winter and summer.

"These 496 prisoners in one institution, listed as Baptists, make up the soil for one of our gardens. Already through the kindness of friends, sixty-eight of them are now receiving THE BAPTIST every week. If you would plant some seeds in this fertile soil, $2 will send the paper to a prisoner for a year. THE BAPTIST now goes to many penitentiaries. What is being done for the prisoners in the penitentiaries of your state?

"B. E. Williamson, Pastor First church, Waterloo, Iowa, peps us up with this: 'I am ashamed that the Waterloo Baptists are so poorly represented on the subscription list of THE BAPTIST. I told a group of Walnut Street Baptists the other day that I was more ashamed of them than of the First church people for we outnumber them in subscriptions about five to one, and that isn't saying much either. I am determined that the Waterloo postoffice shall handle more of THE BAPTIST than ever before. And here's my hand on it. We have a great journal under your editorship and we appreciate your service.'

"The office boy says that in his opinion the philosophy of that wonderful Pullman porter who died the other day after running for fifty-five years between Chicago and Denver, and who never was reported to his employers for failure in service, ought to be passed on to all our friends. It is very short and simple: 'Never argue with a fool: humor him.'

"WCOY signs off for tonight. Don't forget your garden seeds."

Duluth, more than 1,000 Baptists attending. Many others turned away unable to get in. St. Paul, municipal auditorium, more than 4,000 Baptists attending. Mankato, First Presbyterian church filled to capacity. About forty churches sending delegates. Some driving a distance of more than 100 miles. Austin, First church crowded to the utmost. More than a dozen Baptist churches represented by delegations. Minneapolis, First church taxed to full seating capacity for final date of Doctor Brougher's visit to Minnesota. At each meeting, the people enthusiastically voted to support Doctor Brougher by their prayers for continued physical strength and guidance during the remainder of his tour and to support the program and work of the N. B. C."

REV. I. W. BAILEY of Ottawa, Kan., after thirty-seven years of pastoral service, is retiring from regular pastoral work, but will supply and hold evangelistic meetings whenever called upon for such service.

FROM Nov. 1, to Feb. 1 the midweek service was in the hands of various groups from Irving Park church, Chicago, such as the board of deacons, the trustees, the deaconesses, the Sunday school board, the choir, the B. Y. P. U., the women's society, the mission circle, and certain adult classes. The plan was a decided success as judged by the increase in attendance and interest.

I'll Show You How to Make $3 AN HOUR in your SPARE TIME

You can make your spare time pay you $3 an hour profit. You can do as well as J. V. Davis, who cleared $5 in an evening; or, L. H. Green, who cleaned up $12 in an afternoon; or, Mrs. Edith Phillips, who made $53 in a week's spare time. The work is easy and pleasant. You don't have to invest any money. Experience is unnecessary, yet your profits will start your first day.

A Wonderful Money-Maker

We have recently brought out a household article that is needed in every home. It is CED-O-BAG, a moth-proof, germ-proof, dust-proof, damp-proof storage bag for clothes, blankets and furs. It takes the place of the costly cedar chest or the unsatisfactory paper bag. Its cost is so modest, its value so high, that women everywhere are buying on sight. That's why you will find it so easy to take orders and make money.

Big Profits for Easy Work

We want you to become the local representative for CED-O-BAG. All you have to do is visit your friends and neighbors, show a CED-O-BAG, take their orders, and send these orders to us. We deliver and collect. You get your profit on the spot and in cash. And for doing this pleasant work you can equal the earnings of O. E. Livingston, who made $4 in 30 minutes; or T. Williams, who made $9 in two hours; or Mrs. H. Smith, who made $7 in less than an hour. Perhaps you can do better.

Find Out NOW

It will soon be time for people to put away winter clothes, blankets and furs. That's when you will find it easiest to make money. Be ready for the harvest. Send me your name now. I will tell you all about this proposition. I will show you how you can make $3 an hour, or more, in your spare time. Mail coupon NOW for full details.

KINCAID, KAN., Sunday, Feb. 14, Rev. I. W. Bailey closed a seven years' pastorate. Nine have been baptized since the dedication of the new meeting house, Sept. 13, 1925, and there have been 103 additions mostly by baptism in the past seven years. This is a good church house, with auditorium, baptistry, two class rooms and a large basement. The retiring pastor leaves the church out of debt and money in all the treasuries. The church gave the pastor a purse containing $54, a farewell reception and a donation of many good things which the housewife enjoys. The retiring minister also had the privilege and pleasure of introducing his successor, Rev. F. G. Bailey, of Seminole, Okla.

REV. H. ROBINSON McKEE, pastor of the First church, Keokuk, Iowa, has resigned to accept a call to the First church, Everett, Wash., the resignation to take effect July 1. This will practically complete three years of service with the highly successful Keokuk church. Everett is a city of over 30,000 situated on the Puget Sound.

Increased Facilities for Training of Nurses

WITH the opening of the beautiful new Midway Hospital, Mounds School of Nursing begins a new role in its service of nurse training.

Not only will it carry on with its present curriculum of training, allowing for specialization in each hospital, but it will now place at the disposal of its students the most modern of medical facilities coupled with the pleasure of training in a new building.

Graduates eligible to State Board Examinations and registration for service at home and abroad. Capable faculty and excellent environments. Fall classes are enrolling now. A catalogue will be sent on request.

MONDAY EVENING, FEB. 22, the First church, Sanford, Me., gave a reception to the pastor and his wife, Rev. and Mrs. Irad B. Hardy, in recognition of the tenth anniversary of the present pastorate. Several organized classes of the Sunday school had charge of the event in which a large number participated, furnishing a most unique and pleasing program of entertainment followed by delicious refreshments. Pastors of the other churches of the town spoke in joyous and congratulatory vein. A specially constructed metal purse manufactured for the occasion and beautifully engraved, filled with a generous sum of money, was presented to Mr. Hardy, and a huge cake, appropriately decorated, was given to Mrs. Hardy, both tokens of esteem and in honor of her birthday. This church has reached a place in benevolent giving where it is exceeded by only three Baptist churches in the entire state.

PASTOR C. B. MILLER began his second year at City Park church, Denver, Feb. 14. Within the year the Sunday school has gained 25 per cent; 100 have been added to the church; property worth $8500 has been added to the educational plant and the church is preparing to build a house costing $100,000.

OREGON BAPTIST PASTORS in conference last month declared for the Keystone graded series, for prohibition and the enforcement of the law, for the Foreign Mission Society, for the work of gospel team for the laymen's organization and for the "Win One" plan of evangelism.

PASTORS OF THE several denominations in Parsons, Pa., cooperate cordially in many of the usual methods, but one item is unique. The three pastors undertook systematic visitation in which they call together on each family. The results were highly encouraging and fruitful.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH building at Parsons, Pa., was destroyed by fire Feb. 4, 1926. On Jan. 31, 1926, a new building was dedicated. It is one of the most beautiful buildings in the Wyoming valley. Rev. Grover C. Walters is pastor.

REV. GORDON H. BAKER has resigned from the First church of Schenectady, N.Y., after a pastorate of six years to accept a call to the Washington Heights church in New York City. Mr. Baker will close his work at Schenectady on Sunday, Apr. 4 and will begin his work in New York on April 11.

STATEMENT WAS MADE in the issue of Feb. 20, page 92, that: "Churches in Iowa are passing resolutions against any attempt on the part of the general organizations of the denomination to fix standards of ministerial ordination or standing, hold that these are matters entirely within the competence of the local churches." For later information received it appears that only a few churches in Iowa have taken or will take such action.

New Books

The Star Promise, by Margaret E. Burton. New York: Woman's Press. $1.50.

A book designed to enrich the faith and assurance of those who believe in personal immortality. It consists of many brief chapters any one of which may be read in sixty seconds but each containing suggestions of great value to those who feel the loneliness and pain of bereavement. It is one of the very best books of the kind that it has been our good fortune to read. We know of no more fitting gift for friends who are endeavoring to adjust themselves to the difficult situation that the death of a loved one precipitates.

—JOHN A. EARL.

The Open Gate to Prayer, by Mabel N. Thurston. New York: Fleming H. Revell. In ten short studies Mabel N. Thurston has given to the public a message on that inner experience of the religious life called prayer. The book is a commentary on the Lord's Prayer and is so arranged that it may be used as the text for a Sunday-school class or for a mission-study class. The author has taken high ground in her approach to prayer, and the sweet reasonableness of her treatment of this difficult subject will appeal to all who believe that prayer and common sense are not incompatible.

—JOHN A. EARL.

How Shall Country Youth Be Served? by H. Paul Douglass. New York: George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

This is a highly valuable piece of research work conducted under the auspices of the Institute of Social and Religious research. It presents the results of careful surveys of fifty-three counties distributed throughout the United States as to give a true cross-section of the rural life of the nation. What actually is being done for the rural youth of the republic? What agencies either national or indigenous are in operation? What degree of effectiveness do they exhibit? What hindrances and mistakes appear? How far does it appear practicable to undertake a comprehensive and standardized rural youth program? Are present agencies and methods of co-operation adequate if utilized to their capacity? But there is no end to the questions one would like to ask, and as far as answers are now possible they are indicated in this book. Everybody who has any responsibility for rural community leadership ought to possess and study it.

—U. M. MCGUIRE.

Cosmic Evolution, by John Eloh Boodin. New York: Macmillan. $3.50.

Cosmic evolution is a term used to designate the interactions of the universe as we now know it. The microscope, telescope, spectrum analysis and the revelations of inductive science have created a new conception of the cosmos.

The author feels that Darwin's theory of organic evolution, being organo-centric, is wholly inadequate. Later theories, such as Bergson's "Creative Evolution" are frankly geocentric. Boodin swings away from individual and species, away from the earth and the solar system, and builds up his theory of evolution based on "energy patterns" in the vast cosmic continuum. It is frankly theistic and diametrically opposed to scientific materialism. "Cosmic interaction" is the keyword. Whatever unfolds on this planet is the legitimate expression of cosmic energy released by proper combination of cosmic elements. Nothing is left to chance. God is the creative and guiding genius of the cosmos. Materialistic mechanical causation gives way to cosmic reality unfolding in rhythmic harmony. There is no chaos, no night, no abysmal void destitute of God. Cosmic evolution is conscious in its timeless ebb and flow—ruling out all blind chance. All life is a cosmic unity symphonic in its harmony. The book is a masterly work of a virile creative imagination. It closes with a chapter on cosmic religion.

—G. CLIFFORD CRESS.

Man's Fairest Hope, by L. L. Gwaltney. S. S. Board of the Southern Baptist Convention, Nashville. 75 cents.

A stimulating little volume on immortality. The author makes his appeal to reason and ethnic faiths as part proof of the belief. He then gives the reader a cursory glimpse into the Old Testament and the New and fortifies the rational basis for life beyond the grave by using revelation and the resurrection of our Lord. The writer makes no attempt to stir the emotions as so many do in treating this subject, but clearly and coolly presents the matter on a few pages (123 in all) in a concise manner, yet one's faith in immortality is strengthened by reading it.

The Task in Japan, by August Karl Reichauer, D.D. New York: Revell. $1.50.

In these days when emphasis on missionary work is changing so rapidly, it is a delight to read a book such as this, written by a scholar and Christian worker after twenty years of first-hand study and experience on the fields of the Orient. The first two and the last chapters of the book are most instructive regarding the actual situation in Japan at the present time. The chapter on "Motives, Aims, and Attitudes," should be presented to every church—it presents the need for a somewhat different appeal for missions. For a short resume and comparison of the native religions of the Orient, and Japan in particular, chapters three and four are not easily excelled. The native religions are discussed intelligently and in a manner that will give those religions all their strong characteristics. Especially helpful is chapter five on "The Newer Naturalism" which traces the growth and development of naturalism in the Orient and the way in which Japan has taken it over. All this leads to the presentation of "The Task in Japan." It is not the need of "more ecclesiastical machinery" but of enlarging the appropriations to the budgets for higher education in Japan plus that of real personal evangelism on the part of those who have learned to be real brothers and sisters to men and women of another nation or another race.

The Saving Sense

Bluster: "Do you mean to say that I am a liar?"

In his "Lincoln" Carl Sandburg quotes this letter which Abraham Lincoln wrote in reply to one from a New York firm questioning him concerning the financial standing of a Springfield man: "Yours of the 10th received. First of all, he has a wife and a baby; together they ought to be worth $500,000 to any man. Secondly, he has an office in which there is a table worth $1.50 and three chairs worth, say $1. Last of all, there is in one corner a large rat hole which will bear looking into.

Respectfully,

"A. LINCOLN."

Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Jones, coming from opposite directions met in the middle of a street-car track. Neither noticed that a car was coming. Neither did they notice it when it stopped and the conductor rang the bell. The passengers thrust their heads out of the window to see what was the matter, but the women talked on. Finally the motor-man opened the window and said, "Pardon me, ladies, but shall I get you a couple of chairs?"

What would the joke-smiths do without the bride in the butcher shop—although she really is not there very often in these modern days—or, rather, not many of them are there very often. Out of this week's gleanings one of them asks for a roast of beef "with lots of gravy, please!" and another one for mince-meat in which "the mince is nice and tender."

Tony was having his second son christened and, being very anxious to have his name recorded correctly on the birth certificate, remarked to the clergyman: "Will yo pleeze nama by babe same as I giva ya?" "Tony, why do you make such a request?" asked the clergyman. "Wella, ya see—itsa lika dis. My firsta boy I tella ya I wanta heem chris'nd 'Tom' and ya putta 'Tomass' on heesa paper. Now, I wanta dis boy nama 'Jack' and no wanta heem nama 'Jackass.'"—The Churchman.

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for March 21

JESUS DIES AND RISES FROM THE DEAD

Lesson Text: John 18:1—20:23. Golden Text: John 10:17
Crucifixion

Far back in the shadows of history some tyrant with terrible inventive genius put two pieces of stout timber across each other and nailed the first victim to the beams where he died in slow torture. Rome inherited the cross and used it for the execution of particular criminals. How the cross has come to be the supreme symbol of the Christian religion when it was originally the instrument of capital punishment is as much a problem to many people as it would be to make the hangman's rope the outstanding symbol of marriage. But this is what we call "Love's Paradox." When Jesus was crucified sin in all its ugly forms reached its deepest depths; but Love went deeper. Hard-boiled soldiers nailed Jesus to the cross; but Love forgave them. Thieves railed upon the Lord; but Love said, "Today shalt thou be with me in Paradise." Love went through the unspeakable experience of the miscarriage of justice, the cruel flogging, the heartless mockery, the devil's taunting, the excruciating agony without the loss of a single ounce of the energy of a steadfast will bent upon creating fellowship. It took the ugliness of the cross to bring out the beauty of Love. The offering up of Isaac by Abraham was part of a barbarous custom which had inherited from his ancestors; but out of that indefensible practice came the wonderful story of sacrificial Love in the twenty-second chapter of Genesis. Man is now beginning to question the wisdom and justice of the world war so far as either side of the controversy was concerned; but in the blood of that holocaust are written imperishable stories of human heroism and sacrifice. So we honor the cross as an instrument of cruelty, but we glory in it as the supreme symbol of Love.

Resurrection

Love like that cannot die. Physical Jesus died after long hours of torture and his body was taken down from the cross and buried. But Love was never buried. Love never dies. Jesus went with the penitent thief into Paradise, he had said, and on the third day came back to his disciples in his body which in the meantime had passed through a spiritual metamorphosis. He stayed with them forty days, giving abundant evidence that he was alive and that the cross which had been intended by his enemies to put an end to his career was only a step in the invincible progress of redeeming Love. His coming back was the rebirth of hope in the hearts of his disciples. From that day forth the justification of Christianity needed no defense save the defense of releasing the living Spirit of Christ to work out the purposes of God in the world through men and institutions imbued with the character and passion of the service of him who fully incarnated the Life and Love.

Many will remember that at the Seattle Convention Rev. L. W. Hattersley of Burma gave an interesting lecture entitled "The Challenge of a Difficult Task" or "Winning the Burmese people to Christ." This lecture is now ready for distribution to any church that desires it through the stereopticon department, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City. It may also be secured at the depositories in Topeka, Philadelphia, Providence, Des Moines and Chicago. Mr. Hattersley is in Southern California and is available to give lectures.

A special committee appointed by the executive board of the Arizona State Convention to consider resignation of Dr. E. Q. Morton as secretary of the convention expresses not only its own appreciation of Doctor Morton, but also the denomination in Arizona. It says that during these past six years, he has exhibited an outstanding denominational quality. His interest for the local work in Arizona, though of intense character, never overbalanced his interest in worldwide missions. One member of this committee who had the honor of being Doctor Morton's pastor, expresses his personal joy in the fine cooperation and spirit of fellowship during his stay in Phoenix. Doctor Morton proved himself to be a first-class layman as a church member, entering into the local church program with a splendid influence. Doctor Morton's work in Arizona will always be a high credit to him, and the honors recently conferred upon him are fairly won. The committee consisted of Rev. Richard E. Day, Phoenix; Rev. Richard S. Beal, Tucson, and Miss Mira Barden, Mesa.

Representative Fred A. Britten of Illinois wants the congress of the United States to investigate the Anti-Saloon league. He thinks that it is guilty of the following demerits from infirmity to censure: Raised and expended large sums of money, the amounts, sources, and expenditure of which have not been made public; the name "Anti-Saloon league" itself is fraudulent and misleading; large sums of money have been used to influence public opinion, directly to control elections, and to pay professional organizers and lobbyists; it paid the campaign expenses of former Representative Volstead; it has "attempted to influence federal judicial appointments; denounced judicial officers and departments; has attempted to influence the president of the United States in his appointments of heads of departments; exercised its insidious influence successfully upon the bureau of internal revenue of the treasury department to the extent that appointments of persons under the prohibition commissioner have been made only with the sanction and approval of said league; high officials of the organization have been sent to state penitentiaries for collecting large sums of money under false pretenses; it has been shown that a justice of a state supreme court and an attorney general of a state have been on the pay roll of the Anti-Saloon league." If the people wish to spend money for such things, the league may well invite the application of such tests to both itself and the friends of the liquor business. Why exempt bootlegging from inquiry?

Miss Augusta Geisenhener, Ottawa University '12, who has for ten years been a missionary in Gauhati, Assam, India, recently had an adventure. She received word that a native was sick and in desperate need, and being the only responsible person in the mission, she planned the trip across the hills without a guide. The trip in itself was dangerous, but especially so to one not a native of the country. She found the sick person, tied him on her own horse and brought him back to a place where assistance was available.

Whether the United States will actually enter the world court depends now upon the approval by the other adhering nations of the reservations prescribed by the senate as follows: 1. Adherence shall not involve any legal relation of the United States to the League of Nations or assumption of any obligations by the United States under the treaty of Versailles. 2. The United States shall be permitted to participate, through representatives designated for the purpose, and on an equality with the other state members of the council and assembly of the League of Nations, in any and all proceedings of either the council or the assembly for the election of judges or deputy judges of the court. 3. The United States will pay a fair share of the expenses of the court, as appropriated from time to time by congress. 4. The United States may at any time withdraw its adherence to the protocol. 5. The statute providing for the court shall not be amended without the consent of the United States. 6. The court shall not render any advisory opinion, except publicly after due notice to all states adhering to the court and to all interested states, and after public hearing given to any state concerned; nor shall it without the consent of the United States entertain any request for an advisory opinion touching any question in which the United States claims an interest. 7. Recourse to the court for settlement of differences between the United States and any other state or states can be had only by agreement through special treaties between the parties in dispute. 8. Adherence shall not be so construed as to require the United States to depart from its traditional policy of not "intruding upon, interfering with or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign state;" nor shall adherence be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of "its traditional attitude toward purely American questions".

The Soul of a Stradivarius

INTO the instrument went a part of the soul of its maker—and it remained. With every touch of the bow it speaks convincing evidence of a master's permanent mark of mastery. Each Kilgen organ embodies, likewise, a musical soul. It comes from the minds of master craftsmen, whose souls vibrate to the instruments which they create. When a Strad. or a Kilgen speaks, the human heart must listen and the soul respond. Age glorifies the golden tone of a Kilgen, its eroding hand does not soon destroy the worthy work of conscientious builders. A Kilgen is more than pipes and keys.

Kilgen organ architects have designed impressive instruments for many Baptist churches. They will be glad to give you the benefit of their experience. Write to Dept. A.

Crowded Out !

Not an Artist's Fancy. Just a Missionary Fact to Make Baptists Think—and Act

"The church is so crowded that all the church members have given up their seats to the unconverted. Chapel only holds two hundred; five or six hundred at church on Sunday evenings."

Place—Santurce, Porto Rico; time—now, every Sunday. Reported by Miss Lydia Huber to the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society.

FORTY-EIGHT BAPTIST CHURCHES IN PORTO RICO

They had 14,000 members a year ago. Probably 15,000 now. Sunday schools have outgrown all available quarters in Santurce and classes meet in neighbors' gardens. "Always writing for chairs—more chairs." Well, shall these Porto Rico Baptists have more chairs—and churches to put them in?

The way your church fulfills its missionary obligations between now and April 30th will tell the story.

In India, Burma and Ceylon today there are over 5700 missionaries, of whom 2700 are British and about an equal number American. In Egypt there are 354 missionaries, of whom 236 are American and 102 are British. In the Sudan there are eighty Protestant missionaries, of whom thirty-five are American and thirty-two are British. In the rest of British territory in Africa there are nearly 4000 Protestant missionaries, of whom over 2000 are British and 664 American.

To the Commonweal credit goes for a discriminating study of "Nationalism as a Religion" by Carlton J. H. Hayes. His discussion opens a wide range of vital questions. Is nationalism a religion? Is it sentimental, emotional, inspirational? Has it a god of its own? Does it demand worship? Does it claim a right to command the conscience of the citizen? What is the meaning of a national flag in a church? The subject is alluring. It opens anew and in a new aspect the whole question of the relations of church and state.

With reference to the recent Denver Post referendum on the prohibition question the state board of the Anti-Saloon league, through Rev. A. H. C. Morse, its vice-chairman writes: "During the eight days of the referendum, the Post printed a total of 1,350,000 ballots. Of these, 100,000 were filled out and returned to the Post. Over 11,000 of these ballots came from outside the state. On these returns the wine and beer advocates won by a ratio of five to one. There was no safeguarding the ballot. The wets voted freely and often. The dry forces in large measure refused to vote. The result in no sense revealed the honest opinion of the people of Denver and Colorado on the prohibition question.

Race Relations Sunday in Chicago promoted by the commission on interracial relations of Chicago Church Federation showed an increase in both the number of white and negro churches participating this year, as well as in the intensiveness of the program. Speakers at church services advised that the attendance was larger than usual and that a sympathetic attitude prevailed in all of the congregations involved. The thought uppermost in the addresses of the day was that the task of developing interracial fellowship is primarily one that belongs to the Christian church. That the increase in the number of churches in Chicago participating this year was from twenty-two churches in 1925 to fifty-six churches in 1926, is also an evidence of the realization on the part of the churches that the task is primarily theirs.

From stations as far apart and as suggestive of orthodox moisture as Iowa Falls, Iowa, and Ocean Park, Me., come requests for a directory of Baptist churches broadcasting the services. If such churches will supply the information THE BAPTIST will be glad to comply with these requests. Announcement of subjects should reach this office not less than two weeks before the broadcasting is to be done.

General Baptists in their fifty-fifth annual meeting at Piggott, Ark., set themselves to stand by the prohibition amendment and the Volstead law and to array their whole constituency against any candidate for public office who will not pledge himself to the enforcement of the law. They also denounced the use of tobacco, and the use of Sunday for movies, public bathing, indecent dressing, baseball, "auto joy riding" and the transaction of business.

Women of Mississippi are going about to teach the men of that commonwealth an elementary lesson in real chivalry. Lindsay Coleman, a negro, tried by a white jury for murder, was acquitted and set free, whereupon a mob jauntily caught him and lynched him. This roused the league of women voters of Coahoma county. They denounced the lynching as "high-handed murder," and began to stir up public sentiment. Coincidentally, "Mississippi is aroused as she never was before in all her history. The grand jury is busy. Whatever happens to the members of the mob, Mississippi seems to be on the point of joining the family of states in which lynching is no longer a respectable entertainment.

From a highly influential source comes an expression of the reaction in the thinking of Free Baptists to the proposed amendment to the by-laws of the Northern Baptist Convention to fix a standard definition of a Baptist church. It recites that the negotiations for union with the Northern Baptist missionary organizations continued through more than seven years; that the very question raised by the proposed amendment was thoroughly canvassed; that the Free Baptists stood and were accepted on the principle of the right of the local church to settle for itself the conditions of membership; that upon that understanding they turned over valuable properties and property rights; that the proposed amendment if adopted would be in "violation of a contract;" and that "feelings would be hurt, injustices would result, disquietude and even bitterness would follow, where hitherto friendliness, fellowship and the spirit of brotherhood have prevailed."

Lenten noonday services will be held this year as last year in Chicago in the Chicago Temple, March 22-April 2. On Good Friday the services will continue from twelve to three o'clock and will be addressed by the following pastors: Ernest F. Tittle, Peter W. Philpott, Roy Ewing Vale, Simon P. Long, Charles W. Gilkey, Gilbert Wilson and Joshua Stansfield. Last year about 1000 people were unable to gain admission and the service is so extended in order to accommodate the crowds in relays.

Under the leadership of the student group of Northwestern University, the young people's societies of Evanston, Ill., formed a representative committee to work out an experimental program on the question: "What is your aim in life?" Students from various denominations undertook a wide survey of student and adult leaders—from Al Jolson down—to discover, if possible, a guide to their own thinking. At the sessions when the answers were presented and discussed, students who had been well outside the reach of these organizations attended and some of them, asked to speak on the way they were working to realize their professed aims, declared that for the first time they were brought face to face with the inadequacy of their own living.

New word comes from Europe of mass movements of Catholics toward Protestantism. Hundreds of thousands of Ukrainians in particular are calling on European and American evangelical churches for training and reception into membership. Especially striking are the developments in Galicia, now a province of Poland. A year ago the first word came to the United States of a religious awakening among the Ukrainians of Galicia. It had its beginning among professors and students in universities, but thousands of the common people quickly surrendered to its influences. Still more notable has been this year's revival among the Ukrainians formerly living in the Ukraine republic, but since its downfall five years ago, resident in Czechoslovakia. In the city of Pilzen, where five years ago fewer than 500 Protestants were to be found, a vast throng heard evangelical pastors last July 6, anniversary of the martyrdom of John Hus preaching to the people. Next day the pope severed diplomatic relations with Czechoslovakia. "This means 10,000 recruits to Protestantism," prophesied one of the Protestant leaders. The outcome was in fact even more startling. By August 23, it was reported: "Not 10,000 but 80,000 people in Czechoslovakia have renounced Romanism since July 7, and are now waiting at the doors of our evangelical churches."—The Continent.

It is believed that the total of all gifts to religion, made by the American people in 1925, will reach nearly, if not quite, $700,000,000. Of the Protestant bodies, Methodists are far ahead. Their gifts in 1925, North and South together, in round figures, were $135,000,000. Baptist gifts were $70,000,000, Presbyterian $72,500,000, Episcopal $39,000,000, Congregationalist $26,500,000, Disciples of Christ $20,600,000, Jews $18,500,000 and Catholics $168,000,000.

S. V. Beloussoff, born Sept. 20, 1882, in Tiflis (Transcaucasian) was the son of a smith. The boy aided his father at the forge and studied in a German school in Tiflis until fourteen years old. Afterwards he worked on the railway. Baptized in 1904, when twenty-two years old, S. V. Beloussoff became a leader in young people's work. He wrote many articles in Baptist magazines, and in 1922 he became an ordained preacher in the Baptist church in Tiflis. In 1923 he was chosen as pastor of that church and in the following year was elected by the Baptist union of the U. S. S. R. as editor of the Baptist. This unresting worker last year developed tuberculosis, from which he died on Oct. 10, 1925, at the age of forty-three.

Concerning both the legality and the ethics of the "entrapment" of bootleggers by prohibition detectives, the department of research of the Federal Council of Churches has secured "from high and unprejudiced legal authority" the following statement: "This branch of the law is well settled. The courts will not allow officers or detectives to lure persons into the commission of crime, and if it appears that the defendant would not have committed the crime without which he is charged except for the inducements or lures of the officers, such act will constitute a defense to the prosecution. On the other hand, where an officer of the law or a detective merely offers himself as a customer or member of a class of persons with whom the defendant is engaged in committing illegal acts, such action does not constitute entrapment."

It appears that no recent student gathering has so quickly eventuated in constructive action as the interdenominational student conference which met at Evanston, Illinois, during the Christmas holidays. A meeting of the continuation committee of that conference at Columbus, Ohio, brought together student reports from every section of the United States. As Evanston gave opportunity for a student evaluation of the church and the student's relationship to it, so the developments since the conference have been, for the most part, church-centered. Many significant projects which have grown from the Evanston conference relate definitely to the demand for church cooperation which has so persistently voiced there. And it is significant of the fact that students are ready to face their own responsibility relative to that problem that these projects have begun in the local young people's organizations.

It is estimated that the number of lepers in the world is at least two millions. Some experts estimate three millions. Accurate figures are impossible to obtain because in many places the disease is not recognized and thus evades the census takers, and in parts of Africa even the population is only an estimate. If the two million figure is correct, then at least one person out of every eight hundred of the earth's population is afflicted with this preventable disease.

The most significant feature of the work projected by the continuation committee of the interdenominational student conference is the fact that all of the work relates directly to the church and is being undertaken in the belief that a more effective relationship may be established between the church and its young people. Correspondence relative to this work may be directed, temporarily, to Interdenominational Student Conference, 150 Fifth avenue, New York, N. Y.

The new building of the divinity school of the University of Chicago will be dedicated April 5. It is expected at that time that addresses will be given by Prof. Gustav Krueger of the University of Giessen, Germany, and by Dr. T. R. Glover, of the University of Cambridge, England. The building has been erected and furnished at a cost of approximately $600,000. It contains a library with stack room and supplementary stack room capable of housing 200,000 volumes. The building contains the offices of administration, the offices of the various professors, and a large room for social purposes, also rooms for the exhibition of material showing various church activities, and for public speaking and pageantry.

As we go to press word comes of the passing away of Dr. J. Y. Aitchison. On the way to his office at the University of Chicago, he dropped dead on Monday morning, March 15.

Among the utterances of reformers one of the most sane and well-balanced was that in which the National Moving Picture Council, in its recent conference at Chicago, stated its program, as follows: "This conference recommends (1) that universities and educational foundations enter upon a term of scientific research in this field in the departments of social science, psychology and such others as they may see fit. (2) That eminent psychiatrists, social workers and specialists in children's ailments be urged to give unbiased consideration to the motion picture in relation to antisocial behavior in youth. (3) That until there is a sufficient accumulation of evidence of a scientific character to show that regulation of films for minors is undesirable, this conference declares itself as approving an adequate means of local, state, federal or international regulation of the motion picture industry."

Fifty Baptist churches in and about Waterloo, Iowa, sent delegations to the great mass meetings of Baptists, Sunday afternoon, Feb. 28, when Dr. J. Whitcomb Brouger of Los Angeles, delivered his "Play Ball" address. Sixteen hundred people crowded into the auditorium of the Walnut street church and more than two hundred were turned away. Doctor Brouger spoke for more than two hours. He made a profound impression and generated a mighty enthusiasm for the world-wide program of Northern Baptists. The churches will not forget the man or his message. The people responded with a unanimous vote expressing a wholehearted devotion to and support of the denominational program. Rev. R. E. Williamson, pastor of First church, Waterloo, was the local chairman of the committee on arrangements.

To keep our course of thinking steady it is useful to refer occasionally to the following statement issued by the last meeting of the Baptist World Alliance: "We desire to impress upon our Baptist brethren in every part of the world the importance of Baptist unity at the present time. Accepting the voluntary principle in religion and regarding the nature of Christianity as a spiritual relation between man and God, we inevitably take the same attitude on questions of faith and conduct as they arise within the churches. We hold fast to the freedom with which Christ has set us free, and this principle implies that we must be willing to love and to work with those who, agreeing with us on the main things and in loyalty to our distinctive Baptist principles, have their own personal convictions upon non-essentials. All Baptist organizations are formed on the voluntary principle. None of these possesses authority over any other. All enjoy equal rights and autonomy within the limits of their own purposes."

An interesting situation has arisen in Virginia. A bill was pending before the legislature to preserve "race integrity"—modern euphony for segregation. It would prohibit and nullify all marriages of whites with persons having any ascertainable admixture of negro or Indian blood of more recent date than 1619. The danger of corruption by Indian marriages in Virginia is impressive. But reason to pause in such legislation has been discovered. A Virginia historian is quoted as having expressed the belief that the passage of the bill would mean the classification as "colored" of at least a dozen members of the Virginia General Assembly, as well as not less than 20,000 of the most distinguished people in Virginia. And in the sable precincts there is an audible guffaw.

Upon the death of Professor Estes, the following statement was adopted by the faculty of Colgate Theological seminary, Mar. 2, 1926: "David Foster Estes was professor of New Testament interpretation in Colgate Theological seminary from 1891 to 1920. He was an accurate scholar, exact in his knowledge of the New Testament and devoted to its study. He was an inspiring teacher, encouraging those under his instruction to a high standard of scholarly attainment in New Testament study. He wrote much on New Testament and theological subjects, publishing a work on New Testament theology and many valuable articles in magazines and encyclopedias. He continually taught and exemplified the highest ideal of Christian character and life. His colleagues, the faculty of Colgate Theological seminary, wish to record their appreciation of the greatness of his contribution to theological education and their profound sorrow at his loss."

At the Columbus meeting of the continuation committee of the international student conference several commissions were proposed which will undertake immediately the promotion of certain projects. One of these commissions will start an investigation of the educational processes of the church, particularly as those processes relate to the broadcasting to students of information regarding the activity of the Christian church as a constructive agency in the present social order. Another commission is to study and help to launch certain projects relating to church cooperation. Various inter-church young people projects which have already been begun will be cleared through this commission. Another commission is to begin an immediate investigation of the religious leadership in student communities with particular reference to the methods by which the church is endeavoring to reach undergraduates. Another commission, which has already begun its work, is to study something of the current religious terminology in an effort to help bring about the rephrasing of religious expressions in more modern terms. Each of these commissions will consist of students with the advisory help of an expert in the particular field which the commission is to consider.

At the Aungbingle, Burma, association meeting, the boys and teachers from Kelly high school gave a Burmese interpretation of parts of "Pilgrim's Progress" to the entertainment and inspiration of all who listened. All who attended the association remarked on the enthusiastic spirit and genial cooperation which marked the whole three days. The subject, "Love Your Neighbor as Yourself" was printed on a blue banner and displayed across the front of the platform. Of the thirty-six items on the program, only seven were taken by missionaries. One of these was taken by Dr. S. E. Price of Ottawa, Kan., at the dedication of the new Atlantis hall at the girls' high school. The governor also paid a visit and gave a short greeting, commenting on the good work of the Baptist girls' schools of the province and especially this one at Mandalay. An incident of special interest was the baptism of four boys about 12 years old from one of the Mandalay centers called Myitha, on Jan. 3, the last day of the association.

Announcement by the Foreign Mission Board

THE board of managers of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society desires to make a further report of progress in fulfilling the recommendations of the investigating commission which reported at Seattle. The details of this matter have been placed in the hands of a committee of the board which has met each month and has worked between meetings through sub-committees.

The names of eight men were referred to us by the commission in a final communication with the recommendation that their theological views receive further study. At the meeting of the board of managers, Nov. 17, a statement was authorized to the effect that two of the eight missionaries in question had resigned, one had been called home for inquiry and conference, and the charges against another had been dismissed as the committee, after conference, discovered him to be loyal to Christ and the gospel.

Since this report the board has voted to call home another of the eight for personal conference, and after a careful review the views held by still another of the eight have been found satisfactory by the board.

The board is continuing the task of examining the views of the remaining members of the group of eight and would add that the apparent delay in submitting a complete and final report is due to the fact that the time required for communication with some of our far distant fields is considerable, especially on account of the disturbed political conditions in the Far East.

The Grand Lebanon, one of the four states of Syria, will be constituted a republic, according to a report received from Beirut. The commission appointed by the French high commissioner, Henri de Jouvenel, for the purpose of drafting the Lebanese constitution decided on the republican form of government. A parliament comprised of a senate and a chamber will conduct the affairs of the state. The chamber is to consist of forty-five deputies elected through the religious communities. Every 15,000 voters will elect one deputy. The cabinet will be responsible to the chamber.

Little was said in this paper concerning the anthracite strike. But the strike was doing its own talking, and the public was listening in. The Christian Register, reports what was gradually forming in the common thought: "We think the sentiment is being frozen into the consciousness of many persons that public control of the mining of coal is the only way to save ourselves. If some true leader of the Rooseveltian type, with a social passion, a consciousness of the violated rights of man, and a spiritual determination to destroy the hideous greed and overcome the industrial impotence, would devise a plan for public control or even public ownership it is our opinion he would find an overwhelming response that would sweep away all the rooted ideas of private property as they are related to coal. A few more such strikes will bring that growing perception to maturity."

History has a way of making curious comments on what humans say. For instance, here is what Prof. Franklin H. Giddings of Columbia university said sixteen years ago, four years before the war: "If I may venture an opinion as to the most important political question before the American people, it is this: Shall the chief and controlling means of production in the United States, including mineral and forest resources, water power sites, railroads and means of communication, patent rights, and the enormous funds of loanable capital, be owned by a billionaire four hundred, who, in virtue of such ownership, will be able for all practical purposes to own a hundred or more millions of us ordinary human beings; or shall we ordinary human beings, in our collective capacity, own the means of production ourselves, and proceed to work out the reality of a democratic republic?" But what has happened in the intervening years? We have witnessed the rise of a system of powerful labor banks, a vast extension of cooperative business in various lines and the beginnings of a wide distribution of stock among employes of the great corporations. Cities like Ontario, Detroit and Seattle own and operate successfully their light, power, water and transit systems. The United States has built, owned and operates a railroad in Alaska. The government of Canada owns and operates a thousand miles of railroad in the United States. Do these facts indicate an answer of history to Professor Giddings?

"If We Break Faith"

THE words which form the caption of this editorial are an accommodation of a phrase in a famous war poem. The soldier who wrote the poem was anxious that the living should keep faith with those who fought in Flanders to put an end to war. How far we have kept faith with the boys who died is still uncertain, although some progress has been made toward the realization of the ideal of a warless world which they cherished. But as the title of this message is a quotation applied to another situation than that for which it was first intended, we must proceed at once to explain what we have in mind.

There is a very real sense in which we have entered into a contract with the missionaries sent forth by the boards of our various societies. We have made a contract to support them in the work which they have undertaken in needy fields. This is as true of the missionary in a great city of the United States as it is of the missionary in a great city of Japan or China. There are some 1600 of our missionaries in all parts of the world. They are our evangelists and teachers and physicians who have gone forth in the spirit of Christ to minister to men and women and children who need the gospel and the blessings which only the gospel can bring. Had we not promised to provide them with the necessary means to carry on the work, they would have hesitated to go forth on such a hazardous mission. But, trusting us and accepting our promise at its face value, they are serving and sacrificing in their respective fields without a single thought of turning back to a life of selfish ease and pleasure. They are keeping faith with us.

It seems inconceivable that we shall not keep faith with them. And yet less than a year ago it was solemnly announced that we were about to break faith with quite a number of our missionaries by neglecting to make provision for their support and for the maintenance of the work which they were carrying on at various stations in foreign lands. We do not here discuss the causes of this breach of trust. We are concerned at this point simply with the fact. The cold fact stared us in the face that we were about to break faith with our comrades who had kept faith with us. Momentarily aroused by the gravity of the situation, we hastened to prop up our falling faith by taking a special collection and dignifying it with an honored historical name. In this way we attempted to hold the faith which we were allowing to slip. But at the best it was an emergency measure which cannot be resorted to a second time with much hope of success.

There is but one way to keep faith with our missionaries, and that is the way we keep faith with our creditors. If we are honest and able we pay our debts as they fall due. The denomination of which we are a part has assumed missionary obligations this year amounting to something more than five million dollars. This formidable sum covers the budgets of fifty-six organizations, including thirty-four state conventions, fourteen standard city mission societies and eight general missionary societies and boards. The amount, however, is not so formidable when given by a million people and distributed among fifty-six missionary organizations. Ten cents a week, less than the average child spends for candy, given by each one of a million people means more than five million dollars a year. That is the small cost of the faith we are asked to keep with our missionaries. Yet our faith is seriously in arrears. And added to our arrears are the cuts we have forced upon our missionaries in recent years. It is disheartening. We cannot blame our missionaries if they sometimes think that we have not kept faith with them. The five million dollars of the unified missionary budget is wholly inadequate even to maintain the work at a standstill. It really means retreat at a time when all the needs and opportunities of the world urge us forward.

What can we say or what can we do to remedy the situation? We shall feel like doing penance if our message in this editorial sounds a negative note. It is not so intended. We plan always to be positive, constructive, and, so far as the facts will permit, optimistic. Possibly there are in the situation compensating elements which we have not discovered. We shall try to be hopeful. But we are compelled to say that if we break faith with our missionaries by failing to provide amply for the support and strengthening of our missionary work we shall certainly merit the condemnation of the Master who rebuked the same spirit in the unfilial sons of Israel when they withdrew support from their aged parents on the plea of "Corban." (Mark 7:11.)

But we are not going to break faith with our brothers and sisters who are toiling in the difficult fields to which we sent them when we found they were willing and qualified to go. It is our confident hope and expectant conviction that before the new fiscal year dawns on May 1, 1926, we shall furnish substantial proof in adequate gifts and offerings of our abiding faith in our comrades who have the right to be called missionaries of the cross, and of our fixed determination to hold and strengthen all the strategic positions we now occupy as well as to push out into new territory which Providence may open. Therefore let every pastor and every member see to it that the churches they belong to contribute their full share to the benevolences covered by the denominational budget between now and April 30 when the books for the year close.

The Easter Offering

BAPTISTS often make a sorry mess of ritual. We are not to the manor born. Our Puritan antecedents persist and many of us look askance at all modern efforts to reinvest public worship with the beauty of holiness. We stand for the integrity of holiness and for spiritual religion, but we are a bit suspicious of vestments, candles, illuminated crosses and holy days. The aesthetic value of ritual and the appeal of ecclesiastical pageantry savor too much of Rome to be relished by a people so democratic.

Baptists have slowly and somewhat reluctantly fallen in line with the observance of Easter Sunday as a special period in the cycle of the year when the beauty and ritualism of the Christian religion may be displayed more than at any other period in the twelve months. Hence it is now no uncommon thing to see hundreds of Baptist churches gorgeously decorated with flowers, ferns and palms on Easter Sunday while pretty cages containing birds which make the air vibrant with song hang here and there about the auditorium. The baptistery, fringed with plants, invites those who have decided to follow Jesus to confess him publicly as their Lord in the beautiful symbolism of a dramatic resurrection. The vested choir enriches the service and enhances its aesthetic value with some of the great classics in music. Nobody objects. Everybody is happy. Easter Sunday demonstrates that even Baptists may be trained to appreciate the beauty of spiritual ritual and ecclesiastical art.

If all this is crowned with a resurrection offering the day is complete. This is the one freewill offering of the year that the church takes seriously and prepares for weeks in advance. We have seen it done and therefore speak from experience. After the usual preparation in keeping before the members and friends for several weeks the special Easter offering for missions, the glad day arrives and the church is crowded. Sunday school and church service are merged and the time for each is combined. The climax of the rich morning service is the special offering. Everybody comes forward in order while the choir and congregation sing some suitable hymn like "I gave my life for thee," and the offerings are laid reverently and joyfully upon the communion table which is presided over by two deacons. No plates are used. The checks and currency are placed upon the open table. If some people have scruples about joining the processional, another table, presided over by two deacons, is placed in the foyer to accommodate any such as they leave the service. We have seen some wonderful offerings given in this way. Every member of the family gives, from the baby in arms to the grandmother in a wheelchair. Special automobiles are requisitioned to bring everybody to church who could not otherwise be present and to take them home again. The Easter offering, when dignified in this way, becomes a kind of sacrament in the best sense of that much-abused word. Churches that have tried it once, repeat it with growing appreciation year after year.

Decision Day

IN a very real sense every day is a decision day as every day is a judgment day. The ideal calendar, when we get it, will contain no special days. All the days will be holy days sanctified with the spirit of worship. All the days will be holidays filled with creative work and recreational play that will give wholesome balance to social and industrial life. All the days will be decision days when new decisions will be made and old decisions ratified. And all the days will be judgment days in the white light of which motives will be examined in order that the better motives may prevail. But we are still hopelessly remote from such an ideal calendar as a working scale of time. We see it afar off, we appreciate its value and rest in the wish that we might live long enough to enjoy such a sanctification of time as will make every day holy unto the Lord.

In the meantime we face a situation and not a theory. Therefore we are glad to call attention to March 28 as "Decision day." It is the natural climax of the united evangelistic effort which has been organized for nearly a year among the churches of the Northern Convention and sponsored by the Home Mission Society in cooperation with other societies and boards of the denomination. We believe that nothing will bring the whole denomination up to the high level of the unity of the Spirit like true evangelism. To this end alone, not to say anything about the new tide of spiritual blessing that this united evangelistic effort has brought to the churches in conversions and re-consecrations, the organizations which have joined in this worthy work have made an epochal contribution.

The World in Transit

BY THE ASSISTANT EDITOR

He Shares His Best With All The Rest.

Religion is the quest for the best life. Its goal is perfect satisfaction in perfect safety. In social beings this goal is necessarily social. While the individual must prosecute his quest by and for himself, the satisfaction achieved by him therein is valid only in so far as it is socially serviceable for time and for eternity. The best life is that on which a perfect God can build a perfect world. The individual is safe only as he finds and walks in the way which is practicable and safe for all society. The right kind of a man is a pilot of the social quest for the best life for all. He shares his best with all the rest. Within him is the kingdom of God.

If the German People Will, Who Will Say They Shall Not?

A good deal more than the mere fortunes of the late Kaiser's family is involved in a proposed referendum in Germany to expropriate the property of the imperial family and apply it to national needs. A slogan of the movement is: "Nothing for the princes—every cent they owned or cripples and victims of the war." It sounds like poetic justice. But opponents of the measure say: "To seize the princes' property is mere robbery. If the communists and socialists succeed in this first expropriation move their next step will be confiscation of all property." And who knows but the forecast may be true? One of the most critical issues of this tangled time is involved. Where in the realm of property lies the boundary line of equity between private and public rights? The question cannot be settled by legal prescription and precedent because these things have a fashion of changing under the pressure of a common sense of equity. For weal or woe there is a growing purpose to apply the principle that what one has not earned he shall not own. Watch Germany.

Senators Refuse to Help Chicago to Behave Itself.

Chicago is having trouble with its morals and manners. The Better Government association becoming alarmed about the condition of the neighborhood, appealed to the United States senate to investigate. Senators listened gravely—and briefly. Then they replied with one voice: "Clean up your own back yard." Thus Chicago—some of it—trekked westward in grief, proclaimed itself disgraced and returned home ridiculous. But some good may come of the incident. Mayor Dever is stirred. He proposes to show that Chicago is not so bad as she is painted. Consequently, the incident is in the hands of a council of local practitioners, and may be in the way of finding what, if anything, ails the city.

This Man Traducing Bryan Showing Him Signal Honor?

Augustus Thomas is the man; so runs the news in the daily papers. He nominated Bryan for president in 1908. Now he tells that Bryan was prepared to propose an amendment to the constitution of the United States for the establishment of Christianity as the national religion and making all other faiths illicit. There Mr. Thomas and Mr. Bryan parted company. But the incident is interesting. A good many recent happenings indicate the rise of a new state of mind in America concerning the relations of church and state. After trying a constitutional guaranty of religious liberty for 135 years, do the American people now hold that guaranty valid in principle? Or have they come so intoxicated by the power of the majority that they are ready to impose religion by law? Mr. Bryan was a skillful interpreter of popular impulses. Was he right in supposing that he could array Baptists behind a law to suppress Jews, freethinkers and Mormons? As a nation are we on the point of becoming apostate to freedom of conscience? There is not much time for thought in this country, but on this question it may be well to think for seven minutes.

Good-bye Jazz, if Our Young People Get to Doing This Sort of Thing.

Reference is made to a leaflet entitled "Baptist Young People's Conversation Record for April 11, 1926." It is proposed that all over the country on that date the young people, using a leaflet prepared for the purpose shall register their actual interests and habits of thinking, without signing their names, and shall send their reports of such registration to the B. Y. P. U. headquarters to be used in compiling an exhibit of the interests of the young people. There are sixty-six items of possible interest to be checked selectively by each registrant, and sixty possible propositions to be similarly checked to show what the registrant thinks about certain important subjects. The device is a product of genius in pedagogy, and it opens a field of great possibilities for interesting and guiding our young people into real Christian life service. The whole will be summed up and presented to the public in a report of the commission on interests at the B. Y. P. U. A. convention at Los Angeles next July. It is going to be a great game. Let the elders sit on the bleachers and root.

He Got the Miners Out And Got Himself In.

Things as big as the world sometimes happen in little corners. Witness a case reported from Evansville, Ind. "Tyler G. Lawton, president of the Indiana district of the United Mine Workers, was sentenced today to sixty days in jail and fined $200 by Superior Court Judge Edgar Durre, who held Lawton in contempt of court . . . for having influenced miners at the Green Mound mine in Daviess county to leave the shaft while it was being operated under a receiver appointed by the court." Thus another way is found to prevent strikes: appoint a receiver for the mine; then jail the man who advises a strike. Does the principle apply everywhere, or is it merely a device of Judge Durre? A good deal depends on the answer to that question.

Modernists and Fundamentalists Are Brothers in Faith and Sin

To quote from a letter: "Are there not modernists who deny the deity of Christ, the virgin birth of Jesus, the vicarious suffering of Jesus on the cross, the resurrection of Jesus, the inspiration of the scriptures and the necessity for the new birth?" Maybe so. There may be ordinary infidels who call themselves modernists. And there may be some who affirm all of those beliefs on mere heresy and call themselves fundamentalists, which is another kind of infidelity just as bad. A real Christian fundamentalist is one who when he finds out what are the essential inherited values of Christianity intends to hold and propagate them. A real Christian modernist is one who, in order to find out what are the essential inherited values of Christianity that ought to be held and propagated, intends to make use of the scientific method of investigation. Modernists do not agree perfectly among themselves as to what those values are. Neither do fundamentalists. Both agree in holding Jesus as the center of their faith and life. Both alike blunder in trying to interpret and follow him.

Death and the Life Beyond

V—An Interlude—The Meaning of "Eternity"

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

UP TO this point we have dealt with the general question of death and survival, and we have sought to demonstrate that death does not end all. The personal self continues to exist on the other side of the veil. But we cannot be content with so much, or so little, as this. Having gone so far we are now bound to go farther. We cannot avoid asking what is the character of the life awaiting us on the other side, and what are the conditions of that life. These questions now present themselves for consideration. Before entering into this subject, however, there is a preliminary inquiry to be undertaken. The future life is in the Bible associated with the ideas of "eternity" and the "eternal". The adjective "eternal" is, in the Scriptures, applied to the conditions of life—both bright and dark—on the other side of death. What is the meaning of the word? What does the Bible mean by its use? It is idle to speak about "eternal life" or "eternal punishment" unless we know the real meaning of the terms we employ. Here, if anywhere, we need to know the precise meaning of words.

"Picturing" Eternity

Eternity! The word, by reason of use, awakens within us the profoundest emotions. It falls upon our spirits like the solemn tolling of some great bell, the vibrations of whose tones possess the strange power of subduing our spirits, and driving us to serious thought. These deep vibrations hold us as with a spell, even the most frivolous of us. And yet, while they thus subdue our spirits, the idea of eternity offers to the mind a great perplexity. It bewilders, stuns and staggers us, this idea of a horizon without limit, an abyss without bottom—this immense, immeasurable, unthinkable eternity. Men have sought to realize in some degree the greatness of it by the use of images or pictures. Who has not heard an illustration of this kind: "Imagine a mountain of rock a mile high and a mile broad, rearing its mass in terrifying grandeur. And imagine that to this mountain there comes once in a thousand years a little bird which carries away in its little beak one tiny grain of rock from the mountain. When this little bird has succeeded in removing the entire mountain in this incredibly slow manner, then the first second only of eternity will have begun". Such a prodigious illustration, invented in all good faith and once commonly employed, was entirely unsuccessful in accomplishing its purpose. Instead of making clear what eternity is, it simply crushed the mind by its frightful weight. To present eternity as the years of time multiplied by billions and billions is to beget in the mind a sense of unreality, and finally to create indifference. When the whip first falls upon the body of a prisoner his flesh is so sensitive that he shrieks in agony, but as the lashes continue to descend, the flesh becomes gradually deadened; the nerves cease to respond, and the thongs finally fall upon unresponsive flesh. In like manner the attempt to represent eternity by a terrifying image such as has been cited can only have the effect of hardening the human mind. Such conceptions are inconceivable, therefore they are deemed to be untrue. It is true then that we should try and arrive at the truth concerning the use of the word "eternal" as it is set before us in the Bible.

Let us put aside every prejudice and cease to ask whether our conclusions are orthodox or heterodox. Let us be content to ask only are they true? It is of the utmost importance to observe that in the Revised Version of the Bible (1881), almost invariably the different terms of the Revised Version "everlasting", "eternal" and "forever and ever", are changed or modified. The word "everlasting" disappears altogether from the Revised Version being replaced by the word "eternal". The latter word is not a mere synonym for the former; it is an entirely different word and possesses an entirely different connotation. In two notable passages this difference is emphasized; namely in John 3:16 where "everlasting life" is changed to "eternal life", and in Matthew 25:46 in which the Revised Version reading of "everlasting punishment" and "life eternal" is rendered "eternal punishment" and "eternal life". This change of words is not due to caprice; there is a deep reason for it which will shortly be apparent to us. In Weymouth's version of the New Testament none of these terms "eternal", "everlasting" and "forever and ever" occurs.

Old Phrases in New Dress

All are replaced by the expressions "the life of the ages" and "unto the ages". The change has been made in the interests of clearer thinking. Behind the English expressions "eternal", "everlasting", "forever and ever", there lie one Hebrew word and two Greek words; the Hebrew word olam, and two Greek words aion, and aionios. The simplest translation of these words is, as Doctor Weymouth renders it uniformly "the life of the ages", "belonging to an age". The mere exchange of one word for another, however, takes us but a little distance on our way. If it is simply a question of substituting one word for another, we are exactly where we were before. For what is an "age"? The word is quite indefinite. An age may be long or short, it does not carry with it, necessarily, the idea of never-endingness. We shall best arrive at a conclusion by learning in what sense or senses the Bible employs the word "age". The meaning of the word has to be determined largely by the context, since, as we shall see, it possesses different time values. In the Bible the word "age" is primarily a word of measurement—the measurement of things that are temporal. Today we employ this very word to indicate epochs, short or long. We speak of the various cycles through which our earth has passed as "ages"—the Eozoic, the Cambrian, the Silurian, the Devonian, the Carboniferous, the Permian, the Mesozoic, the Neozoic and the Glacial. The "age" in which we now live is the age of man. The Bible uses the same word in a similar sense; that is, as a term of temporal measurement. There is in the Bible a well-defined doctrine of the "ages", which we must endeavor to understand. The central passage is Hebrews 1:2—"through whom he made the ages". Here the "ages" are distinguished from the "cosmos", which is the usual word for the universal order. The apostle affirms that God, through Christ, "made the ages". Before the ages he was, during the ages he is, after the ages he will be. He precedes them. He is working in them and when they have passed, he will remain the same, at the end as in the beginning. That is the doctrine of the "ages" as set forth in the New Testament.

Further, the history of God's dealings with man is announced in terms of the "ages". Age has succeeded age in the divine plan for man, and at the close of these epochs "Christ appeared, once for all, at the end of the ages in order to do away with sin by the sacrifice of himself". (Heb. 9:26). It is not the end of the "world" that is indicated, but the summary of the epochs. The coming of Christ inaugurated "a new age", with the display of new powers. So the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews (6:5) speaking about the new dispensation employs the phrase "the powers of the coming age". We live in this gospel age. But our "age" will end as the others have done. Our Lord himself specifically says so in that group of "kingdom" parables recorded in the thirteenth chapter of Matthew. He speaks of the kingdom of heaven under the image of a drag-net let down into the sea. All kinds of fish are in it collected, but at the end of the age a great separation will be effected. This age, he tells us, is to be succeeded by another—"the age to come". To his disciples, who surrendered all to follow him, he promised that they should "receive a hundredfold in this life, and in the age to come eternal life".

The Lord of All the Ages

What is the relation of Christ to these epochs? He is the master of them all. They pass, he remains the same. Paul speaks of him as Lord of all the ages (Eph. 1:21, 3:21). In the strict sense, then, God alone is "eternal". He is independent of the ages, without beginning and without end. The world is not eternal, for it had a beginning and it will have an end. Science as well as religion tells us that. Man is not eternal, for he also had a beginning, whatever may be his final destiny. In no case does the Bible apply to man the words "eternal" or "everlasting" in the rigorous sense of having no beginning and no end. The eternity of God is absolute; ours is relative. The relative use of the word is quite clear to those who, without prejudice, read their Bible. Wherever, in the English Bible, the term "forever" is applied to human institutions, it does not signify endlessness in the sense in which it is applied to God. It means no more than "endless within the sphere of its own existence"—a time limit being set to it. The context in each case determines the particular meaning. Thus of Aaron's priesthood it is said (Exod. 40:15) "their anointing shall be to them for an everlasting priesthood, throughout their generations". "Everlasting" here is not endlessness, but a relative length; the term being defined by the following sentence, i.e., "endless within the duration of the Aaronic priesthood. While the priesthood lasted, this family was to supply priests for the office. So of the temple it is said, (1 Kings 8:13) "I have surely built thee an house of habitation, a place for thee to dwell in forever". This cannot mean endlessness in the absolute sense, for our Lord declared of that temple that not one stone should be left upon another. The temple was the dwelling place of God within the period of its duration. Again in Deut. 15:7 there is cited the case of a slave who had the right, at a certain moment, to claim his liberty. But "if he say unto you I will not go out from thee, because he loveth thee and thy house, because he is well with thee; then thou shalt take an awl and thrust it through his ear into the door, and he shall be thy servant forever". Surely this cannot mean that slavery shall be an eternal institution. "Forever" is limited to the lifetime of the man who thus sacrifices himself. One final illustration must suffice. When Gehazi, the unworthy servant of Elisha, was condemned by his master for lying and theft, the sentence ran, "The leprosy of Naaman shall come unto thee and unto thy seed forever". Is it thinkable that all the descendants of that unhappy man have been blighted forever with leprosy because of the sin of their greedy ancestor? Obviously the word "forever" is used only in a relative sense, and is limited to a particular group of persons.

It should be clear by this time that we cannot press the term "forever" to mean in every case endlessness. In the majority of cases it is a time word, and refers not to an endless but to a limited period. The context must always determine the meaning of any particular passage where so elastic a term as "forever" is employed. In summary, the word "age" is used in the Bible, primarily as a term of measurement within the boundaries of time. God alone transcends the ages. He alone is eternal. Man and the universe are created; they are within the ages, and are subject to the laws of the ages.

There is, however, a further use of the word "age" in the Bible. It is employed as a term of quality; to indicate characteristics. When Paul urges the Roman Christians not to be "conformed to this age", he means by the term quite clearly the moral characteristics of the epoch in which they were living. Again the word is used to set forth the quality of the Redeemer's work for man. The gospel preached is an "eternal gospel". We have in it "eternal consolation". Our salvation is an "eternal redemption". This word of quality is the equivalent of the term "divine". The time element disappears entirely; it is the transcendence of time that is indicated. The gospel, the consolation, the redemption are infinitely raised above all temporal considerations. We have arrived, then, at the point when we clearly perceive the double usage of the underlying word "age" as an adjective of time and as an adjective of quality. This study has been absolutely necessary for the right understanding of the great terms expressing the conditions which prevail in the future life. To these let us now direct our attention.

"Knowing" God

Man's destiny is associated everywhere in the New Testament, with this thought of the eternal. More than forty times we read of "eternal life", once of "eternal punishment", once of "eternal destruction" and twice of "eternal fire"; or as they are better expressed "the life of the ages", "the punishment of the ages", "the fire of the ages". Now we have seen that the word "age" has two biblical uses; it is a term of time measurement and a term of quality. To which of these two orders does the term "eternal life"—to deal with this first—apply? The reply is simple. Our Lord himself defines it for us. "This is life eternal, that they should know thee, and him whom thou didst send, even Jesus Christ" (John 17:3). Eternal life, then is qualitative and not quantitative. It is not life set out in terms of multiplied time, but life set forth in terms of spiritual relationship. Two other great words make this clear: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth may in him have eternal life." (John 3:14-15.) The change of words in the Revised Version is most striking. The "life eternal" does not exist in itself, as an enveloping atmosphere which presses upon all, no matter what their response to it. It is a relation to him. It is "in him" that the eternal life is found. The same point is stressed in the great announcements "He that heareth my word and believeth him that sent me hath eternal life". (John 5:24). "He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life". (John 6:54.) Eternal life, then, as defined by our Lord himself is something moral and divine and has exclusive reference to quality. It consists in "knowing" God and Jesus Christ whom he has sent. To "know" God is not an intellectual apprehension of him, but a spiritual harmony with him.

At this point it will be well to compare the interchangeable word used by our Lord and recorded in the Synoptic Gospels. In Mark 9:45-47 he speaks of "life" thus: "If thy foot cause thee to stumble cut it off, it is good for thee to enter into life maimed rather than having thy two feet to be cast into Gehenna". But he continues: "And if thine eye cause thee to stumble pluck it out, it is good for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into Gehenna". The word "life" is here used interchangeably with the phrase "the kingdom of God". A similar interchange is apparent in Matthew 7:14-21: "Narrow is the gate that leadeth unto life . . . Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven".

Putting together these facts, the following truths emerge. First, "eternal life," consists of the soul's vital fellowship with God through Jesus Christ. Second, that this vital fellowship with God is the same thing as entering the kingdom of heaven, and, third, that this experience is a present possession. Here and now we enjoy the divine gift. From all of which it is clear that the phrase "eternal life" is not a term of quantity but a term of quality. Eternal life is not natural human life prolonged indefinitely into the future, it is essential divine life, and endless only because essential.

But there is another side to the question. "Eternal life" concerns the bright and glorious side. What can we say about the dark and the inglorious side? To indicate the dark side four terms are used in the New Testament. The first occurs once only. "All their sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men; but whosoever shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin" (Mark 3:29). It is a mysterious word, limited in its application to one class of persons only. The point to be observed, however, is that it is the sin which is eternal. There is no reference here to the punishment of the sin; it is its nature that is defined. The second word is found in Matthew 25:46 "These shall go away unto eternal punishment (the punishment of the ages) but the righteous into eternal life". The third word is found in 2 Thess. 19 "they shall be punished with eternal destruction". The last word is found in Mark 9:43, "cast into unquenchable fire". These terms "eternal punishment", "eternal destruction", "eternal sin", "unquenchable fire" are adjectives of quality to define the nature of the thing stated. They are not time words at all. That which is indicated lies entirely outside the idea of time. The emphasis is not upon duration. In fact the question of duration is never touched in the Bible. It is left quite open. Later we shall see more precisely what this means.

To sum up. We have sought, without theological bias of any kind, to state in outline what the Bible teaches about the "eternal". The revelation of God to mankind has been limited to this age, and "the next". Beyond that the Bible does not proceed save in one or two passages which speak quite generally and without detail of the "end" of all. When our Lord spake about that awful sin for which there was no forgiveness, he said: "It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this age, nor in the age that is to come". He said nothing more than that. The Bible does not throw light upon all the coming ages. It makes no reference to the "Infinite", or to the final goal of all things in which man is concerned. Revelation is intensely practical and occupies itself with matters which press immediately upon the life of man. It does not oppress us by speaking of that which no mortal mind can possibly conceive. Urgency is the great note of the gospel. "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." The gift of eternal life is offered to us here and now through Jesus Christ our Lord. On the other hand the Bible does not speak of the chastisement for human sin in terms of millions or billions of earth years. The present is our "age". We shall pass out of it into a succeeding age. We shall live on beyond the veil, and the manner in which we live here, will determine how we shall live beyond. One law, one principle, governs our lives. "Whatever a man sows that shall he also reap." If we live without Christ here, we shall begin on the other side without him. There is no magic in the physical act of dying, any more than there is in the physical act of sleeping. We rise exactly the same persons, for good or evil, as we retired. It is this fact that gives terrible urgency to the message of the gospel, and imposes upon its hearers a terrible responsibility. We are making, even now, our own heaven or hell. Life eternal—union with God through Christ—is ours now if we will. But if we will not, then there remains the "second death". Christ is our one hope, our one Redeemer. "Whosoever shall fall upon this stone shall be broken, but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder."

Why City Planning

BY CHARLES HATCH SEARS

This is the first of a series of three articles prepared at the request of "The Baptist" to review the scope of the forthcoming volume on Baptist city planning, a work prepared under the direction of the author of these articles, comprising the work of fifteen committees representative of the Baptist leadership in our great cities.

LIKE an overgrown, awkward, noisy adolescent, the city demands recognition. It must no longer be taken for granted. The great city is a recent phenomenon, particularly in America. The history of America is the history of rural life or of rural patterns carried over into villages and small cities. In 1800 only 4 per cent of the population of the United States lived in cities with 8,000 or more inhabitants. By 1850 this ratio had increased to 12 per cent; by 1920 to 44 per cent or if we include cities great and small, to 51 per cent.

In rural life planning ahead was not so essential, but in a great city provision for the water supply a generation in advance becomes a necessity. The width of streets; the placing of arteries of travel between cities and distant points of the same city; the laying out of boulevards and parks and streets, all must be thought of in terms of future growth.

True, cities do not reveal their future outlines. The wise observations of the commission which attempted in 1811 to plan for the future of New York City are amazing. These are their conclusions: "It may be a subject of regret that the commissioners have provided space for a greater population than is collected at any spot on this side of China. It is not improbable that considerable numbers may be collected at Harlem before the high hills to the southward of it shall be built upon as a city, and it is improbable that (for centuries to come) the grounds north of Harlem flat (in what is now the Bronx) will be covered with houses."

Above the dead line laid down by this commission is upper Manhattan now closely built up and the Borough of the Bronx with a population near the million mark. Within this area is some of the worst congestion to be found in the greater city.

City planning as a science had its beginning in America with the "White City" in Chicago in 1893, but it was not taken seriously until some years later when Chicago led her American cities in municipal city planning. A prompting thought was "the city beautiful". In the words of Nelson P. Lewis, "It is simply the exercise of such foresight as will promote the orderly and sightly development of a city and its environments along rational lines, with due regard for health, amenity and convenience, and for its commercial and industrial advancement."

While the term city planning has not been used in social welfare as such, the principles of city planning apply to the welfare of the city in its growth; to the city in all its parts; to the city in its relation to all its peoples; and to the city in its interrelations.

In social welfare it is essential to know the trend; to know the forces that are sweeping men off their feet. Angelism becomes a mockery when Christians disregard the elemental rights of individuals. Intelligent planning in this field has brought marked results. During the writer's residence in New York, covering a period of twenty-seven years, he has observed revolutionary changes, for example, housing, due in part to the creation of the tenement use department and more recently to zoning; and in the control of disease, particularly tuberculosis, resulting in a sharp fall in the death rate. Science and religion have worked together in the redemption of the city; looking backward we may see that reforms are born in the precincts of religion, but are nurtured in the precincts of science.

The great northern cities are so divided in religious faith, so divided by old world religious barriers, that the forces of Protestantism are confused by the very complexity of the problem. But it remains quite as true that municipal life and industry need the moral energy that the church alone has been able to release.

In all this it is not enough that isolated voices be raised from detached churches, but that the voices of the churches should be heard in unison. Not only is this true of the work of the church, in the field of social welfare, but it is also true that there is urgent need of concerted effort and city planning within the immediate and specialized field of the church.

Protestant city planning involves the consideration of church distribution. Down-town areas in large cities suddenly converted to business purposes in the first stages of this transition have too many churches, but in the trend of churches to more favorable localities there is great danger of religious neglect. Such situations demand Protestant city planning to avoid "the twin sin of overlapping and neglect," overlapping in new districts and neglect in old. The only practicable plan to meet the need is a division of the city into responsibility tracts—each church assuming special responsibility for its own assigned area, adapting its program to changing conditions. In this sense every church should become a neighborhood church, whatever its outreach into other localities for man-power and resource. A church that is not indigenous is a community impertinence.

Churching the newer residence areas demands Protestant city planning. No denomination can afford to neglect these newer residence areas if it would hold its constituency. Yet the Christian forces of a great city cannot afford to waste their resources in competitive effort. The uptown residence and suburban areas develop so rapidly that stated studies or surveys should be made, and since no denomination can attempt the whole task, there should be allocation of responsibility.

A Protestant city plan of religious education should be set up through the Church Federation or Council of Churches, church schools, mid-week, and vacation. Separate interdenominational organizations for each item of religious education is a waste. Vacation Bible schools should be related to the regular denominational and interdenominational programs of religious education.

Protestant city planning should find expression in social service. Through the federation, the churches should keep in touch with the social welfare agencies of the municipality; should provide religious services in public institutions; and should from time to time review the needs of Protestant dependents, and find a way to meet them.

Church city planning may be defined as the exercise of such foresight by the church (through local units, individual churches and through denominational and interdenominational bodies) as will assure the rational distribution of its available forces and resources and will secure its widest ministry to individuals and communities according to need, all with due regard to future growth.

The Father's Children

With our differences the wise Father has given us the spirit of love which will teach us mutual respect and brotherhood

BY DOUGLAS G. HARING

“RACE prejudice is inborn.”

So say the agitators and chauvinists, the jingoes and lynchers.

“It is inborn because the races are fundamentally different and must fight for survival—therefore it is instinctive to hate other races.”

But when are instinctive tendencies most clearly revealed? The psychologists answer “In childhood—if you wait very long they are entirely covered by a mass of habits learned from older folk.”

How about the children? Do they hate other races on sight? Did you ever move your family to a strange land and watch your children? The younger ones notice no difference between themselves and “the natives.” The older ones who have heard about race differences, who have seen hate on their elders’ faces, usually imitate those elders and show prejudice. But the little ones—those who have not learned what is “usually done”—know no difference and draw neither race nor class lines.

In one other place we find little or no race prejudice. That is among scientific men, philosophers and intellectual persons who have progressed far enough to analyze their own habits and attitudes and discover the foolishness of race hatreds. Sometimes they have conquered their habits of dislike after a struggle, but as a rule the best-balanced, disciplined minds reject race feeling as unworthy.

Race Hatred Not Inborn

Could there be a clearer refutation of the theory that race hatreds are instinctive, inborn? Those whose instincts dominate them most completely and who know least of society and its customs, the little children: and those who have risen above custom and prejudice—the intellectual and scientific people, are alike in being free from race hatred and prejudice. Race hatred is a social sin—socially nurtured and socially transmitted, but not inborn. That means that if we have a mind to free ourselves from it, we can do so. It is not like those primitive forces of hunger and sex which no man can neglect, but it is an acquired attitude which he who will may conquer.

Does saying that race prejudice is not inborn lead us to the conclusion that the races are after all exactly alike save for color? By no means. Whether scientists admit it or not, the facts of diverse cultures and tastes show that races are not identical. The white man likes to dominate and organize. The black man likes music and the ring of sonorous words. The yellow man likes a subtle poetic atmosphere and has no taste for machinery. These are only generalizations but they show differences in the races which are real. Perhaps these differences are inborn—perhaps they, like race prejudice, are only social habits, customs of thinking which could be changed. But there they are, and so long as they persist the races are not identical in each other’s eyes.

Need they be made identical, even if that be possible? Is this not a richer world for the varying contributions made by different peoples and cultures? However great the differences, there is nothing in the culture and tastes of any race which the other races cannot understand and enjoy, even if they cannot duplicate it themselves.

The white man cannot produce real negro music—but he can enjoy it. The oriental has not shown any very great originality along scientific lines—but he can appreciate and use the science of the West. The philosophy of the brown man would never have been produced by a white race, but despite all the popular drivel about the “mysterious East,” the white man can understand it if he wills to do so.

Does that suggest anything to Christians? Are we not all children of the one Father, different indeed, but capable of mutual understanding if the false barriers of prejudice be overcome? We gain nothing by pretending that differences do not exist, but with the differences the wise Father has given us the spirit of love, which, if we hear its counsel, will teach us mutual respect and brotherhood.

Can we learn to respect each other, differences and all?

The Devotional Life

Christ and the Cross

Before your eyes Jesus Christ has vividly been portrayed, as though crucified among you.—Gal. 3:1

By JOHN H. DeVRIES

WE are all familiar with the figure of the cross on the top of at least some church buildings. But the grim reality of it is largely lost from view. Many are hazy in their idea about it. A sort of vague indefiniteness, like a mist, has gathered about it, which "en-swathes and darkens it." It is not pulled down, it is not removed, but something is put before it.

It is "a transparent something which, if it obscures the naked lines of the cross, still lets the cross be seen," so that the awfulness of the cry of God-forsakenness, by him who hung and died thereon, still affects the heart momentarily, but the anguish of the Man of Sorrows, which he endured for us, may no longer arrest us, may no longer hold us in its grasp, stir us in the deeper parts of our soul, in the hidden recesses of our inmost being.

Swathing the Cross

This "swathing of the cross" in mists that faintly reveal, and more effectually conceal the cross, is "the artistic work of the spirit of the times," whose influence the best do not escape, and is therefore common in the churches everywhere.

Misleading ideas have charmed unthinking minds away from the grimness of which the cross is the exponent. "Easter" is said "to surpass the cross," and naturally Easter is the gala day, by the side of which Good Friday is comparatively nothing. As though there ever could have been a victory over death but for the death died on the cross! It is said: "Christ himself is greater than the cross, his person of greater significance than his cross," as though divorce were possible between the two. In all history, what men have done puts the halo of fame about their names.

What could Christ, without the cross, be to the world?

Again we are told that the effect of Christ's influence upon life at large, and the mystic-sweet contemplation upon the loveliness of his character, can dispense with, or even crowd out, the tragedy of the cross. And this means much. The influence of Christ upon the world's life these twenty centuries is so subtle, and so vastly beneficial to mankind, that it defies recording, be the pen of the writer ever so ready. And the mystic-sweet remembrance of his matchless virtues a privilege within common reach.

Yet, to dream of these apart from the cross is like the dream of Niagara without the water.

Thus we have modern thought on one hand, and apostolic determination and example on the other.

These two conflict.

In yielding to the times the actual suffering of Jesus is little, if at all, pictured, i. e., dramatically set forth before people, in this very season set apart for this purpose. Programs for Lenten preaching and meditations bear scrutiny with respect to this. At most "the leading characters in the awful drama of the Passion of our Lord are taken as subjects of Lenten preaching, such as Peter and his denial, with the emphasis on the denier; Judas and his betrayal; the priests with their revilings, the mob howling for Jesus' blood, and at the cross railing at the dying Lord of Glory." Interesting topics enough, with enough semblance about them of being true to the spirit of Lent, to pass muster at the bar of the superficial.

The Central Figure

But the suffering itself of the Man of Sorrows, with how much genuine sentiment is it set forth, in simple language, astir with life in vivid colors striking to the eye, in graphic delineations making pictures appealing to the mind, photographing them upon the heart, dismissing congregations from the sanctuaries with impressions in their souls of their suffering Redeemer so vivid, so realistic, so gripping that escape from them requires effort of will few can command?

This is no bid for sentimentality; no attempt to revive morbid delight in staring oneself blind at the wounds that mar the body of our Lord on the cross, or in counting the drops of blood as they trickle to the ground.

Physical suffering is not the greatest suffering.

The Supreme Agony

Crucifixion was a cruel death. Hundreds of thousands have suffered it; hence in this our Lord is not alone. As to cruelty, forms of it have been known in all ages which far exceed that of the cross. Physical suffering is not the greatest suffering. Wherefore the Scriptures put little, if any, emphasis upon the physical pains our Lord endured. But with great pains by the use of many images and many figurative terms, as though to impress upon us the insufficiency of language to do the subject justice; they portray the mortal anguish our Lord endured in mind and heart and soul. The Scriptures, I say, in distinction from the New Testament. Because, while the New Testament gives us the four-fold account of the trial and crucifixion of Jesus, the whole Bible, from first to last, is well-nigh inexhaustible in its efforts to hold the attention of its readers riveted upon the mental and spiritual sufferings of our Lord.

When God, who alone doeth "impossible" things, and by the sacrifice of Christ freely offers "forgiveness of sin," "peace through the blood of the cross," then the sufferings of Christ can never cease to interest, to arrest, to rivet and to hold the attention of people everywhere.

Nothing has so softening an effect on the heart, as meditation on the sufferings of our Lord, opening up the mystery, that what Jesus suffered, he suffered for us. That were it not that he had suffered them for us, we should have had to suffer them forever; for that we have sinned, and "He has loosed up from our sins by his blood." This softens hearts; this turns sinners into penitents; kills love of sin; makes angels sing.

Pet Aversions

HAVE you a pet aversion? If not you are an exception—it is possible even that your pet aversion may be a pet aversion; and so you may indignantly deny having one! They are born with most of us and develop in intensity as we grow in stature. Frances Hunt gives a list of them as told at Cynthia's Aversion party described in the Woman's Home Companion.

"One of my pet aversions is to have my wife — or anybody's wife — get hold of a Sunday paper before I have read it. A woman always separates each section from every other, then she shuffles all the separate pages so that no consecutive sheets follow each other; then she strews them through the room on every chair, bookcase and table. Finally she opens all the windows and allows the breeze to circulate freely through the rooms till the editorials and the stock market quotations and the comic supplement are all—" A conjugal rap on my knuckles, instead of on the table, stemmed the tide of my eloquence.

"I hate having a caller say good-by and then keep you standing for ten minutes while she tells you some perfectly unimportant details which you forget faster than she can remember."

"Yes, and I abominate details in conversation anyway," a fellow sufferer broke in. "I wish talk could be condensed and given out as headlines."

"I hate putting clothes away in camphor with too little paper and too much string!" suddenly dropped like a bolt from the blue lady opposite Cynthia.

"I loathe trying to make curtains exactly alike, and having them all come out different lengths after they're hemmed," plaintively wailed my pink neighbor.

"Yes, that's horrid, but I'll tell you something that is worse," chimed in another sufferer, "and that is to put a hairnet down on your dressing table without clearing a space for it—you're sure to find that you've laid it on top of your pincushion and trinket tray, and it is maddening, when you're in a hurry, to find that your hair is full of collar buttons and sleeve links and black-headed pins and earrings. All is fish that comes to my net, and nothing escapes from its meshes except my hair."

"How about finding that the third button on one's shirt is never sewed on just because it doesn't show? Among pet aversions that may be said to get my pet goat."

"I can't bear to have a woman choose my cravats," chimed in a husband.

"I must confess to a mild phobia about having my cup of tea only three quarters full when I want it hot and overflowing.

Grandmother

SHE had "a knack" with things that grew
So the gay flowers knew
And the pet robins chirped
The secret of her.

True zest for life—and kindliness.

She tripped about to keep "real spry,"
Erect—her fine head held high,
Proud of its deep-brown hair,
Her eyes so young.

(How she spurned naps and lavender and shawls!)

Then rightly, with no lingering nor hush,
She slipped away

In the suddenness of early day.

Wives never fill cups full," was my own next exhibit.

("I can't bear generalizations about wives," put in one of them parenthetically.)

"They are better than the personalities they always indulge in," was retaliated.

Our friendly little neighbor in green poured oil over what gave promise of becoming rough water by hastily exclaiming, "I hate to have one slipper brought to me to try on instead of two when I am in a shoe store. Why do you suppose the shoeman always carefully replaces the mate back in the box on an upper shelf before he tries on, just as if I had only one leg?"

"This is not a conundrum party," Cynthia reminded her guest. "We are exhibiting pets, not ignorance."

"I hate people who laugh too long or too loudly," the blue lady irrelevantly announced.

"If we are degenerating into exhibiting our hatred of people instead of things, I vote that we consider the game over because we should practically be playing Everlasting," I virtuously suggested.

We Use Too Many Words

is such expressions as:

"They are both alike." Omit both, and you have said better what you meant to say.

"There are plans to open up a business in that building." Omit up.

"Fill this pail full of water." If it's filled it's full, so try, "Fill this pail with water."

"I seldom ever miss a church service." Omit ever with seldom.

"It would be more preferable to take the trip together." Drop the more. Or if you especially wish a more, say, "It would be more desirable to take the trip together."

Those Little Girls of Long Ago

BY GRACE ROLLINS

THERE is something about the fanciful work of those little girls of long ago that grips the heart with sympathy even while the smile is almost irresistible. And yet it is good to think that even while they worked with needle and crewel stabbing with plump, stubborn fingers back and forth through perforated cardboard or the silken background of a sampler such sentiments as

My mortal days run swift their course

Oh may I use then all my force

To do my duty every day

And strive to shun the evil way, most probably their thoughts were not all on the "swift course of their mortal days," but very probably there was oftentimes mischief brewing in their hearts and twinkling in their eyes.

Here is a verse seen on several samplers work by the children from ten to thirteen years old, bearing the date of the early seventeen hundreds: Our life is nothing but a winter's day. Some only break their fast and sleep away;

Others stay dinner, and depart full fed
The deeper age but sups and goes to bed.

He's most in debt that lingers out the day;

Who dyes betimes has lesse and less to pay.

A six-year-old who signs herself Elizabeth Macready has immortalized herself, very painstakingly with

And now, my soul, another year

Of thy short life is past.

I cannot long continue here,

And this may be my last.

One can surmise how carefully seven-year-old Caroline Ellen Winters watched her words and acts after spending hours of many days toiling over

There's not a sin that we commit,

Nor wicked words we say,

But in Thy dreadful book is written

Against the judgment day.

There is a hint of satisfaction and self-approval in "Patience Allen—six years old" in the memorial she leave behind of her industrious childhood,

When I was young

And in my prime

Here you may see

How I spent my time.

And also in Jane Rutherford Little Hamm—

Stitch upon stitch I set down here
To show to all both far and near

How dutiful a child I am—

BOYS and Girls

Tubal Explores the Inside of His Head

BY MARGARET T. APPEGARTH
(Concluded from last week)

Tubal sighed at such a busy life: "Poor Booker!"

"Yes, poor—and almost nameless, too, for the very first day he found that when the roll was called all the other scholars had two names, while his one and only name was Booker. But quick as a flash he made up a second one, and when the teacher reached him he had the new part of it all ready: 'Booker Washington, sir!' he piped up; and Tubal, my boy, neither he nor that teacher nor those other scholars ever guessed that such a little negro boy could ever become so famous that every person in the whole United States seems to know all about him."

Tubal's eyes grew big as saucers: "What's that you say? Famous? That poor li'l Booker got famous?"

"Indeed he did! Famous enough to start an enormous school, to be friends with the president of the United States, to dine at the White House, to be invited to speak before huge audiences."

"Bet it was one of them colly places earned him how to be famous," Tubal added.

"You're right, a college started it. But just let me tell you how he got there! For he had heard of Hampton Institute where poor colored boys could earn their way through, and even although Hampton was five hundred miles away he started to walk there, earning money along the road to buy his next meal, and sleeping in the queerest places! Once, for several nights, he slept under a wooden sidewalk in the city of Richmond! All night long he could hear people walking over him, people who never dreamed there was a little colored boy under their feet—a boy who would some day be famous. Then when he finally got to that school, he was so dusty and dirty and shabby from his tremendous five-hundred-mile-walk that the teacher didn't want to admit such an unattractive new pupil! She tried to turn him away from the door!"

"Oh me, oh my!" groaned Tubal mournfully.

"Exactly. But Booker looked so downright brokenhearted that she gave him one chance. 'The recitation room needs sweeping,' she said, 'take this broom and sweep it!' So Booker took the broom and swept that room once. He swept that room twice. He swept that room three times. Then he dusted once. He dusted it twice. He dusted

The Explorers' Club

it three times. He dusted it four times! Until there wasn't a speck of dust big enough to fit on the end of the littlest pin in the world. Then he called the teacher."

"I 'spect she jess natcherly admired that room," Tubal beamed.

"She did! So Booker Washington stayed, and he worked his way all through Hampton with the same thoroughness he used in sweeping rooms. And after he graduated he started a little school of his own. That little school grew into a big school. And Booker Washington grew from a poor boy into an unknown young man, then into a famous well-known man. But the fine part of this story is that the Baptist folks have a school in this very state where boys just exactly like you can earn their way through, and I'm going to arrange with Aunt Amanda for you to go there."

Tubal jumped to his feet in stunned delight: "Me go to such a school? Oh Mistah Fairfax sah! Oh me, oh my! But say, Mistah Fairfax, don't you go troublin' Miss Amandy 'bout me till I rakes the lawn for her. Miss Amandy she's a speck like that there teacher Mistah Booker Washington once had: Miss Amandy's got her eye on me to figger out what kind of a boy I'se gwine to be; and to tell the truf, Mistah Fairfax, sah, I'se nuffin but a lazy li'l no-account darky. So jess gib me time to rake that lawn once and rake that lawn twice and rake that lawn three times till there ain't a leaf left nowhere on the grass, all the same as Mistah Booker Washington fixed that room of his all neat and tidy. Jess gib me time!"

So Mr. Fairfax gave him time.

And that is how it came to pass that today Miss Amanda often smooths her black taffeta ruffles and delights to tell all her southern neighbors how Tubal is not as black as he was painted: "He's a right smart boy, Tubal is! How do we know what any colored boy can become if he only gets an ideal and sticks to it? I reckon from all I hear that that Baptist school is as proud of Tubal as I am!"

How to Join Our Explorers' Club

Dear Boys and Girls:

You have been giving me some of my nicest and some of my queerest moments this past week—nice, because so many letters have come from you asking about our new Explorers' Club and how to join it; and queer, because two of you who went exploring found the very same wonderful story which I had also found and had already sent off to press a week ago for our page! You can imagine how strange it was for me, after mailing my own story to Chicago to open these two envelopes and find Booker Washington's plucky story staring at me. But I don't think it can be told too often, so you will have three different opportunities to read it this month.

And now about the Explorers' Club: it is a new club for any boy or girl under sixteen who may join by the simple process of this initiation fee: go exploring and then spend two cents mailing your "find" to me or some story about the new subject to be announced for each month, for March the topic is "The Negroes in America." Mail these "finds" or stories to me at 21 Arnold Park, Rochester, N. Y., and we can make our page a very interesting corner.

Your watching-for-the-postman friend,

MARGARET T. APPEGARTH.

Dear Editor:

I have been exploring for stories about the negroes, and I am sending you one that I found. It is about Booker Washington, and I would like to see it on the Boys' and Girls' page. I think that the story of Booker Washington is very interesting, and I believe that others will like it too.

Before I close I want to tell you how I enjoy the Boys' and Girls' page, and the Explorers' Club is going to be real interesting.

Hoping that all the boy and girl explorers all over the land have a great success, I am, yours truly,

Nathana Cameron,
Alta Vista, Kan.

Dear Miss Applegarth:

I would like to join the Explorers' Club. It sounds as if I could do these things, for I like exploring. Mother helped me find in a back number of Missions the names of negroes' schools which Baptists have. These are called Spelman seminary, for girls, an A-1 school; Morehouse college; Bishop college; Mather school at Beaufort; Virginia Baptist college. In Richmond, Va., there is the only woman president of a bank in the whole United States, and she is a negro. During the war she could loan the city $100,000 for schools when no other bank in town had enough surplus.

I am glad to join your club. Very lovingly yours,

Alice Benson Brown,
Pittsburgh, Pa.

"Meeting Helps" on C. L. P. Topics for April 4

(Note: All references hereafter made in these "Meeting Helps" will be to the following books: "Modern Discipleship and What It Means" by Woods; "Twelve Tests of Character" by Fosdick; "The Man Nobody Knows" by Barton; "Gates and Keys to Bible Books" by Robinson; "How We Got Our Bible" by Smyth; "A Short History of the Christian Church" by Moncrief; "Peasant Pioneers" by Miller; "God's Dynamite" by Lerrigo. The books may be had from the American Baptist Publication Society. A few others may be added later.)

* * *

"Tell me how a man spends his spare time and I will tell you what kind of a man he is."

If you will read in "Modern Discipleship and What It Means" from page 103 to 119, you will receive quite a bit of inspiration and help with the topic.

Since this is Eastertime, and Easter lilies are seen everywhere, why not use one as an example for the lesson? Perhaps you could borrow from the church those that are (as a rule) used in the worship services. Then, in presenting the lesson, you may show that the lilies are always "living for others," cheering people and brightening the spots where they grow. The parallel may be drawn that we, too, should be doing this.

Then in contrast, show that the cactus is so busy protecting itself—living for itself—that it is ugly. Perhaps you may have a cactus plant at the meeting, and have it near the lily to show forcibly the difference. Show the thorns which the cactus has, and perhaps several of those present could touch them in order to get an idea of what they are like. The parallel may then be drawn that if we live only for ourselves, our lives will become like that cactus—ugly and thorny—something with which people do not like to come in contact.

Perhaps you know of a few poems or stories which will help to further illustrate the lesson. Ask the young people for some of their thoughts on the subject. In conclusion, bring out the point that since this is Easter—the time of resurrection—we should in our lives resolve to LIVE—for others.

Conversation Sunday

A suggested program for "tuning in" on the Baptist Young People's conversation, April 11

Are you really energetic? All Baptist Young People's groups that are energetic are "tuning in" on April 11, the Sunday after Easter. If you haven't laid your plans for it yet, better write the Baptist Young People's Union of America, 2328 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, and tell them what the membership of your group is and ask them to send you the material necessary for you to get "in on the game."

Advertise the Meeting

Of course you are going to "tell the people" about this unique meeting. See Young People's Leader for April for some suggestions on publicity for this occasion.

Be Prepared

See that every member of the group has a pencil or pen before beginning. If at all possible use tables, seating the folk around three sides of them, but facing front. Have the tables arranged in a semi-circle. On each table put enough hymn-books and pencils to go around. Before the meeting begins, let the leader be in his place, and the piano play softly "Love Divine." Be sure to have the numbers of the hymns looked up before you come.

The Program

Here is a suggested order of service: Tuning in with song: Love Divine, O Worship the King, What a Friend, 6:50.

Tuning in with prayer. Read together, aloud, "Have Thine Own Way." Repeat together, up through "Thy kingdom come on earth as it is in heaven" of the Lord's Prayer, 7:05.

Tuning in with Jesus. Let the leader, or one who has been chosen before and has practiced, read the beatitudes, Matt. 5:1-12, 7:10.

Tuning in with song: There's a wilderness, 7:12.

Tuning in with the record. Have the ushers (chosen a week before) distribute conversation records while the piano plays "Onward Christian Soldiers." Let all begin at once. Let the leader also fill out a record. When most have finished, sign off as follows (7:15):

Signing off with song "Blest Be the Tie that Binds" (sung while standing, without accompaniment). God Be with You (let this be the benediction). 7:30

In Jesus' day the disciples all gathered in one room to talk about the problems of their day. And he was with them. But there are many of us. On April 11 let us gather together in many rooms to talk about the problems of our day. And he will be with us.

A "Booster"

From the White Temple of San Diego (John Bunyan Smith, pastor) come each week a little mimeographed sheet giving information about the seven groups of young people in the church. B. Y. P. U. Booster gives the attendance at all meetings on Sunday, and it is interesting to note that usually the attendance is greater than the enrolment. The enrolment, however, goes higher and higher each week.

These seven groups are always busy during the week. The Booster reminds the members of the banquets, parties, hikes, basketball games, school of missions, within the church, to say nothing of events outside. All district, state and national affairs are herein listed. For example, in one issue attention is called to a rally of the Southern California B. Y. P. U. Another issue announces a students' conference at Redlands. All issues have a little squib about the Los Angeles convention.

Scattered between news items are jokes, so that one must read all to get them.

The director of young people's work at the White Temple is deserving of a great deal of credit. Mr. Maurice I. Hodge, formerly of Wichita, Kan., is an enthusiastic young people's worker and understands the needs and tendencies of his young people. Although he advises with them, the young people themselves take entire charge of the editing of this B. Y. P. U. Booster.

It would seem that a little paper like this, edited and distributed by the young people, would create a greater interest in the work of these groups, as well as keeping the young people informed of all subjects pertaining to their work.

As the rooster said to the hens, showing them an ostrich egg, "We're not complaining about your past efforts, but look at this and do your best."

About the Printed Page

"Am 'tickled to death' with the new Young People's Leader. So far, I have found the devotional outlines very good and we have had three real good meetings through their help. The articles in the fore part of the book are great, as they cover our very needs (practical suggestions and helps on social, advertising, and missionary committees).

Among Ourselves

A British Causerie

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

Our Sunday Schools

A VERY serious correspondence is proceeding in the columns of our leading Sunday-school journal on the declining Sunday-school. For more than a decade the numbers in attendance at the schools have been declining, and at length the position is regarded as grave. A number of leading men have been invited to express their views as to the causes of this decline. This is to be followed by the appointment of an international commission to face the facts and to suggest a new policy of religious education for the young in the churches. So far the views elicited express two convictions, namely; that the schools may be suffering from over organization, and that the quality of the teachers may leave much to be desired. The graded methods have now been in operation for twenty years, and it is time to ask whether or not they are sound and effective. For my part I am bound to believe that the methods are psychologically right, but whether they are spiritually applied is quite another question. For after all it is the personality of the teacher that really counts in the final analysis. Unfortunately in the past we have had to take what teachers we could get, and some of them, while well training, have not been either spiritually or mentally fit for their task. There seems to be a real danger in the purely mechanical method of converting the other scholars into teachers simply as a means of retaining them in the school. The question turns upon the degree of spiritual experience required by one who undertakes to teach children in Sunday schools. The simple teaching of a lesson, however skilfully done, is not sufficient. A teacher is, or should be, out to the children for Christ; but how can he do this unless he knows Christ himself? Had the churches really believed in their evangelistic mission, would they not have set themselves to win men and women for the most delicate work in the world? It is a good sign, however, that the seriousness of the situation is being realized and we have hope for a real revival in the church itself.

Reason for Protestant Losses
Meanwhile Catholics are gaining ground rapidly and are capturing children for their own schools. One paper, commenting upon Protestant losses, justly ascribes them to the lack of white Christian teaching among us. Catholic child, it is pointed out, at least know the meaning of his religion. The priest sees to this. But our weakness lies here that we have been far too much absorbed with the work of attracting masses of people—and that often in questionable ways—while we have neglected the fundamental work of teaching Christian truth. Hence vast numbers of Protestants are quite ignorant of the meaning of evangelical truth, and their children are as ignorant as their sires. Preaching has been far too rhetorical and too little didactic. A great fight is ahead in this country between the prophet and the priest. It looks as if the battle of the Reformation may have to be fought all over again, and at present we are ill-equipped for the fray. Nothing can secure for evangelical truth a decisive victory, save a return to the former well-tried method of definite teaching. The nebulous theology which is the product of intellectual indolence, and of which we have had far too much in recent years, will have to go, and be replaced by a virile doctrine which, taking account of all that God has revealed to us in recent times, must yet be fundamentally one with the doctrine of the apostles and of the living church in all ages.

The Baptist Union Commissioner

The Baptist Union has made a brave attempt to deal with the situation, by appointing a special commissioner of religious education who is devoting his whole time to visiting the churches in the interests of the young people. No better man than the Rev. Peter T. Thomson, M.A., could have been found for the position. He is a scholar, a preacher, a man with a vision and with a wide experience. In Leeds and Leicester he did magnificent work. In the latter town he built up a great men's movement. Nearly 1000 men were in attendance every Sunday afternoon. Mr. Thomson has every qualification, therefore, for his new post. Recently he has been my guest and I have been enabled to see him at close range. The series of meetings he has held in this city have been remarkable in every way not least for the disquiet they have caused in the minds of many who had got into a rut. I have never heard more challenging addresses than his. He compels people to face realities, and he sends them to prayer. When the World Alliance meets in Toronto in 1928 I hope that thousands from all over the world will be able to listen to him. I am sure that he is on the right lines.

Church Union Again

The debate on reunion is now being transferred to the daily press. A leading London paper has invited a number of responsible church leaders to contribute to a symposium upon the subject. The bishop of Winchester, who is a high churchman, led off with a call to reunion which he believes can easily be achieved along certain lines. The case for the Baptists was put by Dr. Charles Brown in a very terse manner. He points out that we can make no terms with the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, which is an unscriptural and mischievous error. Again Baptists could never be part of a state church. The Baptist doctrine of the church is the true high church doctrine; the Erastian doctrine is low church in the worst sense, in that it destroys the separation between the church and the world. Then Baptists could not accept episcopacy. To Doctor Brown corporate union is a long way off. The obstacles are insuperable along Anglican lines. But he cannot see why there should not be a union of denominations, each preserving its autonomy as each state in the United States does, and each observing its own ritual and form of government.

An interesting sidelight on the discussion came from an unexpected quarter on the very day that the first of the articles appeared. A conference had been arranged to take place at Watford near London upon the subject of reunion. Free Churchmen and Anglicans were to share the discussions, and the proceedings were to commence with a united communion service to be held in an Anglican church and in which our ministers were to take part. A prominent Anglo Catholic, learning of this arrangement, telegraphed that he would not attend the conference if the communion service were held. Whereupon the bishop took fright and at once withdrew his sanction for the conference, which of course was not held. In a letter to the press the bishop justifies his action on the ground that the service would be contrary to church order and

Love's Kingdom

(Tune, "Absent")

BY ROBERT WHITAKER

SOMETIMES when bud and
bloom are everywhere,
When springtime fragrance fills the quicken air,
My heart is filled with heavenly hope and cheer,
Thinking love's kingdom,
Thinking love's kingdom here.

And when the winter winds and storms are rife,
When nature's mood is one of gloom and strife,
I still hold fast my faith that time

Thinking love's kingdom,
Thinking love's kingdom sure.

discipline. Yet he had given his sanction to the conference and had himself promised to speak in a Congregational church.

An incident such as this shows what a hopeless task they are engaged in who are seeking to promote reunion. All the demands are to be made by one side and all the concessions by the other. It is not good enough. It is quite idle to attempt to mask the real situation. The Anglo Catholic does not want any reunion which involves the surrender of his priestly claims. Every time it is the priest who is the rock of offense, and it is quite hopeless to attempt a reconciliation between ideas which are radically opposed to each other. The correspondence in the Express had undoubtedly done good in bringing into the open the real question that has to be faced. It has made the average man understand a little better what a gulf there is between the sacerdotal and the evangelical outlook upon life. We all agree, however, that in practical matters which affect human weal, there is no reason why some sort of union should not be effected tomorrow.

Doctor Shakespeare

Recently I referred to the new secretary of the Baptist Union, Rev. M. E. Aubrey, and to the new hopes which have been awakened by his appointment. But none must be allowed to forget the immense debt we owe to his illustrious predecessor, Doctor Shakespeare, who is now permanently invalidated. When he entered upon his work he found the Baptist Union occupying one or two rooms in a side street in London. His genius conceived the idea of a central site in the heart of London, and to it we owe the noble pile of buildings now known as the Baptist church house. Doctor Shakespeare was very keen on reunion and he worked hard to secure a better understanding between the churches. While it is true that some of his brethren could not follow him in all his proposals it is also true that he never departed from the Baptist faith. In a notable sermon delivered in Bristol cathedral he set forth the Baptist position in unmistakable terms. And there can be no doubt that he won for Baptists a respect which had not always been accorded them. Now that he is weak and ill and retired from public life, his great achievement for us should be remembered with gratitude and affection. He has laid a great foundation upon which his successor can the more easily build.

Wisconsin News Letter

By ROLLO C. SPEER

Baptists in Prison in Wisconsin

WHAT a stir that headline would create if Baptists were being put there for the sake of the faith. But they are there, as they are in every state, for other reasons. The Bay View church of Milwaukee has recently subscribed for ten copies of THE BAPTIST to be used by ten men in the state prison at Waupun. Rev. H. C. Carnell, pastor of this enterprising church, is seeing signs of a greatly revived church. Under the caption of "Meet Our New Members" in the last issue of his parish paper he introduces seventeen new members. Other signs of progress attend them.

Of One Blood—All

Rev. Louis Stumpf of Cleveland has begun work among the Hungarians of Milwaukee. He finds several Baptist families and proposes to organize a mission for aggressive work. They will meet for the present in Tabernacle church.

Rev. A. Soltys at Christ Polish church had a special session of evangelism with Rev. H. Schilke of Pound, Wis., and Rev. R. C. Speer of Milwaukee preaching in two languages each night.

Visitors

Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougner's visit to Milwaukee was an outstanding event of the year. About 1200 Baptists from the city and neighborhood came together in the auditorium where the Northern Baptist Convention was held two years ago. It was said to be the best gathering of Baptists ever held locally. They are still talking about the spirit of "Play Ball."

Rev. C. Francis Stifler delighted the combined young people's groups at the First Baptist church on March 2 in a banquet address of power. About 225 were present. He also addressed the ministers at a noon-day luncheon.

Up-State Evangelism

Pastor W. H. Sproule of Baraboo reports an unusually good meeting with Rev. Mr. Hoekstra of Portage leading the singing and Rev. Brittain Ross of the Eastline church, Nashville, Tenn., preaching. Several additions to the church.

Rev. J. J. Donnelly of Augusta reports ten recent additions and Rev. V. N. Doody of Verona eleven, all by confession of faith.

Warrens, where Rev. J. J. Johnson is pastor, is again revived. Last year the people here had the greatest ingathering for many years and now again twenty-five have come, among them thirteen men. This is an unusual revival of a church in a small town and difficult field.

At Campbellsport, Rev. A. W. Stevens, pastor, reports six converts and three associate members receiving baptism.

Marinette, where Rev. Kirby Chapman is closing a four-years' pastorate, reports in the four years fifty-nine additions. During this time Mr. Chapman has rendered exceptionally good service in helping other pastors in vital evangelistic campaigns.

Waukesha, Rev. A. L. Drake, pastor, reports thirteen decisions for Christ.

Interdenominational Cooperation

Baptists can often cooperate with other churches to great advantage. At Neenah the united effort of the churches in a four-day campaign in Passion week is reported. Rev. U. E. Gibson is active in this movement. At Delevan, Rev. John Estes is leading his church in cooperation with the other churches in a religious census of the town.

Milwaukee Baptist churches cooperate in theatre meetings in Passion week.

New Church Buildings

The Elkhorn church which suffers the loss of its building by fire a year ago has voted unanimously to rebuild. It has been using the fine communion house for worship during the period. Rev. J. W. Clevenger is leading the church in this effort to rebuild.

Appleton, Rev. E. M. Salter, pastor, is raising $30,000 for an educational plant. Half of this is to be given by a man not a member of the church. This will give this church, located in college town, a very much needed equipment.

Unusual Pastorate

A notable pastorate does not end by vote of the church continues, Stevens Point. Rev. James Blake has rounded out twenty-one years of service and the church calls him for another term of five years. A new parsonage has been bought. This church will entertain the state convention in June. Pastor Blake is one of the oldest pastors in point of service in Wisconsin and his friends congratulate him upon the honor the church has given him.

Pastoral Changes

Rev. Robt. H. Pratt of Mt. Carmel, Ill., has been called to the church at Evansville, Wis. Rev. T. Nelson Almond goes to Rhinelander while Rev. C. J. Bergstrom of Rhinelander goes to Iowa to accept a pastorate there. Rev. Myron Campbell of the Northern Baptist seminary has accepted a call to Cassville. Rev. A. W. Stevens moves from Campbellsport to Clinton. Rev. Chas. R. Polley has recently settled with the Plainfield church. Rev. E. H. Otto, who has been supplying our German Baptist church at Watertown is now available for such work or a pastorate where his splendid gifts may be used. Rev. G. Wetter of Alpena, Mich., will begin his pastorate at Watertown, April 1.

Doctor LeGrand was loaned to South Dakota Baptists for their pastors' conference recently. Secy. John L. Bartlett writes us a congratulatory letter and thanks for his valuable services there.

Our Wisconsin churches are making wide use of the stereopticon lectures furnished by our headquarters' repository. The moving pictures of Wisconsin Baptist activities are also being used.

Survey and Prospect

Under the direction of Grace Baptist church, Rev. E. G. Mintz, pastor, the state convention has been making a survey of a new and growing section of Milwaukee. Mrs. W. S. Lincoln has been bringing her best to this canvass and they reported back to the Milwaukee Baptist Union on March 1. Over 1000 calls have been made and mission church is recommended.

Tabernacle church has surveyed the Hungarian population and finds that a large portion of them live in its jurisdiction of the city. The church is studying the problem with a view to entering the field of service.

East Washington and North Idaho Convention

By A. H. BAILEY

THE Mount Pleasant association, the first of the spring associations in this convention, was held with the White Temple church of Walla Walla, Wash., March 2-3. It was by far the best meeting in point of attendance and interest and reports that has been held in many a year. The Mount Pleasant association is the oldest one in the convention and is the mother of three other associations which were formed from the original, one of them in Oregon, one in Idaho and one in Washington. Owing to its generosity in giving up churches to form other associations, the original Mount Pleasant association has dwindled to a total of seven churches. Of these, three are to all appearances dead, not holding any regular services. Three new pastors have recently come to the field; as all are men of marked ability there is much reason to hope for good things for these churches. Rev. Frederick W. Carstens has accepted the pastorate of the Kennewick church. Rev. A. B. Baird has come to the Day-View church, which is the oldest living church in the convention; and Rev. Delbert Loree is just beginning his work with the Pomeroy church which has been closed for seven or more years but which is now opening under Mr. Loree's leadership with considerable promise. At the association the churches reported a total of forty-five baptisms and a total gain in membership from 815 last year to 843 this year. The fly in the ointment is the large number of non-residents, the churches reporting 100 non-residents. When will our churches face this source of weakness and deal with it justly, yet courageously? The Walla Walla church, with Pastor E. Davis, entertained the association in the old-fashioned style, not only furnishing bed and breakfast, but feeding delegates and visitors three hearty meals a day. The hospitality of this church is well-known. The spiritual condition of all of the churches seems to be on the up-grade. Among the resolutions passed was a very strong resolution to support the missionary work of the Northern Baptist Convention as at present organized, and to support the earnest effort of the government in the enforcement of the nineteenth amendment.

North Dakota Notes

On Feb. 28 Dr. Fred E. Stockton completed six years of service as general superintendent of the North Dakota Convention. During these years Doctor Stockton has traveled 150,000 miles, written 25,000 letters and made 450 visits to fields and churches. Over $300,000 have been received in the various convention accounts.

Dr. James Whitcomb Brounger visited Fargo, Feb. 26, and delivered his "Play" lecture before 800 people. Hundreds more listened in over the radio. Fifteen Baptist churches were represented. At the close of the address the congregation voted enthusiastically to support the missionary program of the Northern Baptist Convention and to make a heroic effort to raise the state's quota.

The board of managers of the convention held its semi-annual meeting in the First church of Fargo, Feb. 26. Seventeen out of twenty-one members were present. At this time the board appointed the field workers and made the appropriations to missionary churches. The board also sat as an apportionment committee and worked out a schedule of suggested missionary allotments for the Convention Notice

THE next meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention will be held in Washington, D. C., May 25-30, 1926. The by-laws of the convention provide:

"(a) Any Baptist church in the United States may appoint one delegate and one additional delegate for every one hundred members, provided the church during the year immediately preceding the annual meeting of the convention shall have cooperated in the financial support of the work of at least one of the cooperating organizations of the Northern Baptist Convention, or the work of the ministers and missionaries benefit board of the Northern Baptist Convention, or the work of the board of education of the Northern Baptist Convention.

"(b) Accredited officers and members of boards of managers of the organizations named in the preceding paragraph shall be delegates ex officio.

"(c) Officers and members of committees of the convention during their terms of service shall be delegates ex officio."

In estimating the number of delegates to which any church is entitled, fractions of one hundred are not to be represented. Of course, only contributing churches, as indicated, are entitled to delegates.

Blank credential cards for delegates from churches will be distributed by the state convention secretaries to whom applications must be made for these credential cards which are to be signed by either the clerk or the pastor of the church sending delegates. Of course, no delegate should sign his own credentials. All credentials will be inspected by the local committee of registration at Washington. No credential cards are transferable. Enrollment cards must be properly filled up by the delegates themselves after arrival in Washington.

Those entitled to ex officio credentials as delegates will receive them by mail. The registration fee provided for in the by-laws is $2 for each delegate. The money received from these fees is expected to pay for the printed reports distributed at the convention, the railroad expenses of those who speak at the invitation of the program committee, and for such other expenses as properly belong to the delegates. It also provides for the sending of the Annual to each delegate.

convention churches for 1926-27. By vote of the board the convention this year will convene on Sept. 30, the place to be determined later.

Thirty series of revival meetings either have been held in North Dakota churches or are planned for the period ending Easter Sunday. Evangelist and Mrs. Aldridge are at present leading in a union campaign at Bismarck. Their next campaign will be at Minot.

A Baptist Petition to the King of Roumania

By DR. J. H. RUSHBROOKE

THE latest information from Roumania is that neither the parliamentary commission nor the government has made any concession to the Baptist claim. The law of cults will probably be adopted in a form that denies to our brethren statutory recognition as a religious confession and leaves them as hitherto at the mercy of the police and the administration.

The Roumanian Baptists intensely dread such a fate, and have reason enough to dread it. On Feb. 9 they presented to their king a solemn protest and petition. The document recalls the recognition and freedom which Transylvanian Baptists enjoyed as Hungarian subjects, contrasts this with their treatment under Roumania, and earnestly appeals for genuine religious freedom.

The perusal of the petition (of which a translation has reached London) brings home the fact that there is no question of a mere label or of concern for the merely formal acknowledgment of an abstract right. The petition to the king states that "after the reunion of the Roumanian country with the new provinces, the Baptist confession has been subjected by the authorities unto a long line of oppressions, ignoring the laws on which the rights of Baptists were based. This line of persecution is endless, and in order that your majesty may know what this people suffer we briefly state some of the facts."

The facts are serious enough. In extensive districts Baptist worship has been from time to time arbitrarily forbidden. Divine service has often been interrupted by gendarmes. Worshipers have been fined, beaten and imprisoned. Bibles and hymn books have been seized and burned. Children of Baptist parents have been registered as Orthodox. The building of chapels has been forbidden, and permission to open completed buildings withheld. Places of worship have been closed and sealed by the police; some are still closed. In the army Baptists have been bullied and denied the right to participate in the worship of their own communion. Preachers have been hindered from visiting their congregations and stations. These are but a few items; the catalogue of grievances is far longer in the deliberate and solemn statement which the Roumanians have presented to their king. Among other points they add that functionaries of the ministry of cults have themselves written and distributed books against Baptists.

This most grave indictment of Roumanian administration, put forward in the name of a denomination which in the body of the petition claims to number over 185,000 members (including adherents and children), will serve to bring home to the world the substantial grounds of the Baptist protest. Our people claim for themselves nothing which is not a common human right. They have been, during the post-war years, exposed to such suffering as under the Hungarian government they never knew. The Roumanian parliament would offer the world an assurance of its good faith in dealing with minorities if it now placed the rights and liberties of these loyal, honest and God-fearing citizens on the definite basis of permanent law.

Letter from Japan

By GEORGE D. SHEPARDSON

WE ARE making very efficient use of a few days in and about Yokohama, thanks to the remarkably thorough and excellent work of the American Express Company in organizing and carrying out the plans so that everything is ready for us with a minimum of delay and that mostly caused by inexperienced travelers who do not yet entirely realize the necessity of each one being on time at the appointed place.

The trip up the bay was interesting with many islands and strange-looking boats. The country did not look so green as it did in the Sandwich Islands, both because it is winter and about a thousand miles farther north, and because a much smaller part of the land is level enough for cultivation. The port doctors came on board at about noon, and we were inspected rapidly, and soon were alongside the dock. Here we were much pleased to find one of our missionaries (Professor R. H. Fisher, of the Mabie Memorial School in Yokohama) waiting to greet us, in accordance with previous correspondence, and were doubly glad to know that he had completed his official New Year's calls and was free to accompany us. So after lunching together on the ship, we took train for Tokio and then autos, getting glimpses of the city headquarters of the Y.M.C.A. and their new building now under construction. Then we found the Baptist (Misaki) Tabernacle open and were much interested to find it a thoroughly modern reinforced concrete building that had been thoroughly re-conditioned since the Tokio fire burned its finishings. Just inside the door of the institutional part, we were interested to find something that looked much like a wire waste basket filled with straw slippers, while along the walls were cabinets of small lockers just large enough to hold one pair of the curious wooden shoes they wear in the streets. Since the streets are muddy or otherwise dirty, and since the Japanese generally sit on the floor instead of on chairs, it is important for them to keep their floors clean. They seem to be industrious in keeping their places clean, and they excel us in keeping the dirt out, for they take off their street shoes before entering the house, while we merely scrape off some of the coarser dirt sometimes and track much of it into the house.

Coming back to the Tabernacle, while there were no students there, because

Digest of the Executive Committee Meeting

THE executive committee of the Northern Baptist Convention met in Chicago, March 2, 1926. All the members were present, or sent regrets which explained their absence.

The executive committee adopted an annuity plan which in no way conflicts with similar plans adopted by the co-operating organizations of the convention, and which retains the same financial scale upon which these have been established. The purposes of these annuities are annual payments to benevolent, missionary and educational enterprises in accordance with the wishes of the annuitants. The income from these gifts will not be used for the payment of the administration expenses of the convention.

The committee on investments was organized, and reported progress.

The law committee presented its report in compliance with the request of the executive committee. Copies of this report have been released for publication.

Statements were made by Doctors Bowler and Brougher concerning the work of the Board of Missionary Cooperation.

The committee on program for the Washington Convention, of which Dr. J. F. Herget is chairman, reported. Arrangements for the convention meeting are progressing very satisfactorily. The Washington hotel has been selected as "headquarters."

A minute on the death of Mr. Frank L. Miner was adopted, and Mrs. Frank L. Miner was appointed treasurer to fill the vacancy created by her husband's death.

Rev. Charles W. Gilkey, Chicago, Ill., was appointed to fill the vacancy on the board of managers of the board of education created by the death of President E. D. Burton.

An appropriation for the Baptist World Alliance was made, so that the contribution of the Northern Baptist Convention to that organization will be brought up to $2500 for the current year.

The application of the Baptist Extension Society of Newark and Vicinity for recognition as a standard city mission society, class A, was granted.

The next meeting of the executive committee will be held in Washington, D. C., on Monday, May 24, 8 p. m.

—W. C. BITTING,

Corresponding Secretary.

all were away celebrating the holiday, we were interested in seeing the new rooms, the small desks in classroom and the equipment for kindergarten grade, while out in the school yard behind were swings and slides and other helps to play and exercise, much found in our American schoolyards. A interesting feature was a miniature garden on one side of the playground. The flat roof was arranged as another playground, protected by high fencing, and ornamented with miniature dwarfed trees in pots at intervals along the sides, while at one side was another small garden with a minute water pot or lakelet. Overhanging the sidewalk was an electric sign notifying people that they were doing religious business. On the second floor, reached by a stairway directly from the street was an auditorium very much like an American church with pulpit and platform and piano, while a deep gallery went around two sides. We were interested to learn that the Japanese have their own church organization which they conduct themselves, and that now they welcome cooperation by the Americans. The Tabernacle is near the center of Tokio and since the district has been swept by fire five times since the Tabernacle was erected (after the great fire of 1923) that all structures made fireproof within five years. Fortunately the Tabernacle as restored re-conditioned is fireproof. The Tabernacle is a plant we need not be ashamed of, a light set in a dark place. I might add that the rooms are equipped with electric heater, appreciated source of comfort.

Waseda

From the Tabernacle we rode about three miles through a densely populated part of Tokio to the Baptist compound near Waseda University. The compound included about two acres surrounded by an open fence on some sides and by a wall on the street side. The new three-story (2½) brick building at the far left corner was the home of Dr. H. Benninghoff and his associates. We did not go in, since our feet were mud from the walk of about a block through mud from the street, there being no sidewalk in the short street, this being out close to the city limits. The residence building looked quite comfortable and the doctor regretted that we would not come in. He took us over to neighboring three-story institution building known as Scott Hall where were good sized auditorium, several classrooms, committee rooms, a general club room and other facilities for the entertainment and comfort of the students from Waseda University. I should judge that on occasion they could handle gatherings of about 400 people. Fireplaces and radiators indicated that students might be comfortable here, in great contrast to the usual scarcity of heat in Japanese houses, while an interesting kitchen indicated that the inner man was catered to on occasion.

Near another corner of the compound was the Hovey Dormitory, where I believe that about fifty students find student homes. As we were there on New Years Day, all activities were quiet, practically all of the students having gone away for the two-weeks holiday.

Inquiry indicated that this Christian institution is highly appreciated both by students and by the university authorities. Most of the students live under conditions that seem to be counter to the development of moral character, and it involves a terrific struggle by any student who determines to live a clean life. Our Baptist plant seems to be the outstanding clean place attached to Waseda, University with its 10,000 students, and seems to be doing much good in bringing some of them into contact with Christian institutions and with Christian people. The gymnasium which is soon to be erected in the Baptist compound will doubtless be instrumental in getting contact with many new students. Waseda is a privately endowed university under Japanese management.

We drove around to the home of Dr. and Mrs. Axling and had a pleasant call. Found them living in an interesting house of Japanese construction with light sliding partitions, sliding doors from outside into the rooms, some furniture, but evidently planned for visitors to sit on mats on the floor in accordance with Japanese custom. As we had but little time and it was cold, we did not feel like taking off our shoes to enter the house to accept the proffered hospitality, but we did manage to appreciate that our missionaries were living under conditions that lack many of the comforts to which we are accustomed at home.

We planned to have Dr. and Mrs. Axling with Mr. and Mrs. Fisher, taking a trip with us on the ship, Mr. and Mrs. Brockman, members of the First Baptist church, Denver, Colo., joining us. The Axlings had gone on a trip, but we enjoyed a very pleasant evening with the Fishers. Two items stood out prominently in our conversation. From experience with Japanese students who have returned from American universities, Mr. Fisher is convinced that Christian people in college communities are missing a great opportunity to impress future leaders of Japanese thought by neglecting to invite Asiatic students to one or more meals in Christian homes. They seem to be very lonesome and discouraged in the foreign land, and appreciate very highly any disinterested attention given them by Christian people. Many of them return to Japan and report that in America they have known nothing or little of the effects of Christianity and have had no contact with the Christianity they had been led to expect. We are evidently missing opportunities to do effective work with these leaders while they are in impressionable mood. I am convinced that the cultivation of these students, who generally are the cream of the rising generation of leaders, should be on the hearts and in the homes of Christian people who live in the vicinity of the universities where foreigners attend.

We did not get over to see Mabie Memorial Institute at Yokohama. We were told that the buildings had been mostly destroyed by earthquake and fire, and that temporary shacks were being used. Since the work was inactive on account of the students being away for the New Year, and since it was a long trip across the city, we did not make the effort in our crowded schedule.

Mr. Fisher tells us that one of their greatest difficulties is the leakage as converts move from one place to another. They retain citizenship in their home town even after they have moved away and have set up homes in another town, and persistently keep their membership from being transferred. Moreover since the territory has been allocated between the denominations, a convert from a Presbyterian district moving to a Baptist district where there is only a Baptist church finds himself in the predicament of being a Christian and yet not eligible to membership in the Christian church of that place. I urged careful consideration of our type of associate membership for such cases. There is effective interdenominational comity in avoiding overlapping of Christian work in Japan, but some things are not yet entirely solved. Our problem of non-resident membership in America is less complicated than the corresponding one in Japan.

With the Board of Missionary Cooperation

ONE sometimes hears the argument that budgets, effective organization and denominational cooperation on a systematic basis are not practical in the case of the small church. The truth is that it would certainly be difficult and probably impossible to find a church of any size that has experienced the transformation from a condition of narrow and purely local interest to one of real missionary spirit, that has not been improved from every point of view. The missionary church is the one that cheers the heart of its pastor by giving him whole-hearted support in every undertaking that he launches for the advancement of Christ's kingdom. This holds for the small church in the country as unfailingly as for the biggest church in the biggest city. Many specific cases might be cited in evidence from the records obtained since the denomination began to put special emphasis on the every-member plan.

Two typical instances appear in a report that has just come in at the moment of writing. One is that of a church that was almost out of existence. The pastor received a salary of $700 a year and was obliged to give part of his time to another field in order to add $350 a year to his income. The best record of giving for missions was $100 a year. Then a field worker appeared on the scene and persuaded this somewhat discouraged pastor and his flock to put on an every-member plan. The plan is just beginning to be effective, but the experience of putting it on has been such a wholesome leaven that the field worker reports: "Had the pleasure of seeing the church add $300 to the pastor's salary, and they are sure the mission money will double at least."

The other church was helped last year to make its first budget. It was asked to raise $400 for missions and actually gave $500. Every dollar scheduled in the budget for local work was raised and the state organization was relieved of a contribution of $100 to the pastor's salary. This $100 the church added to its budget, besides taking care of the pastor's pension payment and adding $100 to the contribution for missions. A rejoicing field worker wrote: "It would have done you good to see the joy of this church in the first year of real church efficiency and advance."

An imperative need today is a better understanding of the relation of the local Baptist church to the work of the denomination as a whole. There is not a clear enough perception of the fact that the action of every single local church has a vital bearing, not only on the continuance of home and foreign missions, but upon the support of every activity that is carried on in the name of the Northern Baptist Convention. Therefore the logical position of the individual church member might be declared thus:

"What I do in this matter of missionary contributions should be the thing that I would be willing to have the entire denomination do. If I am content that my church should default on its quota, or even not accept a quota, then I should be satisfied if every other church does the same. I know, and my church knows, that the great structure of Baptist missions, erected by the toil of more than a century, can be kept intact only as the local churches contribute to the denomination's missionary funds. If we really want to preserve and improve that noble structure, we will contribute to its upkeep."

Ours is a volunteer army, not only before but after enlistment, for nobody issues orders to a Baptist church. The concert of action that constitutes our denominational program depends absolutely upon the voluntary cooperation of local churches.

Does not a situation like this impose a special obligation—the obligation of the free to use their freedom for the common good? It is believed that not many Baptists would deny that the sense of Christian loyalty which should be a bond between all followers of the Master makes it impossible for us to be indifferent in this day and age to the subject of missions. No church and no church member can now be isolated in the old sense of the word. We know perfectly well that we cannot mass our forces too strongly to combat the tide of materialism that sweeps 'round the world. Therefore let us have straight-out decisions in every local church and enable all other Baptist churches to know just how we stand on the subject of missions.

Rev. J. Alfred Pierce has opened a new mission hall at Port-de-Paix, Haiti. He writes: "We commenced with a Sunday school at 9 a. m.; an hour later visited the prison where we held a gospel service; at 3 p. m. held our first public meeting in the hall, when the gospel was preached to thirty people; at 7:30 p. m. met again in the hall, when a Haitian evangelist preached in French; at 8 p. m. I addressed the same audience in English by special request of a few British subjects, and at 8:30 nine of us gathered around the Lord's table to remember his dying love. This was a time of great rejoicing for the Baptists here, as they have not had a pastor or a communion service for over two years. On Monday evening, we had our weekly prayer meeting, and on Thursday night the gospel was preached to about forty persons. The following Sunday we repeated the same program, with the exception of the Lord's Supper. We are starting a Bible class, with a few applicants for baptism and church membership. Our day school, opened Jan. 11, is the only Protestant day school in this town of 6000 inhabitants. Up to the present, the Protestant parents have been obliged to send their children to Roman Catholic schools.

Here, There and Everywhere

FIRST CHURCH of Columbus, O., Daniel F. Rittenhouse pastor, lately held its annual meeting and reports the best year in its history; 125 new members were added during the year. All the public services are broadcast and the public's appreciation has been expressed in valuable gifts which have greatly enriched the church treasury. The church is maturing plans for the expansion of the present building. The present building is often overcrowded at the evening service.

THE CHURCH at Tenant's Harbor, Me., closed its financial year with all bills paid, and next day came a check for $250 from a non-resident member with the assurance that it would be continued (Is this a suggestion as to the non-resident problem?) Another non-resident, a lady, has installed several ear phones in the church as a memorial of her father and mother.

IOWA FALLS CHURCH, IOWA, has received ten by baptism lately, also several by letter and experience. Two more are to be baptized soon; $140 was contributed to the Lone Star fund.

Brethren, Let Us Pray

By JOHN H. EARLE, DOVER, N. J.

BRETHREN, let us pray! So say the rank and file of the denomination. Arguments will never get us together, and controversy can serve only to drive us apart. Only submission to the mellowing influence of the Spirit of the living God can suffice at this time. We must pray! If we can get on our knees together, and tarry there till God melts us and makes his will and his way known to us, then and only then can we come to unity of thought.

Let us go to Washington to pray. Let us have a day, and a night too if necessary, of real praying preceding our May gathering. This is a serious and a definite suggestion. We must do business with God or we cannot do it for God in God's way—not this year.

The writer will be glad to hear from others who feel the same way. Doubtless our Washington brethren can arrange a place for us. In an informal, but in an intensely in earnest way, we can wait on the Lord. No addresses! no differences! no parties! Only a coming together of all our pastors, secretaries, delegates, friends, in a determined desire to save a great convention and a great denomination from making any mistakes or taking any false step.

Some are saying frankly that they do not care to go to Washington this year. If such a spirit prevails to any considerable extent it can be overcome only by a multitude of prayer meetings in the home churches during the early weeks of May, and by a multitude of men and women on their knees in the convention city for the hours immediately preceding the convention itself.

AT THE LAST COMMUNION SERVICE the right hand of good fellowship was extended to six new members at First church, Marion, Ind. During the past two Sundays six additional members have been received, three of whom came by profession of faith and baptism. The brotherhood of the church held its annual fathers and sons banquet, March 2. The speaker was I. Earle M. Ellsworth of Terre Haute, Ind. Mr. Edwin Phelps of Chicago, secretary of B. Y. P. U. of America was the speaker of the evening at a banquet of the youth people's department of the church held March 10.

DURING THE LAST THREE MONTHS 186 persons have joined the First church of Pittsburg, Kan. Pastor Clyde J. Askins has baptized ninety-six of them and others await the ordinance.

THE CHURCH in CRESTON, IOWA, J. Woodsum, pastor, has completed its fifteenth annual church school of missions, in some respects, the best of all. The average attendance was 101.

RECOGNITION SERVICES for Rev. Clara Bleakney, as minister of the Roseville church, Newark, New Jersey, were held Wednesday evening, Feb. 24.

ON FRIDAY, FEB. 28, a church social was held in honor of the new members who have come into the church at Anola, Minn., during the pastorate of Rev. L. Elgin Brown. During the last eighteen months, the pastorate has received sixty new members, forty-five of whom came by baptism. These have been the results of evangelism conducted by the pastor, without outside help. There were about 200 present at the social.

A TEMPORARY BAN on college activities at Ottawa University lasting only two days was lifted on the morning of Feb. 24, which was allowed to go on as usual. Four cases of scarlet fever were isolated and quarantined under the provisions made in regard to the protection of the student body in general. Class rooms in the main buildings were fumigated under the directions of the board of health.

PASTOR E. G. ZWAYER baptized four candidates at Leechburg, Pa., Feb. 28.

RANKIN CHRISTIAN CENTER, Pittsburgh, among its varied activities takes care of children of widowed mothers who must work for a living. Oakmont Baptist Sunday school has provided the expense of taking care for a year of Carmon De Gregoria, whose father served in the army of the United States in the world war.

REV. A. J. MEEK has closed a pastorate of nearly fourteen years at New Kensington, Pa. At the closing service he welcomed twelve new members into the church.

A COMMISSION OF STUDENTS at Bloomington, Ill., has been working upon a study of the place of students in the local church life, and the First church is taking steps to utilize the results of this study.

MONDAY EVENING, APRIL 5, Rev. and Mrs. Samuel Linge will celebrate at Okemos, Mich., the twenty-fifth anniversary of their marriage.

MR. K. HIJIKATA OF JAPAN was ordained to the ministry at First church, Sacramento, Calif., Feb. 18. Participating ministers were Bryant Wilson, C. H. Bancroft, A. Watson Brown, C. W. Brinstead, W. C. Whitaker and K. Maraoka.

FIRST CHURCH, LEBANON, IND., will provide robes for its choir.

HOOVER STREET CHURCH, Los Angeles, celebrated its tenth anniversary, Feb. 27.

REV. WM. CAREY WHITAKER, after more than nine years at Oak Park church, Sacramento, closed his work there March 15. Consideration of his health led him to deny the urgent request of his people that he remain as pastor. But he will continue to reside at 2848 Thirty-third street, Sacramento. Mr. and Mrs. Whitaker have three sons in missionary service, one in China and two in India.

FIRST CHURCH, WASHINGTON, IND., has called Rev. J. L. Henderson of Louisville, Ky., to begin April 1.

REV. S. A. HAYWORTH, 349 Westgate Avenue, St. Louis, Mo., after seventeen years of fruitful pastoral work, and discovering special evangelistic gifts, has spent a few years in equally fruitful evangelistic work. He is now available for a pastoral settlement. He has unblemished character and a good education.

A GROUP OF HIGH COUNSELLORS of the order of Royal Ambassadors met March 8 at the Hamilton Club, Chicago. Rev. W. A. Steinkraus, member from Logansport, Ind., has the only local chapter in the state, but it is full of enthusiasm and effectiveness.

FIRST CHURCH, YAKIMA, WASH., is considering seriously the matter of a new building.

PASTOR J. H. COZAD is having trouble at First church, Champaign, Ill., over the fact that his building will not hold the crowds. There were nineteen additions, Feb. 28, and thirty within the month.

SCHOOL OF MISSIONS at First church, Kankakee, Ill., had a term of eight weeks and an average attendance of 135.

DOCTORS STRATON, SHIELDS and other collaborators will hold a Bible conference near Asheville, N. C., July 15 to Aug. 15, and certain wealthy promoters offer free rooms and meals to the first thousand registrants.

PASTOR C. F. BANNING of Delaware Street church, Syracuse, N. Y., turned over to his young people the four Sunday evenings in February, with happy results.

AT PIQUA, OHIO, 142 men and boys sat down to a banquet, Feb. 11.

PIONEER LODGE, I. O. O. F., together with the local Rebekahs, heard a sermon by Pastor Elbert C. Prime, at Bridgewater, Mass., Feb. 28.

THE FIRST NINE SUNDAYS this year at First church, Galesburg, Ill., showed an average attendance of 493.

PASTOR EUGENE NEUBAUER, of Fairmont, W. Va., interviewed a dying victim of the underworld who had committed suicide. Then he invited the police force to hear a sermon about her death. The chief of police also spoke. The audience was profoundly impressed.

PASTOR FINLEY KEECH of South church, Newark, N. J., invites his people to tell him in writing "What is Christianity?" and prints the replies, without names, in his church bulletin.

PASTOR HARRY WALKER VINCENT of Ashland Avenue church, Cleveland, has a "suggestion box" into which anybody is free to drop any sort of suggestion for the work of the church. "Fix the baskets and lights in the gym."; "Many of the teachers are punk"; "Make the drinking water cold," are some of the suggestions.

"DID JESUS MEAN WHAT HE SAID?" is the theme of a series of sermons by Pastor Theodore Adams at Cleveland Heights church, Cleveland, Ohio.

EVERYMAN'S CLASS, Bridgeport, Conn., has unveiled a portrait of its late pastor and teacher, Charles A. Decker.

PASTOR W. O. SHANK, First church, Atchison, Kan., reports 197 men in the Bible class and 504 in the Sunday school.

He is assisting Rev. Oliver Shank, First church, St. Louis, in special meetings.

MORNINGSIDE BAPTIST CHURCH, Sioux City, Iowa, has been recognized and asked for admission to Sioux Valley association.

PASTOR W. F. HUXFORD, Estherville, Io., reasons with his people about evangelism in this fashion: "Historically we have known true evangelism by making it profession. We demand a multitude; excitement; music; a fiery evangelist and exhorter. Thus create an abnormal emotional which many mistake for religion, doesn't stay."

PASTOR PERRY J. STACKHOUSE baptized thirty-seven candidates at the First church, Chicago, within the last year, in a very difficult field. The church raised during year nearly $40,000 for all purposes, with membership of less than 450.

FIRST CHURCH, Winona, Minn., has organized the Wenonah Bayopeans, a general organization of the young people to include all of the young people with a scheme degree work.

MR. CHARLES H. GABRIEL, song writer, was guest of honor at Thousand Oaks church, Berkeley, Calif., March 7.

ROGER WILLIAMS BROTHERHOOD, Cumland, Ind., has a formal schedule of monthly meetings running to May 19, with series of noted speakers. At each meeting three men provide the dinner.

A SAMPLE SUNDAY PROGRAM of Pastor Eaton B. Freeman at La Grange, Ill., provides for five specific periods of work on various lines.

RECOMMENDS PARISH PAPER

"From Pastor Clarence S. Donnell of Oak Hill, W. Va., comes a copy of his parish paper, The Church Messenger. It far surpasses any other parish paper coming to this desk."—The Baptist, Feb. 20.

This parish paper is printed by the National Religious Press, Grand Rapids, Mich. Our service provides any church, large or small, city or rural, with a parish paper at about one-fifth the price charged by ordinary printers. Ads or subscriptions pay all publishing expenses. Many make a profit of $100 per month from their parish papers, when our plan is followed. For particulars, samples, etc. Does not obligate you in any way.

DURING THE FIRST YEAR of the pastorate (Rev. T. B. Frizelle, Immanuel church, Long Beach, Calif., has raised $45,000.

REV. J. G. BRENDDEL, former missionary to 10 Indian tribes of Clovis, Calif., and founding territory, died, Feb. 12, at Long Beach, where he was forced to go nearly 10 years ago, on account of a breakdown occasioned by his work among the Indians. Brenddel was one of the most notable of the Indian workers of the Baptist denomination. Prior to coming to California he served for many years in the early days among the Pawnees and other tribes of what was then known as Indian Territory. Brenddel had many thrilling experiences with the Indians on the war trail as well as with the noted bandits of the early Oklahoma days. His funeral was attended by Pastor, T. B. Frizelle, assisted by Revs. L. Scott, Alex. Rhine, W. H. Perry and George L. White.

CLARKSBURG, W. VA., where Dr. J. W. Addell has been serving for the past six months as acting pastor, has called as its permanent undershepherd Dr. Gabriel Reid McGuire.

THERE IS RENEWED INTEREST in all departments of the church work at Interlaken, N. Y., where Rev. C. C. Winter is in the third year of his pastorate. Following the week of prayer in January, the pastor was assisted in two weeks of evangelistic meetings by Rev. Harry M. Shepson of Sayre, Pa. Ten persons have since been baptized and others are awaiting baptism.

FIRST CHURCH OF S. CHARLESTON, W. VA., where E. L. Grose, pastor, has an Easter goal of $1,000 for the Bible school. The men's class has a goal of 300. This class is the largest in the state. On any Sunday the attendance at this school equals the attendance of the other four churches. THE OTTAWA UNIVERSITY SUMMER SCHOOL begins on Thursday, June 3, and closes Saturday, July 31. In charge are Dean B. Wilson, and as manager A. E. Bedford. Classes will be offered in education, English, history, physical education and biology. Courses will be offered in music, violin, piano, voice, and pipe organ.

PASTOR E. L. GROSE recently held a meeting with the church at Hurricane, W. Va., where there were eighty-three additions. The main feature of the campaign was that those who made profession came into the church.

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, 2320 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

"Good-evening, friends. How did you like our new heading? It lacks only one thing. That your imagination can supply: WCOY girdles the globe. Its cheerful message goes to every land.

"Did I say 'cheerful'? Yes, that is what I meant. But not every message coming in is cheerful. One of our subscription cards came back the other day. On the back was the following reason why one man cannot subscribe for our paper:

"I cannot subscribe for THE BAPTIST which in name, as well as in policy, fosters narrow denominationalism and prejudice. In my opinion the Christian church would be far better off without such influences that hold Christians apart and keep them continually emphasizing unimportant questions that have nothing to do with the development of the church. It will be a great day for Christ's cause when all denominations will have completely disappeared; when we no longer in smug egotism and conceit hold that our little group is chosen of God."

—O—

"While the din and rattle of this was in our ears there came a Wise Man from the East. He is pastor of one of our Maine churches. He stood and smiled thus on us: 'Your paper, or our paper, as you would wish us to call it, is getting better all the time. 'Here, There and Everywhere,' is devoured eagerly, of course, but editorials and such contributions as those by Doctor Spurr are great. Give us the facts about the big things being done for the kingdom of God. We will pass them on to our people. We will go on building up our churches while others may wrangle and go to the devil if they will.'

—O—

"There is a fine city in Illinois called Kankakee. It has enough 'k's' in it to make some big kick, but it doesn't. There is a real Baptist church there. That church has a lovable pastor. His name is Fred Young. He keeps young all the time. He loves children. When he wants his people to subscribe for THE BAPTIST, he inserts a question or two in his weekly bulletin. Just ponder this: 'You will find in this bulletin a subscription card. It is for THE BAPTIST, Missions and the Illinois Baptist Bulletin. Are you well informed on Baptist work? You should have our great paper. It will come to your home for less than four cents a week. You have children in the home. You want these children to grow up in the church and in the denomination and to take their place in the great work of the Master. You may be taking two or more daily papers and no religious paper. If when your children grow up they have no interest in the church and in religion, don't blame them too severely. The Good Book says we reap what we sow. Are you sowing in the minds of your children the seeds of the kingdom or the seeds of the cheap comic sheets?'"

—O—

"Out in Oak Park, Ill., there is one of the most rapidly growing churches in the Chicago Baptist association. This church has a lovable pastor too. His name is Dent—Joseph Croft Dent. And he lives right up to his name. He puts a 'dent' into his job. Last year he put THE BAPTIST into many more than 10 per cent of his members' homes. Recently he presented it again, using a peppy outline of reasons. Maybe you would like to have them. All right, here they are and no copyright. Use them. 'FIVE REASONS for taking THE BAPTIST: I. It Is an Assistant Pastor: it visits you every week. II. It Is a Sunday-school Teacher: it explains the Sunday-school lesson. III. It Is a Baptist World-Crier: it gives the latest news of Baptists all over the world. IV. It Is Food for the Soul: there are sermons and devotional talks. V. It Makes Better Baptists: we become stronger Christians and Baptists by reading it.' Maybe you would like to send us your outline for presenting the paper. We should like to have it.

—O—

"Recently about fifty churches in the Chicago association put on a simultaneous campaign for subscriptions. The results were most gratifying. Several of the larger churches will make their special efforts in March and April and as late as May. Rochester, N. Y., was the first city to develop the simultaneous city-wide—or county-wide effort. Detroit, Mich., tried it out in December with great success. Detroit trebled its former best record. There is added value in doing anything together.

—O—

"The office boy says that in his opinion the old saying of 'A man works from sun to sun, but women's work is never done,' is due to the fact that they do not set about it in time. He says it reminds him of many pastors who get nervous pesteration trying to do and say everything themselves; whereas wisdom would indicate that they should enlist their people to read THE BAPTIST and thus live intelligently useful and happy lives ever after. The best testimonial of a paper's value is the contrast in a church 'before' and 'after' taking.

New Books

Do Fundamentalists Play Fair? by W. M. Forrest. New York: Macmillan. $1.

"Do fundamentalists play fair?" is the question Prof. W. M. Forrest endeavors to answer in his book which has for its title this interrogation. The author is not so much concerned with results as he is with processes. The title was evidently suggested by watching children at play and hearing one cry out, "No fair!" Games must be played according to the rules and it is the contention of the book that all discussion concerning anti-evolution, verbal inspiration of the Bible and other so-called fundamentals of the Christian religion should be conducted on the basis of fair play without resorting to fouls. The author assumes the role of referee and in almost every chapter of his book he chalks up foul after foul against the fundamentalists who persist in playing the game in violation of all the rules that must govern an intelligent approach to the Bible and to the doctrines which are supposed to be based upon its teachings.

How to Study and Teach the Bible, by D. S. N. Vass, Sunday School Publishing Board, Nashville, Tenn. $1.50.

This book of almost 500 pages is the official teacher-training manual for negro Baptist Sunday schools of America. As such it is most excellent and serviceable. Doctor Vass has had thirty years of experience in this field. His sympathy, spirituality, scholarship are reflected on every page. It is four books in one, dealing with the separate units of the Bible, the teacher, the pupil and the school. Being thus written from beginning to end by one man it has unusual unity and consistency. It is clear, concise, comprehensive, well arranged and illustrated by numerous maps, pictures, charts, diagrams and outlines with helpful questions for review and test at the close of each chapter.

—WILLIAM J. SLY.

Poor Cecco, by Margery Williams Bianco. New York: Doran.

"Poor Cecco" is the story of a tailless wooden dog—the tail lost in a good cause. But "half a tail is better than no tail; besides many of the best people wear it that way," philosophized Cecco as he looked at himself in the glass. Which gives us the hint that Cecco was the Pollyanna of the toy world—always looking on the bright side and helping some one along. Besides Cecco there are many others in the story—Murrum, the cat; Jensina, the born housewife; Bulka, the rag puppy; the Woodchuck, the Money Pig, Tubby, Gladys, and so on. The pictures, in colors and in black and white, made by Arthur Rackham,

The Memoirs of William Jennings Bryan, by himself and his wife, Mary Baird Bryan. Philadelphia: John C. Winston Co.

I tried this bulky volume, 560 pages, on a twelve-year old boy and he read it through. Without warning, the leader of the Pioneers called on him to review the book and he held the attention of forty boys for twenty-five minutes. Evidently there is an interesting story here. Some day a more worthy life of this worthy man will be written but whoever accomplishes that task will often turn to these pages for material. Mr. Bryan's years were passed amid controversy. Cruel and often slanderous things were said against him. This revelation of motives and reasons for positions taken will strongly appeal to many. Often he took advance ground, knowing he would be ridiculed, moved only by a sense of duty. When he became convinced he ought to stand for national prohibition his political friends advised against it. When none would stand with him, he hired a hall in Omaha, stepped out alone upon the platform before a great audience, and bowing to his coat and which he had placed on the vacant chair said: "Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen" and of course delighted his audience and won their approval. He reared in a home where the Bible read daily and prayer offered. At fifteen he united with the church and speaks of that as the most significant influence for good in his life. Stand firmly for the right as he saw it, he a kindly, courageous, Christian man even those who most disagreed with opinions profoundly respect his character.

Jesus of Nazareth, by Joseph Klausner. New York: Macmillan. $4.50.

Doctor Klausner is a noted Zionist and writer of Hebrew history. This book was written in Hebrew, and translated into English by Herbert Danby, D.D. How did it come about that although Jesus was a Jew his followers generally were not Jews? Here is a scholarly, careful, objective and thorough attempt to answer that question. Sources of information are surveyed critically and impartially. Especially incisive are the criticisms of the Talmudic and Rabbinical sources. The material and method of the New Testament writers, of the Church Fathers, of the modern critics, come under review by a trained reviewer who evidently wished to be impartial. A vast amount of information concerning the life and times of Jesus is packed into the argument, and the analysis develops practically all angles of the question in hand. The interesting conclusion at which a broad-minded modern Jew arrives is that Jesus was divine, nor a lawgiver, nor a prophet, nor a Messiah, nor intentionally the founder of a new religion, but "a great teacher of morals and an artist in the Bible." The great Christian views of Christ he regards as accumulated misapprehensions, and thinks that if the truth should come when the "wrappings of miracle and mysticism" shall be stripped away from the tradition, "the book of the Ethics of Jesus will be one of the choicest treasures in the literature of Israel for all time."

Tree of Healing, by J. M. E. Ross. New York: Doran.

The principle of sacrifice immanent in nature and in man came to its fairer flower in the life and character of Christ, is the message of "The Tree of Healing" by J. M. E. Ross, later in the British Weekly. In a series of sixteen sermons cast in the clear and powerful style of a master of English, throbbing with the dynamic passion of a great soul, we discover a prophet who knew how to conserve the eternal life of immortal truth while recognizing the transient dress in which truth is clothed from age to age. The sermons are classics of evangelical preaching in the language of modern thought.

Make Your Church Attractive, by Chas. H. Richards. Chicago: Pilgrim Press.

After one reads this little book he will probably want to go over to the church and set things right. Doctor Richards discusses in a stimulating way the value of an attractive church exterior, interior, music, the preacher, the reading of the scripture, and the worship service. The author offers many helpful suggestions. This volume also tells how to make the service in a village or rural church attractive. In the back of the book Doctor Richards has arranged a list of Scripture readings for church service during a whole year. These selections are chosen from the Old and New Testaments for each morning service, there is also an additional list for special occasions. These lists give a general view of the whole Bible.

Were You Born in 1876?

If you are fifty years old the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society will be glad to pay you a guaranteed income of 6 per cent for the remainder of your life in return for a gift of any amount on the Annuity Plan.

Such a gift would enable you to furnish support to world evangelization and at the same time would bring you an assured income as long as you live. This arrangement is of special interest to those desiring to give but who require an income in the meantime because of financial needs. After your death the net remaining principal would be immediately released for the work of the Society.

Write today to Home Secretary P. H. Lerrigo, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York, for complete information. All correspondence will be treated in strictest confidence.

If you are older or younger than fifty, the rate of income would vary accordingly, ranging from 4 to 9 per cent on single life annuities and from 4 to 8.3 per cent on annuity agreements covering two lives.

Here is a unique opportunity for making a gift, large or small, and receiving in return an annual income as long as you live. Many annuitants have been so pleased with this plan that they have made similar gifts in later years.

Yankee sense of humor ought to come to the rescue of the government, or of the news writer. George R. Holmes reports in a daily batch of news the following grave statement: "Administration officials are still somewhat perturbed over the language of the league's invitation, which clearly indicates the league is going to examine into a good many by-products of the disarmament question, such as national wealth, economic resources, industrial development, population, etc., all of which figure in a nation's potential war strength." American humor has a capacity for some tall jokes. Is it quite capable of going into a disarmament conference with a proviso that nothing shall be said about military resources?

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for March 28

REVIEW: THE GOSPEL OF JOHN
Devotional Reading: John 17:1-8
Golden Text: John 20:31
The Men

Nearly one-half of the twelve lessons have to do with individuals who cross the path of Jesus to their own great benefit. There are first the five men who believed on Jesus as the Messiah, viz., Andrew, John, Peter, Philip and Nathanael. Each man of them reached faith in Jesus as the Christ by the route of experience. Led to investigate by the suggestion of another person, they went forward to find out for themselves the value of the testimony given to them by that other person. They were willing to rest their faith on anything less than their own personal experience with Jesus. We rather imagine that Jesus was delighted with the first-hand attempt of these and other individuals to know him personally. Nicodemus and the woman of Sychar had some difficulty in catching the spiritual significance of the words of Jesus; but they were in the best possible place to speak frankly their inability to grasp spiritual things carried in physical terms when they sat in the presence of the incomparable teacher. We can never improve the method of Jesus in dealing with individuals in extending the kingdom of God.

The Mass

Only once does John show us Jesus Master handling a crowd. He takes the incident, the feeding of the five thousand, and fills it with details which bring out the resources of Jesus. Neither Philip nor Andrew rose to the occasion when they had the opportunity. Philip might have said when the question was put to him, "Whence are we to have bread that these may eat?" "Lord, thou knowest what to do." Possibly with the miracle of Cana in mind, Andrew made his suggestion. If Jesus could take a household drinking water and turn it into wine, what might he not do with the five loaves and two fishes? If, however, Jesus saw only trouble in a crowd for he tells us that after the crowd had eaten they attempted to make Jesus king. John's Gospel is the gospel of the individual.

The Miracles

John records seven miracles. It would almost seem as though he made his selection deliberately to show the power of Jesus in the realm of nature as well as in the realm of society. In the present generation we have no difficulty in believing in miracles. We live in an age of what may be regarded as miracles. And this is true of both matter and mind. There is not a single miracle in the Gospel of John which may not be reproduced and in some instances has already been reproduced. As we go deeper into the knowledge of the spiritual universe we begin to see that all things are possible to him that believeth.

News Notes

At the January meeting of the executive committee of the ministers and missionaries benefit board fifty new applications for membership in the retiring pension fund were presented for approval.

Quotations from Chinese proverbs or classics as well as from the Bible are put on the roadside, pulpit bulletins in the Yachow district. In this way people are being taught to see how the best in the moral teaching of China is fulfilled in Jesus. Sixteen chapels in the district now carry on this type of teaching.

A day of great rejoicing for the Telugu Christians at Mergui was Oct. 18, when their recently completed chapel was dedicated. Five men were baptized during the services. Karen Christians, members of the Chinese M. E. church, Anglican friends and two important government officials helped the Telugus celebrate the acquiring of a church building of their own.

Chief Hail, Arapahoe, has passed over the Great Divide. Rev. T. J. Davis, pastor at Watonga, Okla., pays this tribute to the late tribesman: "Chief Hail was our senior deacon and no man either red or white was more faithful to his Lord and the church than he. Before he went home he said, 'I am not afraid to die. I am ready to go. I am praying every day that the Christian work will go on and that some one will take my place and do what I have been doing for the good of my people.'"

Rev. Frank Kurtz gives certain instances which are "somewhat out of the ordinary," but which are indications of progress in South India. "One Sunday morning a Brahmin convert worshiped with us and was invited to preach. It so happened that there was also present a convert from the merchant caste and he preached in the evening. A few Sundays later a Mohammedan convert came to worship with us and continued to do so until his transfer to another town. The gospel is not bound and neither stone walls nor opposition of any kind nor caste can prevent its onward progress."

One Sunday in late December, Rev. S. D. Bawden went down to address the Southern association meeting at Allur. "After the afternoon program, Ongole Moses and Pariah asked me to come over to the settlement, and when I arrived I found them taking a subscription list for the Lone Star fund! It was not my suggestion at all, but Moses, reading THE BAPTIST and the Watchman-Examiner pretty faithfully, had become impressed with the idea that they ought to manifest their gratitude for the work the mission has done for them by responding to the call for the Lone Star fund." So subscriptions were secured from the Reformatory settlement and the Kavali settlement from their weekly offerings of Rs. 45, while a list of individual subscriptions at Allur settlement gives a total pledge of over Rs. 98.

Make Decision Day The Climax

Sunday—March 28

Let us in unison, all Baptists from coast to coast, sound such a trumpet blast that every unchurched man and woman and youth may say with Bunyan's Christian:

"I am directed by a man, whose name is Evangelist, to speed me to a little gate that is before us."

On the fourth Sunday of March, the 28th day of the month, impart to every soul responsive to the compassionate message of Christ the final urge toward that "little gate" and the salvation to which it is the portal.

The Great Day of the Evangelistic Campaign

Pastors, all denominational leaders, all church members who would welcome friend and neighbor and stranger to the company of those who accept Christ, are asked to make this the great, outstanding day of the Evangelistic Campaign.

Press the loving invitation in every assembly of the day. In the Bible School, in the Young People's Hour, in the general services of the church, morning and evening. Herald this Sabbath as the Day of Decision.

"Crown Him With Many Crowns"

If we are animated by the spirit that fills with true Evangelistic zeal a servant of the Lord, this will be the denomination's glorious coronation day. Thousands of churches will exalt Him. Thousands of waiting hearts will acknowledge Him. It is a momentous hour of opportunity for men everywhere are turning to Christ as the only hope of the world.

THE LAST SUPPER

Folks, Facts and Opinion

The number of students in the colleges and universities and professional schools of the United States increased from 224,248 in 1900 to 726,124 in 1924.

Because Prof. Wm. Bradley Otis of the city college of New York defended the students of the college who opposed compulsory military training, he was ousted from the board of the National Security League, an organization which has been exercising a sort of national guardianship over the patriotism and politics of the country. The incident led John Brooks Leavitt also to leave it, and his letter of resignation was temperate and telling rebuke to the fussy officiousness that has made the organization a nuisance to a host of Americans who appreciate the virtue of attending to one's business.

At the beginning of the century, when organized classes were first coming into vogue, a group of boys, fifteen and sixteen years old, banded themselves into a Crusaders class. Ultimately they made over an old sexton's residence on the church grounds into an attractive clubhouse. Their activities, religious, social, and athletic, during the years have been many. The founders, for the most part, remained in the class, as they grew into manhood, and it has become the adult, as well as young men's class, or brotherhood, of the church. Recently these Crusaders celebrated their twenty-fifth anniversary with a reunion and banquet. The principal speakers were Walter D. Lassels, who has been the main spirit of the class from its inception and was for twelve years its teacher, and Dr. Mitchell Bronk, of the Publication society, who came into close touch with the organization during his ministry, 1912-19.

Not entirely satisfactory to the Baptist Courier is the editorial in THE BAPTIST of Feb. 13 under the caption, "How Far Apart Are the Two Wings?" While courteous and appreciative, the Courier thinks that the principle of modernism quoted in that editorial, "the use of the methods of modern science to find, state and utilize the inherited values of orthodoxy," does not represent the actual principle of modernism. The difference may be one of vocabulary. The Courier conceives that modernism "is not only a denial of the supernatural but is also as unscientific as extreme fundamentalism." Be all that as it may, our concern is with realities rather than labels. The thing described by the Courier as modernism is regarded hereabouts as plain, old-fashioned unbelief, and what it condemns as extreme fundamentalism may be simple bigotry under another name. We do not regard either as a "wing" of the Baptist denomination. They look more like warts than wings.

Methodists in these days are exhibiting a consistent bravery in the way they face current problems. For instance, they do not flinch from a calm discussion of the pros and cons of the virgin birth, with regard both to the question of fact and to its doctrinal significance. The general attitude seems to be that of the late Dr. Borden P. Bowne, as quoted in Zion's Herald: "Now, with respect to the first doctrine (the virgin birth) which is mentioned, I have, myself, no difficulty. So far as I know, I believe it. I certainly do not deny it, and I am in no way embarrassed by it. At the same time I should strongly protest against making it an article of the standing or falling of the faith of the church."

A committee representative of all the young people's societies of Ann Arbor agreed to unite once each month in co-operation with Michigan university students on a study of the Christian aim in life. Preparation for this study is being undertaken by the students themselves. The first discussion related to the liquor problem at the University of Michigan. From each society a committee of ten has been appointed to make a survey of conditions in order that all of the available data on this problem can be brought before the meeting. In March the study relates to the race problem on the campus and in April the question of the students' religion will be investigated. The reports of these commission studies are published daily in the college paper.

"All science and all philosophy conform to the teachings of the Bible. If that is not true, then the Bible is a Bible. If there is a chance for scientific discoveries to crowd the Bible off in corner of its own, then the hand that wrote the Bible is not the hand that created the world." So reasons at one Baptist in a current periodical. a study in psychology, it is of passing interest.

Prophecy by the present writer some months ago that the independence of the Philippines will not be granted in any way of verification. Recent discussions before one of the most prominent political clubs in the country showed with any reported dissent both the purpose to retain the islands and the real reason for so doing. John M. Switzer, former president of the Pacific Commercial Company, declared that he considered retention of the Philippines necessary for the development of American industry. "The tropics will be the great future source of food supplies and raw materials, yet there are those who urge the United States to get rid of its great tropical possession, the Philippines," he asserted. It is the voice of American imperialism, and it speaks for the nation. What it means for liberty in the future is another story.

Provisions in the constitution of the Mexican republic which give rise to the present controversy with the Catholic church follow: "To exercise in the United States of Mexico the ministrations of any cult it is necessary to be a Mexican by birth;" and "no religious corporation or minister of any cult will be permitted to establish or superintend private schools." It is charged that for centuries the priests of the Catholic church have only and persistently flouted those provisions of the constitution. President Calles' official interpretation of the difficulty as appearing in the New World of Feb. 25, is this: "But it is easily understood, in view of the history of our country and the painful consequences Mexico has experienced through the intrusion of the Catholic clergy, the pacific development of the nation, institution, of which it has been a traditional enemy, that corrective measures should be taken. It was especially necessary, in view of the possibility of an intrusion of the Mexican Catholic clergy in matters of a temporal or political character, to insure the exclusion of foreign elements not allowed as ministers of religion by the constitution. These elements, precisely because they are being foreigners, could only impair the indicated problem more serious and difficult characteristics."

conference is called to meet in London, July 10 to form an international union of liberal Jews.

A circular saw that serves as bell for a small colored church is found near the town of Camden, South Carolina. Many years this saw cut its way through southern timber. Most days the came thick and fast. Hidden chains and chain links tested the saw's strength and temper. Yet, through it all the sturdy saw sang its way merrily—bringing forth each day its output of light, smooth lumber. There came a time when the mill was abandoned and the saw left to rust in idleness. But a nearby colored church needed a bell, and it had no money to buy, so, by happy thought, the old Disston saw was rescued from oblivion and installed in the photograph, to call the congregation to worship each Sunday.

"Good-will Day," as proposed by the Commission on international justice and the will of the Federal Council of Churches, will coincide regularly with July 18. The preceding Sunday is to be "Good-will International Sunday," if the suggestion is accepted. Churches and schools in many localities are already at work on programs of varied character. the helter skelter of modern religious debate, the Christian World has another name to conjure with. To mentalism and modernism with its variations it proposes to add the glory of "Classical Christianity," by which it means that type of religious which is common to "the masters." Examples of the classical artists in religion it names Tertullian, Cyprian, Athanasius, Augustine, Luther, Zwinglius, Baxter, Bunyan, Wesley, Newman, General Booth and Al Mercier, who represent "the eternal, the timeless, that which makes irresistible appeal everywhere to all of people."

In the leading editorial in the issue of March 13, entitled "Handing Down the Unified Budget," will be found on page 166 this sentence: "If the full denominational missionary budget is not raised by the close of the fiscal year, April 30, the Lone Star fund will be absorbed in the general deficit and certain foreign mission work will have to be abandoned for want of adequate support." Some readers are mystified by that statement. It means simply what we have been told all the time, that the deficit of last year made it necessary to raise the Lone Star fund in order to carry on our mission work during the current year. But if our current budget is not raised we shall come to the end of the year in the same predicament as last year. The gains from the Lone Star fund will be offset by a new deficit.

Has a citizen irrespective of creed or color the right to buy and use property in any locality where he may choose or be able to secure it? Should a prospective resident be governed by the feelings of those who through ignorance, prejudice or misunderstanding fear and resent his presence? Has any group the right to take possession of the most desirable localities and to prevent others from acquiring a residence there? Is there any arrangement by which the advantages of a good residence may be secured by all equally and at the same time relieve every group from the presence of undesirable neighbors? These questions persist wherever whites and blacks reside in the same general district. And they can never be satisfactorily or justly answered except on the basis of mutual accommodation. The negro must prove that he can be just as good a neighbor as a white man; the white man must demonstrate that he seeks only good neighbors without regard to color. Unless some way can be found to cooperate for the equal benefit of both, then both must take the chances of business competition whatever it brings, and both must obey the law.

Between dried frog's liver as medicine and the curing of snake-bits with rattle-snake venom there is superficial similarity, but they represent a line of scientific progress long enough to encircle the world. And chemistry has achieved the miracle of compounding from the venom of snakes a serum that will cure their bite.

In the March number of the Maine Baptist Messenger Dr. Irving B. Mower presents his resignation as executive secretary of the United Baptist Convention of Maine. For twelve years he was secretary of the Maine Baptist Convention, and for eleven more has served the united body. These years have been years of remarkable progress and development on the part of the Baptist churches and all Baptist interests in Maine. This progress may in no small degree be referred to the wise, patient, judicious, hopeful, and Christian way in which Doctor Mower has led the Baptist hosts. Not only has he led in constructive work, but he has quietly and effectually counteracted destructive tendencies and led many an erring brother to the better way. This remarkable service has been recognized and appreciated, and it was never wiser or more effective than it is today. However, to be the secretary in such a state as Maine, where a multitude of little churches not only have problems, but are of themselves problems, is no slight task. The distances, which are great, and the climate, which holds some notes not registered in the "Boost Maine" psalms of praise, have made heavy taxes upon one who has never spared himself. Further, Doctor Mower has connection with several important charities as well as private interests that will occupy attention, nor will his attention to Baptist interests ever allow him to neglect an opportunity to serve them. Maine congratulates herself over the many years of such a remarkable service, and may yet be unwilling that the secretary should avail himself of the rest which he so richly deserves.

Another southern Baptist paper insists on looking clear through the low log is the Baptist Message of Louisiana. Just at this instant it is on hunt for the creed-making business Baptist conventions. It reports discovery in these words: "Our conventions were never intended to be creed-making bodies nor anything that in least smacks of it. The churches for past few years have been long-suffering with our general bodies in this sort of business; but as surely as there is Baptist history there is coming a reckoning day and also a day of retribution. Baptist churches may be hoodwinked, cuffed aside and deprived of their autonomy for a while, but sooner or later, will call a halt to this business."

The woman's national committee for law enforcement has called a convention in Washington, D. C., April 13. Sessions will be held in the Hall of Nations, Washington hotel, with the exception of the mass meeting the evening of April 12. Nine commissions of women representing various organizations and sections of the country will present reports and resolutions on legal, political, educational, social, patriotic and religious aspects of law observance and enforcement. The commission of church women, Mrs. F. Bennett, chairman, Mrs. Katherine Silverthorn and Mrs. John Ferguson, vice-chairmen, will report at the opening session Sunday afternoon. Christian women must face the present situation with a sense of grave responsibility. Let churches and missionary organizations be represented. It is a question of law based on the eighteenth amendment alone but a question of reverence for all law without which this democracy is not safe and is without power to aid the world. Apply for registration and information to the chairman of the Washington committee, Mrs. Wm. L. Darby, Washington hotel, Washington, D. C.

Under the Olives

"Awake thou that sleepest."—Eph. 5: 14

BENEATH dark olive trees He knelt,
Whose leaves, bedewed, seemed thus to weep.
In sympathy His sorrows felt,
While friends He loved fell fast asleep.

Centuries have faded—through all lands
His cross, uplifted, is displayed,
Cathedral risen, sublime and grand,
Yet still by millions He's betrayed.

Their souls, for whom was given His life,
For whom, in prayer, His heart did break,
Take but their ease and dream, asleep,
Watch not an hour, nor pitying wake.

O Master, grant we wake with Thee
Though world minds sleep nor drop a tear;
We'd kneel 'neath shadowy olive tree
With Thee, whose "love casts out all fear."

We'd kneel with heart repentance deep
That spirit ruled by flesh should be,
End thus our worldly, wanton sleep
And lack of sympathy with Thee.

The olives wept—soon pierced the spear;
Yet from death's garden—watched by foes—
Christ's triumph Psalm of Life, we hear,
Wake, sleeping souls—thy Saviour rose!

The Law Committee and the Proposed Amendment

AT THE request of the executive committee of the Northern Baptist Convention, the law committee has prepared a report on the proposed amendment to define a Baptist church. The report is in two sections. Five of the six members of the law committee sign a majority report, and one signs a minority report. The majority report holds that as "the Baptist denomination is not organized under a constitutional form of government which as obtains among Presbyterians, Methodists or Episcopalians" and that as "there is no written constitution which holds Baptists together, no hierarchy of governing bodies and no legally formulated or expressed basis which holds them together into the great denomination which in fact they are, no local association, state convention or national organization can legislate for the local church." The law committee having laid down this generally accepted principle proceeds to state the practice by which Baptist churches have been recognized as such. As every Baptist knows, the uniform practice has been and is for the church desiring such recognition to call together a council composed of delegates from neighboring Baptist churches to examine into the beliefs and practices of the church seeking recognition. If the council is satisfied that the church examined gives evidence of being in line with Baptist churches in general a vote is taken by which said church is recommended to the fellowship of the local association. In the opinion of the majority of the law committee, "there is no other method of determining whether any given church is a Baptist church and a part of the constituency of the Northern Baptist Convention." Of the four specific questions on the proposed amendment which the law committee was requested to answer, only two are legal questions; the other two are parliamentary questions. The first parliamentary question as to whether signers to the call for the amendment can withdraw their names is answered with a decided negative, and the second parliamentary question as to the possibility of amending the amendment from the floor of the convention is answered by referring the question to Robert's "Rules of Order." The legal questions pertain to the possible conflict of the proposed amendment with the Convention Declaration or with the Act of Incorporation and with the effect of the amendment should it be adopted upon merger contracts and agreements with the Free Baptists. The majority report holds that the proposed amendment is out of harmony with the spirit and letter of both the Declaration of the Convention and Act of Incorporation on the ground that such amendment if adopted would invade the rights of the local church and violate the advisory nature of the convention itself. And on the second legal question it answers that the proposed amendment if added to the by-laws "will immediately deprive the Free Baptists of the vested rights they have acquired by the amalgamation of the two denominations." It is needless to say that the minority report signed by one member of the law committee takes issue with the findings of the majority report and holds on all four questions submitted to the committee that the convention may legally adopt the amendment without trespassing upon the rights of the local church, without violating the spirit or letter of the constitution and without interfering with the vested rights of the Free Baptists.

For several months THE BAPTIST has been facing the proposed amendment editorially. In the legal phase of the question we have not been particularly interested, because we have had a feeling right along that if Baptists are given time enough to think things through they will arrive at conclusions which will not seriously depart from the historic principles and practices of the denomination. It has been our contention that the proposed amendment is not advisable because it "is needless, dangerous as a precedent and likely to be divisive." We believe that the occasion is not sufficient to call for a new instrument. We have all the rules and regulations needed to do the business of the convention. One successful automobile manufacturer offers a premium to any inventor who will give a practical suggestion on how to reduce the number of parts in his car without reducing its efficiency. Some philanthropist in the Baptist denomination might serve the kingdom mightily by offering a prize to the man who could demonstrate that the convention machinery needs no tinkering with either theologically or legally. What we Baptists need is not more creedal statements, not more parliamentary rules, not more constitutional amendments. We need more of the mind of Christ, more of the experience of Gethsemane, more of the passion of the cross, more of the power of the resurrection and more of the spirit of Pentecost. The upper room sanctified by united prayer which brings a spiritual Pentecost is the thing we need and not more judicial decisions, parliamentary tactics and hectic discussion.

This Question of Honest Debts

IT IS rather irritating, this insistence on our payment of missionary budgets on the basis of honesty. It carries connotations that reflect unpleasantly upon a possible failure to pay them. What right has any man to judge another's servant? And if I fail to pay my pledge by what right do you pronounce upon my integrity? The question is legitimate and the answer is bound to be fundamental and convincing to one who wishes to know and do the right.

One case is eliminated from discussion at the outset. It is the case of one who, whether pledged or unpledged, pays to the missionary budget to the limit of his reasonable ability. If one has the spirit of Christ and is willing to go with Christ to all lengths, if he carries upon his soul the evangelization of the world as a passion of fellowship with Christ, if he has given to the missionary enterprise to the measure of a Christ-honoring expression of that passion, no judgment can pass upon him. Whatever he has done is well done.

But anywhere below that standard questions arise, and ought to arise. In every person and church, self-examination ought to be so prompt and strict that no other can find opportunity to ask, "Have you paid your debts to the Lord?"

Consider. The Baptist denomination, acting collectively through the agencies and ways which it has created for itself, has undertaken a world-wide enterprise for the promotion of the kingdom of God. Ought it or ought it not to have done so? If it ought, where does the responsibility rest? If any Baptist thinks that he can escape his share of that responsibility, he has to make out his case clearly by all of the tests of righteousness that can be found in Christ. Every church is likewise subject to the same tests. Apply them and judge yourself for yourself. And remember that Christian living invokes a deep principle of compensation, namely: "With whatsoever measure ye mete it shall be measured to you."

Has the cause of Christ any moral claim upon us? Has the denomination any claim? Has the denominational organization any claim? Have our collective undertakings any claim? Have our deliberate and collective agreements any claim? Have the hundreds of our best men and women who have been called by us to undertake our task all over the world any claim? If so, are there any elements of right, of duty, of obligation and of honor in those claims? In these elements wherein is a note at the bank superior to these claims?

Even a bank discounts the honor of a debtor who pays only under compulsion.

The Christian standard is higher and happier. By all the bonds of Christ we are bound—joyously bound. If that means the prompt and full payment of our pledges to the missionary budget, welcome the call and do it. If it means the payment of more than we pledged, let God be praised. Whatever it means, let us belt the earth with a song of millions singing together the refrain of Rupert Brooke: "Thanks be to God who has matched us with his hour!"

Let Us Bow Together at His Tomb

AT THE time of this writing, the body of Dr. John Y. Aitchison lies silent, awaiting interment. Before these lines reach the reader heads will be bowed around the world at the tidings of his death. No adequate appreciation of him and of his life is possible within the limits of space at command. One can only drop a wreath on his bier. Beyond this symbol of love and sorrow, words fail.

His leadership of the New World Movement began at the same time and originated in the same circumstances that gave birth to THE BAPTIST. He and we were called together to meet a common emergency; we were associates in a common great, unprecedented, pioneer enterprise for the kingdom of God; we stood together for the promotion of the same denominational principles, methods and goals; we met the same trying problems and together strove to find their right solution; through denominational misunderstandings and the strife of faction, we went together through the same heart-breaking experiences; we wrought together to heal, encourage, unify and mobilize the Baptist fellowship for the highest world service. Changes in the personnel of this office made no change in this comradeship. It held steadfast to the end.

When the New World Movement ended, his title to a crown among the great leaders of Baptist history was fairly won. None rejoiced more than we to see him wear that crown. But now his work on earth is over. In this office is a sense of loneliness. We feel that the fittest symbol of our grief would be the figure of a toilworn ox standing bewildered by a grave, with one end of a yoke upon its neck while the other end of the yoke hangs empty.

His greatness is not of the order that challenges and defies analysis. All who knew him understood him. There was nothing flamboyant, Napoleonic, spectacular and crashing about him. Fraternal service and cooperation were the dominant notes of his character, and he was willing to make every possible adjustment to attain them. Arbitrariness and autocracy find no association with his name. Deep and devious ways he neither sought nor understood. He was obvious, simple, steadfast, sterling, strong. His name will enrich the pages of our denominational history and there will be no shadows upon its lustre.

He has joined the invisible advance of the kingdom of God. Values such as lay in his personality are prophetic of eternity and require eternity for their fruition. Such a life adds to the accumulating evidence of immortality with Christ. We began by bowing our heads to say, "Rest in peace." We end rather by lifting our heads to say, "Rise in power; comrade, rise."

The World in Transit

BY THE ASSISTANT EDITOR

Whether the League Live or Die, The World Must Organize Peace

Major changes come so swiftly these days that a weekly paper can hardly keep up with them. At this writing Sweden has blocked a proposal to change the composition of the council of the League of Nations, the entrance of Germany is halted and the German delegates are preparing to leave Geneva. Tomorrow the crisis may have passed. Or the league itself may be dissolved. Friends of peace must dread the latter possibility. The league is not everything and it is not final, but it is a valuable experiment in the direction of true internationalism. It can pave the way for a constitutional government for the world. If it should fail some other way must be found. Present difficulties must be converted into future triumphs. This generation must write the charter for a warless world.

We May Bully Mexico Till We Lose Our Own Temper.

Somebody in the United States, the Lord knows who, seems determined to force a situation which will bring intervention in Mexico. But whoever wants that, wants war with Mexico and the conquest of Mexico by the United States. The American people as a whole have no such purpose, but the attitude of certain newspapers leaves no doubt that such a purpose exists and is diligently urged. Somebody does not intend to stop agitating to this end until Mexico is reduced to the position of Cuba, Hayti and Porto Rico. Is our government yielding to this pressure? On this point, whatever Americans may think, there seems to be no doubt that the rest of the world thinks our state department is playing the part of a contemptible bully and hypocrite. The rest of the world may be altogether mistaken, but under existing circumstances, it is important to make our conduct toward Mexico so frankly and meticulously friendly and courteous as to disarm all suspicion. It is better not to point guns at Mexico on the supposition that they are not loaded. That form of amusement often starts trouble.

What Are We to Think When Col. Mitchell Draws no Crowd?

Col. Wm. Mitchell, hero of the navy controversy, who has been a headliner for the papers, is now engaged in a national campaign to awaken the country to the need of air defense. Who better than he can whoop things up for military preparedness? But are the people becoming excited about the matter? For answer consider his meeting at the Chicago Coliseum, Feb. 24. Here is an auditorium in which historic national conventions have swayed millions and made history. But papers favorable to his propaganda reported less than 500 people in his audience. They explained that the price of admission was too high and that the competition of the radio hurt the meeting. A less sophisticated observer might think that the meeting failed because the people are losing interest in the whole militaristic ballyhoo.

Were the Fathers Mistaken in Their Maxims of Government?

The American Revolution embodied a philosophy of government, which the men of that period expressed in their own way in the form of axioms in the Declaration of Independence. Those axioms include equality, inalienable rights, government for the common benefit, sovereignty of the people and the legitimacy of revolution. All of the fifty-six members of the Continental Congress solemnly signed their names to that declaration and thus pledged their loyalty to those axioms. On the basis of that philosophy they fought the Revolutionary War, and thirteen years later another group of Americans, accepting those axioms as no longer subject to debate, made them the groundwork of the constitution. For a century and a half the United States has tested them and today the science of government in its most critical mood, offers no settled conclusion that invalidates one of them. Vast economic and social changes have intervened. New modes of applying those principles have been discovered. A bewildering mass of new relationships has given rise to new and complicated problems. New forms of statement have been perfected and their corollaries have opened wide fields of constructive thinking and of debate. But there stand those axioms, the historical and philosophical basis of our national civilization. If Americanism has any contrary meaning today the nation is apostate and is marching to catastrophe.

Bootlegger versus Teetotaler, And All Sorts between Them

Newspaper polls are the modern form of referendum. They are now reporting on prohibition with majorities of ten to one against the present law. Spokesmen for the Anti-Saloon League say that the referendum is misleading in the extreme. And it is. It has all the earmarks of interested propaganda. The American people wanted, and probably they still want—at any rate, ultimately they will want—prohibition. We have the amendment and the Volstead law; so far, well. But we have also local enforcement largely paralyzed in some places by the political control of the same old friends of bootleggers who have been the perennial curse of American democracy, and the federal prohibition service has been infested to some extent by party patronage and by a gang of hangers-on who have no sympathy with the law and who muss up every form of public service ever entrusted to them. Finally there are the faint-hearted, whose position is determined by the passing gust. If prohibition survives all of these, as it probably will, it will demonstrate its immortality; nothing can kill it. One of the most sinister signs is talk of an investigation by the national congress. Prohibitionists naturally welcome scientific investigation, but a congressional investigation is often a refuge for rascality and a tomb for righteous causes. After all, perhaps the noise comes from the fact that prohibition is too successful to suit its foes.

Giving Half of Our Living for Awkwardness

In some dim fashion most people are aware that Americans are great wasters of time, labor and natural resources. But the amount of such waste and the cause of it are not generally known. The amount of economic waste in the three essential items named is just about equal in quantity to half of the total available resources. That is, if the available labor power were employed with scientific economy and efficiency a normal standard of living for all of the people could be maintained with half of the present draft on the natural resources of the country. Or if with the natural resources available we knew how to live together in a normal way only one-half of the present labor time employed would be necessary in order to provide for such living. The high cost of living is the price we pay for our social incompetency.

Logic Lost in Laughter

Give us less of the poor "chopped straw of logic" and more of the joy of the Lord, and we shall see the prodigals come home.

BY ROBERT GORDON

THE distinguished pastor of the Old South church, Boston, tells of an ecclesiastical council divided over the question whether sinful men have any part in their conversion. The armory of logic had been ransacked and every ancient weapon furbished. Godly men went forth with fury to the fray, each side determined to win this candidate to their ranks. The victim seemed to be moving toward the radicals when a conservative asked, "Do you say a sinner can have a share in his salvation? Did the man with the withered hand have any part in his healing?" The air was electric, the silence ominous. Then the youth replied, "Yes, I should say he had a hand in it." So laughter won where logic had failed.

Thus there is suggested this solemn query: have we not expected too much from argument and not enough from merriment? But a black-cowled metaphysician interjects, "Such dissertation cannot proceed until terms have been defined." Of course there is some ground for the professor's objection. On seeing two women leaning out of windows on opposite sides of the street, shaking their fists and shouting at each other, Charles Lamb remarked, "Those two will never get together for they are arguing from different premises." Although definition is usually a dreary and dangerous business, yet to be accommodating we shall turn to the dictionary. "Laughter, a noun: Consists essentially in an inspiration succeeded, not by one, but by a whole series, often long-continued, of short, spasmodic expirations, the glottis being freely open during the whole time, and the vocal cords being thrown into characteristic vibrations." Now hold that while we look for logic.

We read, "There is an intellectualistic logic coalescent with absolute metaphysic. There is an epistemological logic with sometimes formalist, sometimes methodological leanings. There is a formal-symbolic logic engaged with the elaboration of a relational calculus. There is what may be termed psychological-voluntarist logic" Enough! Professor, please excuse me. We are just plain folk talking to plain folk. Won't you let us use words as we ordinarily do without bothering ourselves about what they mean?

Head-Splitting Logic versus Side-splitting Laughter

Yet this digression has not been altogether in vain. Again we have found the dictionary significant for what it omits. It lists and defines the laughing-crow, the laughing-goose, the laughing-gull, the laughing-hyena and the laughing-jackass. But there is not a laughing-dogmatist in the whole menagerie. This is but another proof that we have had too much head-splitting logic and not enough side-splitting laughter. Oh for some jolly beggar to "stand up in wit's defense, win us from solemn vice, and laugh us into sense!" Why be so afraid to laugh? One dignified dogmatist was so worried lest he might forget himself and smile that, it is reported, every hair in his wig turned white. The Bible is not a joke-book but neither is it dull or doleful. Yet it has been maintained that to smile is sinful. An ecclesiastical body has actually declared that no one indulging in funny stories can retain good standing in their ranks. Their scriptural support is Jesus' warning regarding "idle words." If they had read any of Lincoln's yarns, they might have been persuaded no words ever wrought to better purpose than those he used in jest. No man could justly call them "idle words." On the whole horizon, is there any heresy worse than this disparagement of good humor? We do not honor our Lord when we assert he wept but never laughed. Was there not at least a twinkle in his eye when he told of that benevolent brother parading along Main street behind his own hired brass band on his way to Widow Brown's with a basket of provisions? Did no hearer smile when he spoke of that altruistic oculist trying to remove a splinter from a neighbor's eye when there was a whole plank in his own eye? Did he not put a few of his hearers into a rather jolly frame of mind when he described the Pharisee so meticulously scouring the outside of the cup and so unmindful of the unclean interior? Then straining away a mosquito, he swallows a camel! Picture the process. "The long hairy neck slid down the throat of the Pharisee, all the amplitude of loose-hung anatomy, the hump, two humps, both of them slid down—and he never noticed—and the legs, all of them, with the whole outfit of knees and big, padded feet." Did no one catch the humor of that? Was not pharisaical logic that day lost in laughter?

A Prescription for Ills

At the American Institute of Homeopathy, Dr. Frederick W. Seward prescribed for our ills when he said, "Look for the funny side of life. I advise neurasthenics to cultivate a taste for comic stories." A solemn stockholder wrote to Carnegie complaining: "Your Mr. Schwab does not have a proper sense of dignity. When he meets with his directors, their laughter can be heard all over the office." Carnegie forwarded the letter to Schwab. With it he sent the framed picture of a monk holding his fat sides and laughing hilariously. "Hang this picture where directors can get a good look at it," Carnegie suggested. "Let it be a constant reminder that good business is never done except in a happy frame of mind." When fault was found with Lincoln because he joked during the dark days of war, he said, "I could secure the defeat of our whole army by looking glum at this reception."

But we are contending for the faith once for all delivered! This is no joking matter. You misunderstand if you think we think it is. But long ago a wise man wrote, "How is error best confuted? Is it with scowling looks, angry sarcasms, biting rankling words of venom, or with a good-humored smiling face, with quiet innuendo, sportive irony, and that gentle lambent humor which like sheet-lightning hurts nobody and illuminates everything with soft bright flashes?"

Some dare not laugh because the light-hearted are so commonly dismissed as light-headed too. Many a light man has risen by his gravity while another of greater worth has fallen by his levity. We hold no brief for simple souls that go into convulsions at the touch of a feather, but neither do we forget that a man of some consequence wrote "The Merry Wives of Windsor." Humor is a gift reserved for man at his best and is never found except in a mind that can be both grave and gay. Emerson wrote, "The perception of the ridiculous is a pledge of sanity." Of all things, keep out of the ranks of the mesogelastick, the laughter-hating.

But how can anybody go through the controversy of these days and not laugh a little? Have you never at some religious assembly felt an involuntary twinkle in your eye as you looked at the almost Gothic front of some serious controversialist and listened to his ex-cathedra utterance? How could any mere mortal wear such an air of infallibility? While he was settling the most abstruse problems offhand with such finality, did you not find your attention distracted just a bit by some Bertrand Russell asking, "Sir, is there any knowledge of which a reasonable man may be so absolutely certain?" You brushed him aside saying, "Well, there's the table that inerrant brother just pounded. We know that is a table." But Russell comes back, "Be not so positive. To your eye it looks of certain shape and color. To one in another part of this hall it looks another shape and color. To your eye it looks smooth, but use a microscope. What a difference! A more powerful glass would reveal still another surface. Which is the real table? Indeed a little time might discover good philosophical reasons for believing there is no table there at all and that the all too-solid theologian now apparently troubling you is nothing more than an echo from the void." And you smiled.

Dead as the Dodo

But our impassioned platform pomposity is now denouncing some awful absentee for believing or not believing something or other. Either way it is something so delicate that the shading of a word may make a world of difference. When the culprit is quoted, we wonder, was the emphasis originally put just there? But worse than that. He admits he did not hear this fearful thing said. He has heard that somebody heard that somewhere somebody said that another had heard. By that time surely Doctor Eliot's scholarly conclusion had come to your mind, "The average American educated or uneducated, cannot see straight, or hear straight, or think straight, and cannot deal with reasonable accuracy one hour afterward a conversation in which he participated or an incident which he witnessed." And you smiled. Now our oracle is making one welkin ring with proof positive that everything depends upon the settlement of this issue this way forthwith. No matter what the point. It might be any one of a hundred. By that time echoes from other platforms and other days begin drifting to your ears. Excited speakers contend, "This is that upon which the whole superstructure rests." From time to time different slogans are pounded out, "Novatianism, Donatism, Montanism, Docetism." Don't call for the dictionary, please. Enough that you know that these issues over which men once so bitterly fought are now as dead as the dodo. The historian whispers, "So it will be again." And you smile.

Our preacher takes a text: "The greatest of these is love." He preaches like one from heaven sent. But alas, his eye falls on a poor mortal of another school and now the sling is in his hands and hard, very hard names are hurtling through that religious atmosphere. A rebounding missile hits the hardened newspaper man, an ex-war-correspondent, a resounding blow and, snatching his hat, he escapes holding his head and lamenting, "Is there no Gilead?" From some safe retreat, he issues a war bulletin, "Armageddon again! Contending hosts charged down upon one another with incredible fury, hacking, thrusting, and skull-splitting until this poor man did not dare longer wait for Truth to rise from that confusion but fled in terror from the scene and continuing in the words of Doctor Jacks prayed to the gods that the tide of battle might not flow his way, that his ox, his ass, and his little ones might be spared, and that no fiery dart might light upon his cottage-thatch." There was something funny about that and yet you did not find it quite so easy now to smile.

Logic has its uses and its limitations. In vain ecclesiastics debated on the proper way to pray. Some argued for bended knees and others for upright posture and uplifted hands. The matter was finally settled, at least for many, not by argument but by a comic page from life. There is history and parable in these funereal lines:

"Last year I fell in Hodgkin's well
Head first," said Cyrus Brown,
"With both my heels a-sticken up,
My head a-pinting down.

An' I made a prayer right then and there,
Best prayer I ever said,
The prayingest prayer I ever prayed,
A-standing on my head."

We did not see Cyrus but can vouch for the suppressed excitement in a Baptist ordination council when a young radical expressed doubt regarding a personal devil. Argument had no weight with those who opposed his ordination. Then one arose who chose the better way. "This brother," he said, "is only a young man yet. He has much to learn and is open-minded. This church has called him and believes in him. He believes in Christ and I am confident he will not have lived long in this community before being persuaded of the personality of the devil." The affirmative vote went sailing through on that wave of merriment. All afternoon and evening and part of another day, Anna Howard Shaw was bombarded with interrogations by those who opposed her ordination. "An elder shall be the husband of one wife," was quoted by a bachelor who triumphantly inquired, "How is it possible for you to be the husband of a wife?" "My good brother," Miss Shaw responded, "has evidently forgotten that he is an elder and also a bachelor. It would seem I am as much of a husband as is he." "Wives obey your husbands," quoted an old man and asked, "Suppose your husband should refuse to allow you to preach, what then?" "I'm a spinster," she responded, "that does not concern me." "You might marry some day," he predicted cautiously. "Possibly; wiser women than I have married. But it is equally possible that I might marry a man who would command me to preach. In that case I want to be all ready to obey him." Could any mere logician have answered so well such wild absurdities? For hours inquisitors plagued another poor candidate with questions on all manner of vain speculations. Finally the exhausted youth was asked if he were willing to be damned for the glory of God. That was the limit. He answered that he was not willing to be damned for the glory of God, but if it were for the glory of God that this ecclesiastical council be damned, he would in no way raise any objection.

A New Text

When you have knocked logic out of things theological, there is not much left of theology. But religion is something more than an intellectual answer to intellectual problems. Our troubles never will be settled by argument alone. Give us less of the poor "chopped straw of logic" and more of the joy of the Lord, and we will see the prodigals come home and hear again a divine voice ordering the music and the dance. We do not say, "Amen" to the prayer, "Lord save us from modern thought; yea, deliver us from all thought whatsoever;" but we do long for the time when we can return to our churches to report our convention experience from the text, "Then was our mouth filled with laughter and then said they among the heathen the Lord hath done great things for them."

Our Nation's Debt to Its Soldiers

The men in service today are in the midst of peculiar temptations. We must keep active in spiritual ministry to them.

BY FRANK C. RIDEOUT, CHAPLAIN, U. S. A.

THE United States of America as a nation owes a very considerable debt of gratitude, appreciation and loyalty to the regular army. Indeed, this institution, created by the regular processes of law, has abundantly justified its existence through all the changing years of our national life. One has but to recall the pioneer days of the nation's history to be reminded of the arduous labors, the genuine sacrifices and the countless deeds of heroism upon the part of those who have made the profession of arms their contribution to the nation's well being—giving life and sacrificial service when called upon to do so. This has been the lot and the history of the regular army of the United States through all the years since 1776. They invariably have been ready when the call of duty sounded.

In days of stress and storm, when danger has been imminent, when threatening clouds have gathered upon the horizon, the proudest and the most honorable thing that any real, red-blooded, able-bodied, citizen could do, was to don the uniform of the soldier. For the soldier's uniform has always been, in times of strife, the noblest symbol of sacrificial service, as well as the undisputed badge of honorable distinction. We can all readily recall that in 1917 it was not the young man in uniform who was under the necessity of making excuses in most localities throughout our land. He did not have to show the reason why.

Scoffers

There is a reason perhaps why some men dislike the uniform. But that reason is more psychological than philosophical. Although, unfortunately, all of us at times have been caused to grieve at what we have seen inside of a soldier's uniform, for my part I would just as soon see a man or a maiden sneer at the flag of our country as at the soldier's uniform. The man who sneers at a soldier merely because he is a soldier, having no other basis for his sneer than the knowledge possessed by all of the meagerness of the soldier's pay, is just as unbecoming in his deportment as the man who scoffs at the Lord's prayer. He might also scoff at our teachers, our legislators, our ministers of the gospel, our college professors—for that matter at our president himself. The man who places the justification for a sneer upon such a basis might laugh at any man who is willing to serve his country and the great causes of humanity for a stipend which does not and cannot represent an adequate compensation for his services.

It is a well-known fact that one heedless, unthinking, foolhardy soldier can sometimes give the organization to which he belongs more unfavorable publicity in a single day than a whole regiment of good soldiers can overcome in a twelve-month. There are many soldiers in the army now, under twenty-one years of age, who, out of their small monthly allowances, are helping to support widowed mothers; who are assisting in keeping smaller brothers and sisters in school; who are helping to keep the wolf away from the doors of worthy parents, and in doing many other worthy things.

The soldier of yesteryear deserves the wholehearted respect and the grateful appreciation of our nation's citizenry. When we recall the fact that in the early years of our nation's existence the soldiers of our regular army acted as surveyors of unexplored territory, built roads, bridges and railroads, established lines of communication, opened up navigable rivers, acted as sentries year after year in lonely outposts of our pioneer civilization, all for the safety and the protection of infant colonies and trading posts; when we remember that both officers and enlisted men hazarded their lives day after day in defending the early pioneers from the ravages of the blood-thirsty red men; when we remember that these same redoubtable scions of thrilling adventure penetrated the primeval forests, pushed out farther and farther across the prairies and over the mountain ranges, ever acting as the advance guard of the famous "covered wagon"; when we remember all this, we shall do well to pause in reverence in the midst of our humdrum day of affairs to hallow the memory of such men as served their country in those far off nearly forgotten days. The peace time achievements of our regular army is a thrilling story to the man who is so minded as to be fair, unbiased, and willing to face the facts. The contribution of regular troops to the nation's equilibrium, safety and satisfaction is not inconsiderable, even in these more recent days.

The part played by regulars in Chicago in the days of the transportation strike; in San Francisco during those awful days following the earthquake, in Galveston, Tex., during the flood; in Panama, after the French government had utterly failed; in Texas City swamps, in West Virginia, and in Gary, Ind., during the great industrial upheavals—those eventualities have amply justified the existence of the army, if there can be any justification for the safeguarding of the civil, the personal, the industrial rights of a people under any pretext whatsoever at any time.

Control of Pestilence

The story of the transformation of the Panama canal zone from a place of pestilence and almost certain death to a veritable health resort, as a result of the patient work of the army medical corps, cannot fail to inspire confidence in the military establishment when that institution is given an important public service to perform. Likewise, the control and practical elimination of typhoid, malaria, yellow fever and dysentery in our extra-territorial possessions and at home will remain forever among the worth-while accomplishments of the military. The romance of chloroform gas treatment for colds came about as a result of persistent and painstaking experimentation of army doctors during and since the great war. And it is not an extravagant prophecy to suppose that within a few years more lives will be saved annually as a result of the discovery than were lost by our nation in the world war. The names of such army doctors as Beaumont, Gorgas, Reed and Vedder will forever be enshrined in the memory of a grateful nation's populace.

Moreover, we shall do well to acquaint ourselves with the fact that right now, in addition to duties of a purely military character, large sections of our troops are carrying forward the processes of our American civilization in Cuba, in Panama, in the Philippine islands, and at many lonely stations along the Mexican border, at great personal sacrifice, and, in many instances, under conditions of great inconvenience.

The citizens' military training camps and the reserve officers' training corps camps, such as are held at convenient places throughout the country every summer, are without question one of our nation's greatest assets, contributing more to our nation as a return for the money spent perhaps than any other institution in existence, when values of morality, virile physical manhood and character are concerned. Such lessons of citizenship, obedience to law, and rugged honor as our army officers are able to inculcate within the hearts of the young men who attend these summer camps, is of untold value to the nation as a whole. And I am very proud to hear testimony to the fact that our splendid, efficient army officers are for the most part true to the trust that has been reposed in them by the nation, and are doing all in their power to inspire the men under them to a higher patriotism, and to useful, honorable, productive living. In fact, both officers and enlisted men are especially selected by the military authorities for work of this kind because of their character qualifications and aptitude for the work; and engage themselves in enterprises which in all the years to come will reflect due credit upon our country as a whole. And we cannot fail to see that the spirit of heroism, romance, and service for one's country is not yet altogether dead.

Now, in consideration of all this, is it not time for somebody or some organization to take a definite stand in defense of the moral and spiritual rights of the soldier? Is it not time for someone to lay upon the hearts and the consciences of good-meaning American citizens the burden and the challenge of a duty which lies, not in far away foreign fields, but directly before them like an open door?

To be specific, religious work in the army is not receiving the support of the people of the churches of Christ it should receive. The churches seem to have forgotten that large numbers of soldiers need their continued prayers and interest; and that the chaplains who represent them need the moral and sometimes the financial backing of the denominations which gave them to the service. During the world war when practically every family in the land had its representative in khaki, a tremendous wave of interest for the spiritual welfare of enlisted men swept over the country. But now that only about one home in one hundred has a son in the service, that interest has become almost nil! "Is Christian interest to be so selfish? Is Christian America to be vitally interested only where one of our own circle is involved. Such is not Christianity. The souls of the men now in service are as precious as the souls of men in civilian life. The men in service today are in the midst of peculiar temptations and spiritual as well as physical danger. We must keep up interest. We must keep active in spiritual ministry to these men."

A Chaplain's Difficulties

One of the outstanding needs of the army at the present time is adequate, suitable chapels on military reservations where the religious work of the chaplain may be carried on in a dignified and proper manner. Civilians for the most part are not at all familiar with the fact that under present conditions religious work in the army is greatly hampered and hindered because of this lack. Not infrequently chaplains are under the necessity of being obliged to transform for divine worship on Sunday morning a room which has been used for all sorts of affairs during the preceding week, and perhaps a dancing party the evening before. In many garrisons the enlisted men's service club is used by the chaplain for his Sunday school and divine services. In these buildings, most of which were constructed during the war for temporary use only, a dozen different functions must be provided for during the week. A kindergarten school, movies, and various shows have their turn. The distracting atmosphere of such a place, the inherent lack of reverence, together with the absence of all the trifles which make perfection in worship, make the army chaplain's task a very difficult one. Usually, in addition to this, he is obliged to conduct worship without the expenditure of funds (excepting his own) for music, printing and the many little incidentals. Often he has no organ, no choir, not even a piano excepting the one which is tuned to concert pitch for the use of an orchestra for dance music.

What a missionary opportunity has been overlooked here! What a moral challenge to Christian America—125,000 enlisted men in our army, and 12,000 officers. These enlisted men are for the most part, perhaps 75 per cent, under twenty-one years of age. They are now preparing themselves for the duties of citizenship. They are American boys. This is a challenge that lies at the very door of the church. The churches have rivaled one another in entering the open door of China and India and Japan, but they refuse, so far at least, to enter this open door, despite the fact that their boys are in the service and their ordained ministers, as chaplains, are up against even greater odds in some respects than the missionaries in foreign fields experience.

What a noble thing it would be if the various denominations would get together in a cooperative effort and construct chapels at all our army stations! Of necessity it would have to be a cooperative movement for the government will perhaps approve only of a plan of chapel construction with the proviso that such buildings shall be pan-sectarian in character, and donations not limited to any particular sect or society. It would be good for the souls of American Christians to do something definite and concrete for the souls of American soldiers.

Houses of Worship

During all the years of our nation's history so far as is known only two houses of worship have been built from public funds for use by the army. One is at West Point and the other at Fort Yellowstone. Many chapels have been provided through the genius of local garrisons in utilizing surplus materials, soldier labor, and such contributions as were available. In a few cases individual churches have assumed the whole responsibility for little chapels such as are at Fort Monroe, Va.; Fort Douglas, Utah; and Fort Apache, Ariz. Not more than half a dozen posts of the entire army have chapels which could in any sense of the word be considered suitable and adequate. Among these, in addition to West Point, N. Y., already named, are Fort Moultrie, S. C.; Fort Sam Houston, Tex.; Fort Riley, Kas.; and Fort Leavenworth, Kas. No permanent houses of worship have been built since the war, but a number of garrisons have utilized materials in providing chapels which will at least serve the purpose for a few years to come. Fort Eustis, Va., and Fort Benning, Ga., are good examples of this.

While recommendations have been made to the war department by strong religious leaders, urging the construction of suitable places of worship at army posts in the future, no definite program has yet been announced. And it is quite possible this matter will be delayed indefinitely, or at least until the physical well-being of troops is provided for. It is not generally known that some regiments are now living under canvas along the Mexican border and in other places. Indeed some 40,000 troops are now living in cantonment buildings of temporary construction and in quarters which are in no sense of the word either comfortable, adequate or sufficient. Until suitable barracks and quarters are provided for these troops, it would be folly to urge a policy of chapel construction upon the part of the government, as ideal as this course would seem. And besides this difficulty of providing for the things which are absolutely essential, there are many powerful influences which are continually urging congress to cut to the bone all army appropriations. And there remains a reasonable doubt in the minds of many persons as to whether the government ought really to be called upon to build houses of worship. The government will permit the churches to prosecute this work in this field. Is not that a challenge to the churches?

As an illustration of the urgency of the need for chapels, the condition of affairs at Fort Snelling, Minn., may be cited as a fair example. This garrison has a permanent population of about 1,500 soldiers and seventy-five officers and upwards of 500 women and children families of officers and soldiers. A soldier's enlistment is for a period of three years. An officer's tour of duty at a given station is usually three years, but for the convenience of the government he may remain only one or two years. Some 1,500 college students from thirty institutions of higher learning and from seven or eight states attend the reserve officers' training corps camps at Fort Snelling for a period of six weeks every summer. And some 1,200 to 1,400 young men from four or five states attend the citizen's military training camps every summer. And despite the importance of Fort Snelling as a military training center it has no chapel. Religious services and Sunday school are held wherever a convenient place can be found. But, even at the best it is quite unsuitable. Fort Snelling was made a military garrison in the year 1819. And yet through all these years Fort Snelling has been without even a place where the Ark of the Covenant might rest. And nobody seems to have been offended. Nobody has complained. And everybody seems tolerably content to just let things go on and on this way forever. On the other hand it has been one of the scandals of our civilization that churches have overlapped and duplicated their efforts in many places in order to outdo one another denominationally; and so keen has been the rivalry that multitudes of villages with less than 2,000 souls have half a score or more of churches, all struggling to do just about the same thing.

Am I overstating the case when I say that the civilian population of a given community owes to the soldiers of that community something of that same opportunity for decency, for morality and for the cultivation of the spiritual instincts as they themselves enjoy. That opportunity has not yet been made for many army posts. A crusade upon the part of the religious and patriotic forces of the nation in behalf of properly appointed places of divine worship at army stations would only be in line with the genius of our Christian civilization. Some body of Christians ought to take the place of moral leadership in this respect. Why should it not be the great, liberty-loving, democratic Baptist denomination? Some one should undertake to arouse the conscience of American Christian people and awaken to responsive, definite action those forces of righteousness which ought to be concerned in this enterprise.

In many cities throughout the land war memorials have been constructed in recent years at great cost, to perpetuate the memory and to honor the noble deeds of dear departed soldiers. Why would it not have been just as appropriate to have constructed useful monuments for the living in honor of the dead, in the form of chapels at our army stations? Such a program ought surely to make its silent appeal to all persons who love justice. It would be placing an emphasis where it properly belongs. There is scarcely a soldier in the army but would desire to see a chapel, adequate in size and suitable in architecture and appointment, at his station; and every soldier who serves his flag and country would be benefited thereby. George Washington, the soldier, knelt in the snow at Valley Forge and prayed for his country, and particularly for his soldiers. Have you once stopped to pray for the soldiers who serve your country now? If so, are you willing to do anything else for them. Now is a good time to begin.

Conservation and Distribution of Baptist Resources in Great Cities

BY CHARLES HATCH SEARS

(Note: This is the second of a series of three articles prepared at the request of "The Baptist" to review the scope of the forthcoming volume on Baptist City Planning, a volume prepared under the direction of the author of these articles, comprising the work of fifteen committees representative of the Baptist leadership in our great cities.)

FOUR successive inundations of foreign-speaking peoples swept over a certain church in New York during a single pastorate. From American it became German, Irish, Italian and Jewish in turn. How may a church adjust itself to such rapid changes in its constituency? Can a church remain indigenous under such conditions?

It must be granted that many churches make no attempt to adapt themselves to their respective communities, unless indeed the community is interpreted as the entire city and its environs. To this wider area they make a selective appeal to like-minded individuals; an appeal based on social ties and theological divergencies, ultra-conservative or ultra radical, to extreme emotionalism or to extreme intellectualism, or perhaps to a given racial group. Given a great personality, be he Pastor Russell or John Hayne Holmes, this kind of a church persists and prospers during the life of the leader. A great city is fond of extremes, especially if those extremes are vehemently uttered. Such churches perform a great service, but the great mass of the city's people go on neither knowing nor caring anything about them. This kind of a church can never penetrate the masses of New York City.

A ministry of true reconciliation to all peoples requires a knowledge of the "by-ways." It must emanate from an "outreaching" church. The eager host whom Jesus commended was not content to remain at home and receive the regrets of his own class to his dinner party, but he sent out his servants into the "by-ways."

The city as a whole is too much for any church, but no community is too big a task for a church that preaches, teaches, and ministers through a long period of years in the spirit and power of the Master.

Fortunately the city is readily broken up into small communities. The Northern Baptist city planning committee has thought of the city as divided into these types of communities:

The downtown district, located in or near the retail district, the theater district and the hotel district, usually surrounded by some of the old residences of the "first families"; some of them indeed still occupied by the original owners, but now for the most part used as rooming-houses. The green country boy is there, the foreigner is near at hand, also the confidence man and the criminal. Social currents here converge in a whirlpool which bears up the "flotsam" and "jetsam" of society. It is the real center of the mass life of the city.

The older residence district, characterized by a changing community: the older American Protestant stock steadily moving to better residence areas; a population of European parentage, prevailingly Roman Catholic and Irish coming in; in some communities an influx of negroes; business encroaching; houses for a single family usually deteriorated; a depression due to decreased attendance, loss of old leaders, and growing financial burdens; competition among Protestant churches of the community to the "diluted" Protestant population—and, to add to this complexity, lack of denominational understanding and sympathy because the church has not been able to keep its time leading position in denominational enterprises—rather poor pasture land, one blade of grass grown where ten grew before, intensive farming not yet considered.

The newer residence district, characterized by an incoming tide of American population, aggressive and with initiative. Here are to be found little white beds and many carriages. Here are to be found future leaders. These localities are ordinarily predominately Protestant in their sympathies, not always in their affiliations. They are economically resourceful though often composed of people of moderate means. Their giving capacity is frequently limited by their ambition to establish their homes and educate their children.

Industrial areas: Industry has not merely created districts; it has created the city. The modern city is actuated for by the machine and is built around the manufacturing plant. From 1865 manufacturing as compared with agriculture steadily advanced. Tools have yielded to machines, machines to "plant," and "labor" has been made dependent on conditions. The employe works for a corporation. The old close contacts with understanding, sympathy and feeling of mutuality are largely gone. All has tended to produce a class—"the workers." The worker's job is his life, and he feels that he has lost control of it. He has sought to regain control through labor unions. Widespread social unrest exists, growing out of a sense of restricted freedom, quite as much as from a sense of injustice in the distribution of the fruits of industry. This attitude has seriously affected the working man's attitude toward the church. His feelings and prejudices shut him away from the church and make an evangelistic approach to him next to impossible. Industry erects barriers between the working man and the church.

Foreign language areas: Hedged in by barriers of religious and racial prejudice, speaking a foreign language, and largely dominated by old world ideas, these foreign-speaking communities constitute a very real problem and a great challenge to the Christian church. An American church which does not adapt its program to the new conditions is only marooned and has no influence in such a community.

The negro districts: Many northern cities, especially since the world war, have large negro colonies. Acute social problems are found due to housing shortage, "frail, flimsy, dingy, unkempt buildings," lack of educational facilities, the prevalence of vice and religious neglect. These communities have not been served by the older churches—except the negroes have created a new expulsive force, pushing out old established churches, and an adequate number of new churches with proper equipment have not taken their places. Moreover, the ministry to negroes is largely a Baptist opportunity. In Chicago, for example, there are forty times as many negro Baptists as negro Methodists, thirty times as many as negro Presbyterians. In the United States one out of every four negroes is a Baptist church member. Add the children of negro Baptist families and the ratio would be greatly increased.

Distribution of Forces and Resources

The rapid shifting from one type of community to another, including the successive rapid inundations even within communities predominantly foreign, all tend to a loss of morale on the part of a given church; a weakening of its working force and a loss of financial resources. Churches facing changed community conditions in the older residence districts require the most careful guidance. In the case of churches located in foreign-speaking districts clearly some of them should become foreign-language churches, these churches in time changing with the community until they again emerge as English speaking. There are several inspiring examples of this transition. Conservation of church membership is vital to avoid the heavy wastage in "lost" and "depreciated" members. It is estimated that the average church member in absentia depreciates 20 per cent per year. How long will he last? How long can a church last with this wastage? According to the Springfield survey, it takes a gross gain of ten members to make a net gain of three. It is essential to conserve the membership. These methods are suggested: monthly registration at communion service with follow-up of habitual absentees; emphasis on obligation to take letters with removal; use of city and state offices to assist in following up removals. The City Union should help conserve Baptist constituency. All of its progress depends upon it. One of the legitimate aims of evangelism is to recruit the forces of the church.

The conservation of the resources of the church comes to have extreme importance. "A church building is a tool to be used for the kingdom of God. Tools are good only when they are useful in accomplishing the work for which they were invented. A church building is good so long as it helps the congregation do the work of the kingdom in its neighborhood to the best advantage. When it does not do this it should be changed, moved or adapted." It is essential that there should be a recognition of denominational relationships to properties. The Northern Baptist Convention has recognized this in a declaration against the use of proceeds of mortgages for repairs or current expense. If the various types of work required from a denomination are to be done adequately, there must be a certain mobility in property values, and denominational resources must not forever be allocated to a particular enterprise. Our assets must not always be "frozen;" the good of all is the highest good of each. All this requires denominational foresight; a willingness to take the long look and particularly a willingness to think in terms of our denominational contribution to the great common cause. The city presents a fine opportunity for Baptists to learn a new lesson—a lesson that Jesus taught and Paul emphasized. The law of Baptist independence must yield to the gospel of denominational interdependence; a willingness to do for love's own sake what the law cannot demand as its right. "Behold I show you a new commandment that you love one another."

LEISURE is not what one would call a luxury; it is a necessity of living. Unless we get leisure we do not work effectively. We must at times pause and be free, or our work degenerates. We must get out of the groove which, as Silvester Horne said, "differs from the grave only in depth." We need leisure not as a substitute for work, but as the condition of good work. We do not work well unless we have our proper leisure; we do not enjoy our leisure properly unless we have our proper work.—ROBERT F. HORTON in Christian Work.

The Devotional Life

Moments on the Mount

"Jesus took with him Peter and James and his brother John, and led them up a high mountain, by themselves apart."—Matt. 17:1.

BY C. A. DANIEL

WE NEED to get away from the smoky atmosphere of the earth, from clouds and fog, which are so apt to shut out our vision. We are in the valley of sorrow and death, of anxiety and care, of hurry and bustle, of worry and gloom, of noise and turpitude. Jesus invites his disciples to go up into the mountaintop of prayer and communion with God. We need the reverent joy of mountaintop experiences in the spiritual life. There are too many people content to live on the plain and in the valley, who never dream that there is anything better for them in store. But there surely is—attainable on the mountaintop of prayer and communion with Jesus. Christ was transfigured while he was praying in the mountain and the three disciples beheld his glory there.

Comforting Moments

These moments were rich to the Lord Jesus himself, for they revealed the Father's love to him in a time of crisis. He was then in the very shadow of death on the cross. Moses and Elijah appeared unto him and talked to him concerning the coming passion. The law and the prophets had predicted his suffering and death. The presence of these men was an encouragement to the Lord in the pathway of obedience and death.

These moments were full of holy pleasure and joy to the three disciples. They looked back to them with peculiar interest and assurance of Christ's divinity and glory. Peter asserts that they were not following cunningly devised fables, when "we told you of the power and presence of the Lord Jesus Christ, but we had been eye witnesses of his majesty."

Mountaintop moments are needful to us as Christians. Prayer-meetings, services, conferences, associations in God's house and with God's children are frequently mountaintops of holy delight and pleasure. Let us not remain in the hovel, when the Master has a mansion prepared for us; let us not be content with the plain, when we might be on the mountaintop with our Lord in transfiguration.

Such mountaintops may become moments of holy fear. "When the disciples heard the voice of the Father, they fell on their faces and were sore afraid." It is a grand and awful thing to have a vision of God. The first moments may be joy and pleasure, when we are ready to remain with the glorified Saviour on the mount. But there comes to us presently a sense of fear as we stand in the presence of the Lord. His greatness and our nothingness become evident; we face his holiness and immediately become conscious of our sinfulness, when we contrast God's supremacy and our own unworthiness. All men have experienced it when they were brought into the presence of Almighty God.

Visioning God

Moses felt it, when he approached the burning bush; Samson's parents were sore afraid and Manoah said unto his wife: "We shall surely die, because we have seen God." Isaiah was undone, when he saw the Lord sitting upon a throne high and lifted up and his train filled the temple. "Woe is me for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts." When Peter witnessed the miraculous draught of fishes "he fell down at the knees of Jesus and said: 'Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord.'" "The disciples were sore afraid, when they beheld the glory of Jesus and heard the Father's voice." Moments of fear—we get them when we are face to face with God.

We are sorely in need of such moments today to awaken in us the sense of fear, sinfulness and repentance. When our sermons, our speech, our conversation and our life have more of God in them, then shall we have more consciousness of sin among men. Men will repent, when they are brought face to face with God. This will bring more true repentance, and condemnation of crime and wickedness about us.

Jesus Only

There will come to us the moments of quiet submission and solemn surrender and yielding to God's will. The sense of the Lord's presence and our own unworthiness are the best aid to our loyal service. When Moses and Elijah disappear, the disciples see Jesus only. And Jesus only is sufficient for our service. His authority and Lordship are more to us in life than the law and the prophets; Jesus is the fulfillment and the fulfiller of both. He is the law of our life and action. He is the true prophet, hear ye him. He is the Saviour from sin, cling to him. He is almighty, be ye girded in his strength. He is our all and in all, the complement of every need of the human soul.

May we never forget the moments of joy and delight that have come to us while we were on the mountaintop of prayer and communion with the Lord. Let us be ever mindful too of God's omnipresence and holiness and our utter unworthiness in the moments of holy fear. Then let us be up and doing, for the moments of quiet submission and sweet surrender always lead us to go down to the plain and into the valley with the vision to our common every-day duties and our tasks in the kingdom of God. It is to serve him in the world, when we have frequent moments of communion with Jesus on the mount.

Young People and the Kingdom

CONDUCTED BY EDWIN PHELPS, GENERAL SECRETARY, B. Y. P. U. OF A.

Meeting Helps" on C. L. P. Topics for April 11

(Note: All references hereafter made to these "Meeting Helps" will be to the following books: "Modern Discipleship and What It Means" by Woods; "The Man Nobody Knows" by Barton; "Twelve Tests of Character" by Fosback; "Gates and Keys to Bible Books" by Robinson; "How We Got Our Bible" by Smyth; "A Short History of the Christian Church" by Moncrief; "Peasants and Pioneers" by Miller; "God's Dynamite" by Lerrigo. The books may be ordered from the American Baptist Publication Society. A few others may be added later.)

Pages 294-301 of "Gates and Keys to Bible Books" give some interesting and helpful notes on the book of Acts.

If you will notice, the suggestions for advertising contain a statement that there will be "A Live Meeting in Four Acts." In order to carry out the idea, this lesson may be presented "in four acts." Four of the members of the leading group may be asked to read different selections in the book of Acts, as for example, one may read Acts 3; another Acts 11:4-18; another Acts 11:26-19; and another Acts 19:1-20. Perhaps other selections may be chosen, depending upon which acts of the apostles will appeal most to the young people.

In meeting, the leader may, after the preliminary songs, prayer, etc., make some such statement as "Miss Blank will give us the first act." Miss Blank may then come forward and tell in as interesting a way as possible about what she had read in the third chapter of Acts. Perhaps the leader may make a little interludatory remark about what Miss Blank says, and then call for the next "act."

The people who have been assigned selections from Acts may, when called for, repeat what Miss Blank has said—tell in their own words what they read in the portion of Scripture they were to read, the leader each time commenting or calling for comment upon the story by those in the audience.

In conclusion the leader may point out that the book of Acts came to be written as a sort of diary in which the writers put down their impressions of what was going on about them, as they remembered them. It may also be brought out that these things had been wonderful to the writers that they could not help but put them down—thus serving for us today some of these wonderful "Acts."

If you wish to do so, you may also use as an extra "act" some of the actions as contained in the modern "Acts of the Apostles" (The Book of a Thousand Facts) presented by members of the group, showing that today, too, the disciples of Christ are endeavoring to follow in the footsteps of their predecessors. If you do not already have a copy of this "Book of a Thousand Facts" you may secure one from B. Y. P. U. of A.

It may be pointed out that we are today living in a time when miracles are being performed by these modern disciples of Christ, since what the missionaries and ministers and teachers are doing, are veritable miracles. Perhaps comparison may be made between the Bible Acts and the modern Acts, with the conclusion showing that when Christ really reigns in the lives of people there will be wonderful works.

Which Way?

Those who attended the sixteenth annual Baptist Young People's Conference of the Rocky Mountain Association were pointed to the best way of traveling through life. This "way" was given a different name at each of the five sessions, each name showing one meaning or purpose which could be placed upon that way. "The Open Road" was the first title which that way bore. On that open road, the young people were brought face to face with "The Crux of the Cross Roads" in an address.

On Saturday morning, "The Royal Road to Learning" was the caption of that way. After a praise service and devotions, the young people went into conferences on methods and plans of work among young people, including juniors and intermediates. Afterward they met to talk over the whole conference session and were shown in an inspiring message that this royal road to learning was "The King's Highway."

That afternoon the road was called "The Way to Achievement" and through conference periods they were shown how this way opened up to them.

"They say" about the results of the C. L. P.

(being interpreted, Christian Life Program):

"Greater reverence in the meetings; doubled membership; active definite service; planning a definite way for support of our school and mission programs; definite plans for assembly."

—B. Y. P. U., First church, Horton, Kansas.

"Paths of Power" were revealed to them later through an address.

A detour was taken after the afternoon session. The name of that detour was "The Way to a Man's Heart." Yes, you guessed it—a banquet. After enjoying the good things prepared for them, the young people listened to an address on "Slow Down! Curve Ahead!"

"The High Road to Success" was the name of the way for the next session on Sunday morning. On this road they were met with "The Challenge of Today," an address of power and encouragement. The afternoon was the climax of the whole conference, with "The Sky Line Road to Service" as the name of the way. And as the young people became acquainted with that sky line road to service, they were shown the "Jesus Way" as the supreme example.

Many that day decided to take this way of life, decided to travel "The Open Road" which was also the royal road to learning, the way to achievement, the high road to success and the sky line road to service.

Have you ever thought of having a "convention" in your association? For that is what these Rocky Mountain young people have been doing.

This convention lasted from Friday evening until Sunday afternoon—dismissing in time for the young people to get home for B. Y. P. U. and the evening service. One general thought, as you note, was carried throughout the entire period—the idea of traveling the "high way." Then the general thought was divided into five sub-topics or thoughts, with one for each session. The addresses were made by ministers within the association.

"Oh," you say, "where do the young people come in? Did they just sit around and listen?" No, indeed. At the beginning of each session a praise and devotional service was held, each being conducted by one of the young people in the association. Special music was furnished by four young people from the Colorado Woman's College. You could perhaps duplicate this by a quartet from a church, or if there is a college near you, by a quartet from there.

The banquet was furnished by the entertaining church, as was the lodging of the delegates from out of town. A small registration fee helped to defray other expenses.

With some work, your association could set up a similar program, giving the young people a "boost" during the midyear when they may be discouraged with their efforts, or giving them inspiration to do still greater things for Christ.

The Chimney Corner

Too Industrious

BY HELEN EKIN STARRETT

NO observer of the common methods of household life, especially among that large class who are in medium circumstances, neither poor nor rich, but in the main comfortable, can fail to be struck with the different way in which men and women regard and use leisure time. In fact, it is a question whether the majority of the mistresses of such homes ever know what it is to enjoy a bit of genuine leisure. They are always oppressed with a sense of the necessity of chipping some odd bit of work into every chink of leisure time. This is industry pushed to the point where it becomes a vice, and often makes a very disagreeable element in domestic life.

For instance, a member of the family wishes to read aloud some interesting article or poem. The busy mother listens with apparent interest and enjoyment, but the work in her hands is, after all, of paramount importance, and she does not hesitate to interrupt the reader at the most interesting part of the narrative with the request to "stop till I try on this apron I am making Millie," or "wait a moment while I go downstairs and press out this seam;" or if the work is not actually in her hands, her mind is running on household cares, and with a kind of double consciousness that occasionally breaks out in such exclamations as, "Stop a little till I call to the cook to set batter cakes for breakfast," or, "I wonder if Bridget has put the clothes to soak for the washing to-morrow," all of which remarks have the most chilling and even exasperating effect upon the interested reader and listeners, who justly regard such interruptions as trivial and unworthy.

We all remember how Jean Paul Richter, in his "Flower, Fruit, and Thorn Pieces," paints the attempts of the good Advocate of the Poor, Firmian Stanislaus, to interest and instruct his pretty but commonplace little wife, and to elevate her mentally by reading to her his productions, and of the delight that filled his heart when one evening he seemed to have secured her most earnest attention. The knitting in her hands fell to her lap, and her eyes were fixed intently on the floor. He was just completing one of his finest periods, and noticing her rapt air he exclaimed to himself, "She understands, she appreciates!" When he ceased she looked at him earnestly and said, "Don't forget to leave off that left stocking in the morning; I must darn that hole in the toe." It was the poor advocate's last attempt to secure his wife's interest and attention for his poems. From that time their paths diverged till death.

There are winter days so full of sudden sunlight that they will cheat the wise crocus into squandering its gold before its time.—Oscar Wilde.

The same abnormally developed habit of industry appears more frequently to the extreme detriment of women whose health is feeble through over-work or care of children. The weary mother has been laid up with a headache. What she needs afterward is absolute rest and recreation. As soon as she can sit up on the sofa, instead of calling for an interesting book or magazine and seeking pure diversion, she says, "Hand me that basket of stockings, I think I can darn a few of them;" or "Bring me Johnny's trousers, I will put a patch in the knee." And if unable to do these things she lets her mind get in a fret and fever because her work is getting so behindhand, which is even worse than to attempt to perform the work herself.

Fancy how it would seem to have men act so around the house! Imagine a man recovering from a headache, asking for the hatchet and a piece of pine board, and saying he "might just as well be splitting up a lot of kindlings," or that as he doesn't feel very well he "will try to mend that broken chair." Men recover from a slight indisposition sooner and more thoroughly than women simply because they make a business of getting well, just as they do of everything else.

Women have been so long preached to about the necessity of being industrious and of improving their time, and they are withal so burdened with the thousand details of unorganized work, which makes all household labor seem to accomplish so little, that they need rather to consider now how to withdraw their minds and hands from constant

A Little Matter of Accent

A business man was interviewing a young man desirous of securing a position with the firm. The applicant appealed to him so strongly that he was on the point of placing him, although his education was not all that the house desired. The applicant contended that though he had no college degree and, in fact, was not even a high-school graduate, nevertheless, he had so improved his opportunities that he could put to shame many a college graduate.

"It's interesting to me to see how absolutely the theory of a college education being necessary to success has been exploded," said the applicant, with the accent on the italicized syllables.

"Your last sentence has proved to me that it is necessary in our business," said the man, rising and bowing the applicant to the door.

household occupation, and learn to rest and refresh themselves so as to have a interest in the world outside of home.

What is the reason so many faithful mothers lose their hold on their children when they attain to manhood and womanhood to so much greater extent than the father, who is equally busy in his store? It is because the too industrious mother has failed to keep abreast of the current of thought and information, and has lost interest in the general movements around her. She thought she could not spare time to read or mingle in society. Her very devotion to her children and her home has dwarfed her nature. She is never easy except when she is at work. One of the most painful aspects, often, of such a mistaken course of conduct is the utter inability of those most interested to arrest it. Her often do husband and father plead, "O mother, do put that work away; do rely on yourself!" and how often does such request seem only to inspire a determination to do more, while the chagrin and impatience with which such misguided industry is regarded by other members of the family is set down to lack of appreciation or to an unkind spirit.

Industry is an excellent thing in a woman, as well as in man; but there is a possibility of its being practised to a degree that changes it from a virtue to a vice.—From "The Charm of a Well-Mannered Home," published by Lippincott.

Think on These Facts

21,000,000 letters went to the dead letter office last year.

803,000 parcels did likewise.

100,000 letters go into the mail yearly in perfectly blank envelopes.

$55,000 in cash is removed annually from misdirected envelopes.

$12,000 in postage stamps is found in similar fashion.

$3,000,000 in checks, drafts and money orders never reach intended owners.

The government collects $92,000 a year in postage for the return of letters sent to the dead letter office.

It costs the government $1,740 yearly to look up addresses on misdirected mail.

This amount could be saved and the dead letter office abolished if each parcel of mail carried a return address, and each parcel were wrapped in stout paper and tied with strong cord.

If you intend to go to work, there is no better place than right where you are. If you do not intend to go to work, you cannot get along anywhere. Squirming and crawling about from place to place can do no good.—Abraham Lincoln.

BOYS and Girls

The Great Little Slave Boy

BY NATHANA CAMERON (AGE 14.),
ALTA VISTA, KAN.

ONE time there was a little slave boy named Booker who lived with his mother in a little log cabin. Booker had no last name because he did not know who his father was. His mother was the cook of the plantation on which they lived. Their log cabin was very unattractive and dirty; there was no glass in the windows, no floor but the earth and the door would not shut tight enough to keep out the rain and cold. They hadn't even a stove in the cabin, but did all their cooking over a fire-place. No one ever sat down to meals in Booker's home because his mother never had time to prepare them, but they would eat a scrap of bread now and a piece of meat then just whenever they got hungry.

Booker's clothes were very uncomfortable. His shoes were wooden ones with rough leather at the top and the soles were made of wood. Of course, they would not bend and they must have squeaked terribly. His shirts were made of rough flax that, he said later, felt like prickly chestnut burrs against his body.

Then came the day that President Lincoln signed the important paper that freed all the slaves.

When Booker and the other members of the family were set free they were very poor. They moved to another town where Booker had to work in the salt furnaces. And all the time he was working at his disagreeable task there was one thing he wanted to do more than anything else. He wanted to learn to read.

Finally a school for negroes was started in that section of the city. And now Booker did want to attend that school! But his folks thought that he must keep right on working in the salt furnaces. However, that didn't stop him. He took lessons at night. Finally his mother decided that if he would work from four in the morning until nine in the morning, she would let him go to school.

When he enrolled in school, Booker found that everyone had two, and maybe three, names, which puzzled him very much. The first morning he was there the teacher called off the roll, and while the others were answering, Booker was trying to think what he would say when his turn came. When the teacher finally said, "What's your full name, Booker?" he answered, "Booker Washington, sir!" just as though he had always had two names.

The Explorers' Club

CONDUCTED BY MARGARET T. APPLGARTH

Booker had already decided that he must have an education. When he had out grown the little school in his home town, he started out for a school called the Hampton institute. He had to walk 500 miles to get there, and work all along the way to buy his meals. Once he slept for several nights under a board walk in Richmond, with people walking over him all night long.

When he did get to the school he was so dirty and shabby that the teacher did not want to take him in. It made him feel terribly disappointed after working so hard to get there, and when the teacher saw how heartbroken he was she decided to give him one chance.

"The recitation room needs sweeping," she said, "take this broom and sweep it."

Well, Booker swept that room three times, until it was cleaner than it had ever before been. Then he dusted it four times until there was not a speck of dust or dirt anywhere. When the teacher saw how clean it was she could make no objection, so that was how Booker Washington entered the Hampton institute.

He had to work his way all through school, and years later he started a school of his own for negroes, called Tuskegee. Everyone in America is proud of the "great little slave boy."

How Booker Got An Education

By JAMES K. LIVELY (AGE 12), MATTOON, ILL.

ONE day on a plantation a negro boy was born. His mother was a slave and he was going to have to be one too. This boy's name was Booker. He did not know what his other name was.

Every day Booker had to work. And his mother did too. They picked cotton to send to the mill. Often his master beat him. Every evening after they were through working his mother would read the Bible to them and pray.

One day Booker's mother told him he would have to start to school. He could not go for but a short time, for his master would not let him go very long. The next day he started. When he got there the teacher took him to a little desk. It was not the nice desks like we have today, but Booker thought he was a prince. The teacher put all the children in a row and started to ask them their names. Booker noticed that all the boys had two names so when the teacher got to him he said Booker T.

Washington because he had heard of a famous man named Washington. But finally Booker had to quit school. He did not know much when he stopped. He could read a few words. Spell a few words. And do a simple sum.

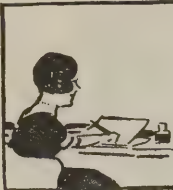

A few weeks after his little schooling the master said he was going to have an auction. That was he was going to sell some slaves. He was not going to sell Booker because he was young and could work for a long time yet. When the day came Booker saw the auctioneer take his mother and put her on the block. He saw him give her to the highest bidder. Booker never saw his mother again.

Soon came the day when Abraham Lincoln freed the slaves. Then Booker was free. He decided to go to a school he had heard of where the students worked their way through. The only way to go was to walk for Booker had no horses and carriages. There were no automobiles those days either. Not even Fords. He walked about fifty miles that day. There was no bed for him to sleep in so he lay down in a hollow under the sidewalk. Early next morning Booker got up. He started on without any breakfast. It took him about three more days to get to the school. Now he saw the school. He is there now.

Booker went to the president of the school and asked to enlist. He said he was going to work his way through. He said to the little colored boy, "I am going out now. You sweep and dust the office. When I come back if it is clean and there is not a speck of dust I'll take you." Then Booker worked and dusted like he done on the plantation with a man standing over him with a buggy-whip. He went over it four times. When the president came back he looked over the office. He could not see a speck of dust. He was so pleased he said that he would take Booker.

Some of you may know the rest. Of all the students laughing at him. He paid no attention to them. When he got through school he went back to teach the other children for there were not many schools then. His first school was in a chicken-house. When it rained he would take an umbrella and put it over them to keep the rain off for there were holes in the roof. Finally he got a better school. They also had better books. But Booker only got his education through perseverance. He could have said, "I'm a colored boy and no one cares for me." But he did. He stuck to it.

I would like to say I have liked the "Boys and Girls." It is very fine.

Among Ourselves

John Y. Aitchison

ON Monday morning, Mar. 15, Doctor Aitchison left his home as usual for his office. Within the hour word was brought to the family and friends of his death from some cause which involved the heart. So suddenly was the course of this exceptional life finished.

Doctor Aitchison was born May 27, 1868, at Cascade, Iowa. He received his undergraduate education in Des Moines College and in 1896 was graduated from the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. He married Estella Sutton, Aug. 5, 1896, and is survived by her and by their son, John B. Aitchison.

Three churches remember Doctor Aitchison with especial affection. The first church of which he became the pastor was the Garfield Avenue church of Milwaukee, Wis. Thence he went to the First church of Shenandoah, Ia. His last pastorate was in the First church of Galesburg, Ill.

Doctor Aitchison became actively identified with the missionary work of the denomination about fourteen years ago when he was appointed joint district secretary for the Lake District for the Home and Foreign Mission societies. He soon showed unusual capacity for presenting the work to the churches, for keeping them informed of the missionary accomplishments and opportunities, and for inspiring them to meet their responsibilities. His leadership became so apparent that after four years he was asked to become home secretary of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society. This position he held until he was asked, in 1919, to take the position of general director of the Board of Promotion.

Those who were in attendance at the Northern Baptist Convention held at Denver in May, 1919, will recall the earnest prayers offered for the guidance of the committee as they met to organize the Board of Promotion and to select the general director. All except Doctor Aitchison himself seemed to feel that he was the man for the office. It was in many ways the most important and difficult task ever asked of a Baptist. He shrank from assuming the responsibilities. To bring national societies and boards, with their traditions of tasks undertaken as responsible bodies, and independent state organizations to work together for a common aim with uniform methods, without encroaching on organizational rights, was no mean task. Baptists have never looked with great favor on the centralization of authority, and any movement which might be construed as tending in that direction would be sure to meet with objection and criticism. Such a situation faced Doctor Aitchison. His great desire for the sympathetic cooperation of all caused him to spend his time and strength to the utmost to secure it. He was to a marked degree successful. Because of his fine, sensitive nature, he suffered keenly from criticism, and this, together with the great strain upon his powers of endurance, which was incident to the launching of the New World Movement, told on his strength. The New World Movement was the greatest task ever undertaken by Northern Baptists. Contrary to expectations, it was carried on at a time which turned out to be unfavorable for securing large financial support. But always at the forefront, carrying on the work to which he had set his hand, winning unqualified admiration and respect, drawing out the affection and loyalty of those who worked with him from near and far, Doctor Aitchison labored to bring the denomination to its goal. When new plans were being laid in 1924, he felt compelled to refuse to permit his name to be considered for the position of general director of the Board of Promotion, or the executive secretary of the Board of Missionary Cooperation, its successor.

Doctor Aitchison is loved and honored throughout the Baptist denomination. It is impossible to measure the extent or the influence of the work which he did. Still more impossible would it be to try to measure the influence of the spirit with which he carried on his work, assumed the responsibilities of his office, and met the inevitable criticism which he, as leader in the great experiment in united effort, was bound to receive. His remarkable capacity for friendship drew men to him, if not in actual companionship, at least in spirit. His Christlike spirit kept them there. In that critical time of new endeavor, the denomination was blessed not only with a leader who was distinctly able, but also with a leader who was sincerely Christian. The extent and permanency of his contribution, like all great contributions in history, cannot be described or valued adequately until the years have given their perspective.

Early in 1924, when the trustees of the University of Chicago decided to undertake a major effort to increase the capital resources of the university, it became apparent that the president would need the assistance of some competent person with adequate experience in this sort of work. President Burton's thoughts turned naturally and at once to Doctor Aitchison, who was not only his devoted friend, but who had already accomplished such remarkable results as director of the New World Movement. Doctor Aitchison accepted the invitation of the board of trustees and in September, 1924, came to the university as assistant to the president.

The two chief factors which influenced Doctor Aitchison in his decision to accept the invitation of the university were his deep admiration for Doctor Burton as an educational leader and his realization of the opportunity which was to be found in assisting the development of the splendid program which Doctor Burton had mapped out for the future of the university. He frequently told his friends that his deepest desire was to interpret properly the educational aims and ideals of the university to those who were not fully acquainted with them.

Doctor Aitchison devoted himself unceasingly and with characteristic energy from September, 1924, until his death to his great task of helping to provide the necessary funds for the future maintenance of the university. He felt that his mission was to show those who were able and anxious to direct their funds toward the betterment of humanity the opportunity which was presented by the university. That he was successful was notably apparent in the light of the fact that during the eighteen months of his work with the university, through his own personal effort, the endowment funds of the university were increased nearly $700,000. This in itself is a significant achievement. But again, the personal quality and worth of the man stand out. Often in the interests of the university, he went to see prospective contributors whom he knew to be hostile or indifferent. It is significant that he always came away leaving behind a new and personal friend for himself and the university.

In Doctor Aitchison the Baptist denomination has had a great leader, hundreds of men and women have had the precious experience of finding a true friend, and Jesus Christ has had a faithful follower. He finished the course. He kept the faith. There is laid up for him a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give him.

The Chicago Letter

BY C. T. HOLMAN
Our Wicked City

JUDGING from recent editorials in the New York papers I should say that New York is distinctly jealous of the notoriety achieved by Chicago because of the Better Government association's appeal to the United States senate to investigate the alleged connection between crime and politics in our city. It is something to surpass New York in wickedness when one considers our handicap. We lack the advantage of the first staging of lewd plays; this is not a port of entry for Europeans who may or may not be guilty of moral turpitude; and, moist as some say we are, we do not seem to have enough wine to stage bathing parties au naturel in that fluid! In spite of all these drawbacks, however, we seem to be bad enough to cause the writers of said editorials to throw up horrified hands at our depraved condition. And truly the facts brought out by the Better Government association are disturbing; especially, certain photographs, recently published, showing prominent politicians and judges, guests of honor at a great dinner also attended by well-known gangsters, gunmen, and booze-runners. This, added to the fact that the government is rounding up and deporting a large number of Sicilians, believed to be the paid killers of the rum ring and others of their stripe (a process in which grave injustice may be done to many innocent individuals), presents Chicago to the world in a sorry light. In the face of all this, however, I am inclined to agree with Judge Marcus A. Kavanaugh (one of our many honorable, upright and able public men), whom I heard address the union ministers' meeting recently, in his contention that Chicago, even with its terrible record for crimes of violence, is one of the finest, cleanest and noblest large cities of the world. Our record for murders (or that of any American city for that matter) looks bad beside that of almost any European city. But I prefer that awful record to the drink-sodden, vice-infested condition of many of the cities of Europe. Of course that is cold comfort. Everybody feels that something must be done; but most of them feel that it must be done by some one else. The effective administration of law by regularly constituted authority certainly has broken down; this must be remedied. But, after all, I confess to little hope of ultimate cure in the mere meeting of violence with violence—even the violence of regularly constituted authority. Recently a significant development has taken place in the establishment on a considerable scale in this city of a clinic in charge of competent psychologists and psychiatrists to study abnormal and especially criminal behavior. It is as a result of such investigations, and similar investigations of environmental factors, if at all, that the means of cure will be found.

The Better Government association, it unfortunately appears, is not coming out of this affair in a wholly favorable light. It seems that the Democratic boss, George Brennan, was induced to contribute $23,000 (Brennan says over $25,000) toward the campaign fund of the Better Government association's candidate for state's attorney a little over a year ago in the hope of so weakening the Republican candidate's vote as to assure the election of his Democratic opponent. However, the promised number of votes did not materialize and Brennan, at last, has let the story out. There seems to be a good bit of resentment among church people against this sort of political maneuvering and vote-swapping. I doubt if the church vote will prove very easily deliverable for some time to come. This experience ought to bring home to those concerned about the dominance of Christian ideals in social and political affairs the conviction that all its dealings must be honorable and above board. Altogether apart from the question of the right or wrong of such policies as the one followed, it is clearly inexpedient to pursue any policy which will not bear the light of fullest public scrutiny.

Youth Is at It Again!

The latest occasion for a frank expression by youth of the way it looks at the Christian task was the Inter-Seminary Conference of the Western Area, held at the University of Chicago, Thursday, Feb. 25. A large number of seminaries from within 150 miles of Chicago were represented by over 500 delegates—Garrett, McCormick, the Chicago Theological seminary, and the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, having the largest delegations. Among the speakers and conference leaders were Prof. John Aberly, United Evangelical Lutheran seminary; Prof. E. W. Burgess, the University of Chicago; Pres. Ozora S. Davis, Chicago Theological seminary; Mr. W. A. Granville, President Lutheran Brotherhood of America; Prof. A. E. Holt, Chicago Theological seminary; Dean Shailer Mathews, the University of Chicago; President J. G. K. McClure, McCormick Theological seminary; Rev. Reinhold Niebuhr, Bethel Evangelical church, Detroit, Mich.; Rev. A. W. Palmer, First Congregational church, Oak Park, Ill.; Prof. W. D. Schermerhorn, Garrett Biblical institute; and Rev. C. E. Vermilya, secretary, Home Missions Council, New York. The program was built up around the topic of church cooperation. After an address on the subject by Dr. A. W. Palmer the assembly broke up into four discussion groups dealing with the following problems: "Ways and Means of Church Cooperation"; "Church Cooperation with Respect to Marriage and Divorce"; "Church Cooperation with Respect to Prohibition"; "Church Cooperation with Respect to Juvenile Delinquency." Whatever one's reaction to the situation may be, it is perfectly clear that present-day theological students are doing something more than memorize theological formulas. They conceive, at least, that they are coming to desperate grips with reality. They are in dead earnest in regarding Protestant denominations as obsolescent. They are ready, in the hope of building a better world, to involve themselves pretty deeply in programs of social reform, as witness the resolutions favoring the removal of any legal restrictions against birth control, a medical examination for both parties to a marriage, uniform laws on marriage and divorce, and the circularization of literature on sex education. The hottest debate concerned the deliverance of the conference on prohibition, whether to declare it a success or a failure. The resolution, as passed, called prohibition a moral issue and urged that the church as a moral agency should support it with emphasis. It advocated placing all prohibition officers under civil service, and urged the church to welcome and encourage scientific investigation of the situation. A large part of the proceedings, of course, everybody would approve. But, with regard to some of it, a great many church people, I suspect, if they had been present, would favor the adoption of strenuous measures of repression. Youth is exuberant. But I was interested to observe the poised and serene attitude of some of the older professors whom I knew to be quite conservative in their leanings. They were not alarmed. They seemed to feel that these youths were to be trusted; that certain extravagances were to be expected; but that these young people would think and work their way through their problems; and that if they did achieve some new viewpoints and adopt some new attitudes and methods, it was just possible that these might all mark real progress.

Addison E. Wells

On Feb. 12, a specially called meeting of the board of directors of the Baptist Executive Council was held in the Marshall Field tea room to honor Mr. Addison E. Wells who, from the organization of this council in 1908, has been its treasurer. Indeed, Mr. Wells' service goes back much farther, for he was the treasurer of the Baptist City Mission Society, of which the Executive Council is the legal successor. The purpose of the gathering was an entire surprise to Mr. Wells. Resolutions expressing appreciation of Mr. Wells' noble Christian life and sacrificial service in this and many other Baptist interests were passed and ordered suitably engrossed and presented to him. Mr. Wells is leaving Chicago to take up his permanent residence in Southern California. It is with great reluctance that Chicago

Baptists bid farewell to Mr. Wells, yet we must, as the resolutions say "convey our congratulations to the Los Angeles Baptists, telling them that our loss is their gain."

Charles L. Major

It pays to pay up! The writer of these lines dropped into the book shop of the Publication Society on the afternoon of Feb. 14 to pay a little bill and, as a result of this effort to maintain his credit, happened upon a delightful celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of "Charlie" Major's service as manager of this branch. It was a surprise party prepared by Mr. Major's associates on the staff. And one could readily see that it was a real surprise. Several denominational dignitaries were present and made congratulatory speeches; refreshments were served by the girls; and a splendid traveling bag was presented to Mr. Major by his associated workers in the store. Mr. Major showed his appreciation much more by his generally "overcome" expression than by any well-turned phrase of speech. He was deeply moved, as well any man might be under such circumstances. The Publication Society and the denomination has a valuable and able servant in Mr. Major of the Chicago branch.

Dr. James P. Abbott Passes

Just a few days ago there came the sad news of the death of Dr. James P. Abbott, at his late home in Pasadena, Calif. The Chicago Baptist News says in part concerning him: "About two years ago, because of failing health, Dr. and Mrs. Abbott removed to California where they have since resided. Though well advanced in years and having served his Lord and the cause of the kingdom well, the going of this man of God is felt as a distinct loss. And the heartfelt sympathy of all is extended to Mrs. Abbott.

"A suitable memorial service for Doctor Abbott was held at the Northern Baptist seminary, where he had filled the chair of pastoral theology for several years in the early period of that institution. It was a notable gathering of students, professors, friends and admirers of this faithful servant of God. Those who participated in the service were Professors Heinrichs, Carman, Taft, Whitesell, and Dr. Benjamin Otto."

Here and There

The Ministers' Conference, meeting in the Immanuel building, 2320 South Michigan avenue, commands a large attendance every Monday morning at 10:30. President Johnston Myers plans to treat the ministers to a luncheon before retiring from office at the end of the month; his great popularity will thereby, no doubt, increase.—The Normal Park church celebrated the fortieth anniversary of its organization with appropriate services the first week of February. Things are going along splendidly in that church under the able administration of Pastor M. M. McGorrill.—Belden Avenue church has purchased the building of the Wesley M. E. church to meet the needs of its rapidly expanding church school.—The church workers' institute at the divinity school of the University of Chicago closed a very successful winter quarter, Tuesday evening, March 2. About 150 people from the churches registered for these lectures and classes. The main lecture course was given by Dean Shailer Mathews and Prof. G. B. Smith on "Following the Way of Jesus." Classes were conducted by Profs. T. G. Soares and B. W. Robinson.—The social service commission of the Northern Baptist Convention met in Chicago, Wednesday, March 3.

District of Columbia

BY HENRY W. O. MILLINGTON

SEVERAL recent events indicate the strength and progress of our Baptist life in the nation's capital. The First church observed its 124th anniversary on Sunday, March 7. This church was organized in a private house in the year of 1802, interest having been aroused by a Baptist meeting held in the United States Treasury the previous summer. There were six constituent members. There were also present three ministers, who signed themselves as "constitutors"—Lewis Richards, of Baltimore; Adam Freeman, an itinerant preacher, and Elder William Parkinson, chaplain to the House of Representatives. The sermon was preached by Rev. Jeremiah Moore of Alexandria, who is said to have been both fiery and eloquent. By the second meeting new members began to join, coming from all parts of the country, and even from London, as the infant capital attracted travelers and residents to its sparsely settled neighborhood. This little company of courageous Christians exerted an influence over the spiritual and physical welfare of this city that cannot be measured by the smallness of its beginning. The cause of missions, religious newspapers and magazines, a great university, the publication society, patriotic celebrations, civic charities all received an impetus from the First Baptist church of that day. This church has worshiped in four meeting houses, the second building having been sold for commercial purposes, later on becoming the universally known Ford's theater, the place in which President Lincoln was shot. The First church has had a great line of preachers in its pastoral service, and its membership has included some of our most widely known and influential men in political and educational life. Rev. William Parkinson was the first pastor, and Rev. Obadiah Brown had a term of service extending over a period of forty-five years. Luther Rice also did much to give it character and strength in the early years. Dr. Samuel Judson Porter succeeded Dr. Henry Allan Tupper in this pastorate, beginning his work Jan. 15, 1925. Doctor Porter is upholding the high standard of ministry set by his predecessors, and the old First church is fulfilling a great mission in Washington life.

The Fifth church has just completed an addition to its Sunday-school house, to be known as the Darlington memorial. This building has been erected in honor of Mr. J. J. Darlington, who for many years was not only the head of the Washington bar, but as well the leading member of the Fifth Baptist church. Mr. Darlington was as loyal in his Christian life as he was successful in the profession of law. The building erected in his memory is a beautiful structure, and in its size and convenience furnishes an especially fine Sunday-school equipment. The building will accommodate a school of 2000 members and in its furnishing is as complete and satisfactory as could possibly be. Pastor John E. Briggs and his people are to be congratulated heartily upon this achievement.

The Brookland church has begun a forward movement of great significance. It is planned to relocate the church on a more central site and to include in its constituency another growing suburb called Woodridge. Dr. F. H. Divine recently visited this church and assisted the pastor, Rev. O. O. Dietz, in organizing a money-raising campaign with the result that $72,000 have been pledged on a five-year plan toward the new enterprise.

Rev. Samuel J. Porter is in the Garfield hospital, having undergone an operation, and Rev. J. C. Ball, of the Metropolitan church, has been obliged to go away for a prolonged period of rest.

At the Takoma Park church, pastor, William E. LaRue, a unique service was held on a recent Sunday night. Three brief addresses were made by members of the church on, "What Religion Means to Me." The James Bible class of men held its annual banquet recently at which a large number of men were present and an excellent program of music and speaking was enjoyed. The church has recently paid off a substantial sum on its mortgage debt.

Montana News and Notes

BY ROBERT W. SHAW

IT will be fifty years ago this coming June that General George A. Custer and his 600 men engaged the Sioux Indians in battle on the Little Big Horn in Southern Montana. The story is too familiar to be repeated. Many people who auto across the continent turn aside to travel over the Custer Battlefield highway which takes them past the historic spot where sleep these who fell in that engagement.

Just now elaborate arrangements are being made to celebrate the anniversary of that battle. If the plans are carried out the celebration will include a meeting of those who are still living who served under General Custer and those who were with Sitting Bull in a ceremony in which the hatchet will be buried, and a sham battle between the Seventh Cavalry and the Indians in which the soldiers will attempt to retrace the route taken by the troops fifty years ago.

Crow Indian Missions

Near to and included in this battlefield is the Crow Indian reservation. These Indians are a branch of the Siouxi stock and, according to George Bird Grinnell, the best present authority on Indians, are the finest and largest of our tribes. The reservation is twenty-five miles wide, north and south, and one hundred miles long east and west. In 1903 Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Petzoldt, came to these Indians as their first missionaries. When they began their work there was not a single Christian Indian in the tribe which numbered about 2000. In these years these honored missionaries have seen the work grow, not by leaps and bounds, but in a steady satisfactory way. There have been 400 baptisms. During these years the work has so expanded that now it is carried on in several stations.

The Stations

At Pryor, John Frost and his wife, of whom are Indians, are in charge, Miss Hannah Wiggman of Minneapolis, formerly of Hopi Indian mission in Arizona, is their helper. The record for last year shows thirty-five pupils in Sunday school and sixty-four members in the church.

Rev. C. A. Bentley and wife, who are in Massachusetts, have charge of the work at Crow agency, Black Lodge and so. With them is associated Miss Clara Olds of Seattle as missionary. Miss Olds was formerly with the Italian mission in New Haven, Conn. The total Sunday-school enrolment on these fields is approximately 200 and the church membership is near to 100.

In the Upper Big Horn Miss Ruth King of Pomona, Calif., who was formerly a teacher in the government Indian school at Riverside, Calif., and Miss L. Ryan, formerly with the Hopis whose home is at Worcester, Mass., are conducting the work. There is no church there but mission work is carried at Lodge Grass and Wyola, Superintendent Petzoldt and his wife are in charge. They are to have a helper appointed soon. The church at Lodge Grass has eighty-five members.

These Indian churches are organized in an association and each spring have their meetings together when the effort to strengthen the faith of the Christians and win the lost is earnestly carried on. This work is supported by our two home mission societies.

In the reservation there are two white churches. They are Lodge Grass and Wyola. Rev. R. O. Shannon, a graduate of William Jewell college and Rochester Seminary, is in charge of these two fields. The work is prospering and the records of these two churches in giving far exceed that of any other white church in the state.

Just outside the reservation is Hardin. H. R. Norwood, who came from Kansas about a year ago, is in charge of the work. Mr. Petzoldt in a communication makes this comment: "The white churches adjacent to the reservation are the results of the work of the American missionaries, the by-product of the time in previous years."

Notes

Rev. Roy E. Reece, who has been the senior pastor on the Belgrade circuit, has accepted the call of the First Butte church and will begin his pastorate with them the first Sunday in April.

Rev. Robert W. Shaw, who came to Bozeman a little more than a year ago, reports that his first year of service has been highly satisfactory. About forty have been received into membership, and some troublesome debts have been paid and others reduced to a minimum. Mr. Shaw is president of the Assembly Commission, as well as a member of the executive committee of the board of managers of the convention.

The Convention City

By W. S. ABERNETHY, CHAIRMAN LOCAL COMMITTEE OF ARRANGEMENTS

IN May, 1907, in Calvary church, Washington, preliminary steps were taken towards the organization of the Northern Baptist Convention. The following year in Oklahoma City these plans were perfected and the convention launched with Hon. Charles E. Hughes its first president. After nineteen years, Baptists of the North return to the nation's capital for their annual meeting. It would be utterly impossible for any church auditorium to accommodate the throng that is expected. Accordingly the beautiful city auditorium, completed a little more than a year ago, has been secured. Three thousand people can be accommodated on the main floor and another three thousand in the huge gallery. With the aid of the electric amplifier a speaker's voice will easily carry to the last gallery seat. Underneath the auditorium is the great exhibit hall, where all the missionary and educational exhibits, the registration and information booths, book display and postoffice will be found, as well as ample room for visiting. Seven halls seating from 200 to 700 people and fourteen committee rooms are available in other parts of the building. The Washington local committee is very happy in the thought that accommodations in this fine million dollar auditorium are so ample as to take care of the convention in a manner that possibly never has been excelled.

In addition to the interior accommodations, the hall itself is very conveniently located with respect to the large hotels of the city. It is but three blocks from the White House and only five from the headquarters hotel. Other large hotels are but a few minutes' walk from the place of meeting.

Washington in May is one of the beauty spots of the world. "The most beautiful city in the world," said Dr. S. W. Hughes of London as he stood one day last fall on the steps of the Lincoln memorial looking off toward the Washington monument and, in the distance, the capitol dome. Convention delegates may be a trifle late for the gorgeous Japanese cherry blossoms which usually come out early in May, but they will not be too late for the marvelous display of flowers of other varieties which make the city a bower of beauty at this season of the year.

Visitors will doubtless want to see Mt. Vernon and historic Alexandria on Saturday afternoon. Memorial day falls this year on Sunday, which will doubtless mean that the exercises befitting the day will occur on Monday. Beautiful Arlington, burial place of hundreds of national heroes, is always the gathering place of official Washington on this occasion. The great white marble amphitheater is packed to the limit as the president of the United States pays tribute to the valorous dead. Between sessions of the convention there are many places of absorbing interest that visitors will want to see, the capitol, congressional library, White House, national museum, Lincoln memorial, Washington monument, Academy of Science, Pan American union, Corcoran art gallery and others too numerous to mention. Sight-seeing busses will make a tour of the city before the morning session, at the noon hour and following the afternoon session.

The local committee is well-organized and hard at work in preparation for the coming of the thousands of visitors expected. No other convention will be in Washington that week and the hotels will be able therefore to give their undivided attention to the Baptist hosts. No fear need be entertained that there will be a boosting of rates. That practice may have been followed in other years but it is no longer tolerated. Make your own arrangements for entertainment and write at once for reservations. If the local committee on entertainment can be of service, write to the chairman, Col. D. H. Sawyer, Calvary Baptist church, but do not ask him to do what you can do yourself by writing direct to the hotel of your choice.

The Washington hotel, five blocks from the auditorium, has been selected as headquarters. Most of the denominational boards will be quartered there. The list of leading hotels with rates has already been published.

Baptists of the capital city, 14,000 of them in twenty-seven churches, are eagerly anticipating the coming of the convention. They intend to leave nothing undone, so far as local arrangements are concerned, to make the 1926 meeting a great inspirational gathering. President Rhoades says he expects 7000 people will come. "All right," answers Washington, "let them come and welcome."

Evangelism

LAST year we received 4223 new members, breaking all previous records. This year we will exceed the 5000 mark. Fruitful revival meetings have recently been held at Canon City, 150 new members; Denver First, 200; City Park, 60; Berkeley, Denver, 30; Bethel, Denver, 15; Brighton, 20; Grand Junction, 35; Palisade, 15; Greeley, 35; Sterling, 20; Pueblo, First, 40; Pueblo, Lake Avenue, 20; Pueblo Mesa, 63; Limon, 25; Simla, 22; Vona, 33; Ault, 18; La Veta, 5; Gilcrest, 9; Louisville, 14; Salida, 18; Monte Vista, 27; Montrose, 39. A good many meetings will culminate with Easter Sunday.

Brougner Meetings

The city auditorium at Pueblo, seating two thousand people, was well filled Wednesday, March 17. The Greeley church was taxed to capacity Thursday, March 18. A representative pastors' conference was held at First church, Denver, Friday afternoon, March 19. More than 1500 people heard Doctor Brougher Sunday afternoon, March 21, at First church, Denver. These meetings were stimulating from every standpoint. Doctor Brougher was at his best.

Pastoral Changes

Rev. H. G. Gwinn closes his work April 1 at Olathe. Rev. Geo. L. Boroughs is giving up his work as colporteur evangelist and will locate at Eaton. W. E. Hall has moved from Del Norte to Holly. Rev. W. A. Pipkin is now located at Rocky Ford. Rev. D. S. McGlashan has given up his work at Eckert, and by reason of serious ill health is now at home with a brother at Joliet, Ill. Rev. T. L. Sharrah moved from Missouri to Johnstown. Rev. F. F. Butler has closed his work at Kersey. A. C. Huff has moved from Fountain to Craig. Two graduates of the Baptist seminary at Saltillo, Old Mexico, have located in Colorado.—Rev. Ramon A. Tolosa, La Junta, and Silvano R. Garcia at Pueblo Christian center, where recently a Mexican Baptist church was organized.

Church Building Operations

A new $40,000 edifice will soon be dedicated by East Side church, Pueblo. Sunday, Feb. 21, an attractive new building was dedicated at Bethune, Rev. R. S. Wallace, pastor. Secretary Palmer raised funds sufficient to dedicate the church free of debt. The new edifice at Briggsdale, Rev. Howard N. Spencer, pastor, will be dedicated in April. Under the pastoral leadership of Rev. James M. Bennett, a fine new edifice is nearing completion at Crowley and the building on the joint field at Ordway is being enlarged and refurnished. One of the best buildings in Colorado will be dedicated at Boulder early in June, costing nearly $200,000, Rev. John H. Skeen, pastor. An appropriate week of services will be held.

Deputation Work

Rev. W. H. Duff of Rangoon, Burma, has rendered most acceptable services during March visiting more than twenty of our churches. Dr. M. D. Eubank is to hold a week of services at First church, Denver, beginning Sunday, March 14, speaking each evening. A conference supper will be held each evening. Dr. Alonzo M. Petty of Los Angeles, Calif., is doing intensive work with a number of our larger churches, beginning March 14 at Loveland. Committee meetings will be held and plans pushed looking to the raising of church quotas before April 30.

Financial Situation

Up to Feb. 15, we had a credit of $46,712.61 on our state quota of $80,000, leaving a balance of $32,287.39 to be raised before April 30. The present outlook is encouraging to this end. More than 80 per cent with 200 members or less will raise their entire quota. Just before Charles R. Brock, one of the prominent laymen of First church, Denver, left recently for a four months' trip to Europe, he paid his pledge in full and left a check for $600 additional, provided the First church raises its entire quota of $13,500. Early in April a state convention board meeting will be held to review the financial situation and make plans for an intensive close-up campaign. Eight thousand self-denial banks were distributed to our churches and we look for at least $5000 from this source. We hope to have a delegation of some fifty in attendance upon the Washington Convention, May 25-30.

Philadelphia Letter

By ARTHUR C. BALDWIN

THE Lenten season is being observed throughout the city with a devotion that seems to increase as the years pass. In seven years I have seen it grow from one theater service in the heart of the city, under Episcopal direction, to at least four. This year the Episcopalians, who know how to make the best use of it, have a great service in the Garrick theater which is crowded, floor and gallery, every noon. They have a second well-attended service at St. Steven's. The Lutherans are using Keith's Theater and the Federation of Churches has noon-day meetings at the Arch Street Methodist church. The papers give them all a generous recognition so that religion has an unusual prominence just now. I do not know why we of the non-liturgical churches have shied off so from the Lenten observances. On the face of it why should we not remember the forty days as faithfully as we remember Christmas and Easter? Why should we not take advantage of a favorable psychology that exists around us and emphasize religion when people are willing to have us talk about it? As I said, we are making advance in this direction and many of us rejoice in it.

A little booklet prepared by the Philadelphia chamber of commerce has given us definite information concerning the number of foreigners, alien or naturalized, who are in our city. The largest number is the Russians with a total of 95,744. Following them are the Irish, 64,590, and the Italians with 63,723. Following them far down the line in numbers come the Germans, the Poles, English, Austrians, Hungarians. We are told that there are about 230,000 Jews included in the twenty-six racial groups who live in Philadelphia. This number does not surprise me. I had thought there were twice as many. It is estimated that there are 158,000 negroes here, which would make Philadelphia one of the largest negro centers in the North. If there are any other cities that claim a larger number I will not dispute first place with them.

I suppose it is pretty well understood now, since congress appropriated $2,100,000, that the Sesqui centennial for next summer is an established fact. More than $3,000,000 has been raised in the city itself and with other contributions it is estimated that at least $14,000,000 will be spent in the development of this exposition. It will be held down at the foot of Broad street near League island, in what is known as "Vareville," named because the political boss of name owns so much property down there and controls all the votes. The marshes and lowlands which are filled with earth taken from the B street subway, represent real estate will have a tremendous increase of value after the exposition is finished. It is interesting to watch the Vareville so much per, carrying the earth there to improve the real estate that profit that individual so highly lates. But we shall have an interesting extension and invite our friends and neighbors to come this way in the summer-time.

Students of industrial problems will be much interested in the latest step which has been taken by our Philadelphia Traction company to adjust the perennial problem of wages. As readers of THE BAPTIST will remember, the Traction company under Mitten management changed a run-down, strike-ridden railway system into one of the last most flourishing organizations in the country. In their administration, 1911, wages have increased from under 70 cents per hour. An organization of the employees holds at least one of the stock of the company and is increasing more every year. The last announcement is that wages are to be stable to their present purchasing power. This means, according to the announcement that a number of market-baskets are with staple articles which represent a certain standard of value. As these market-baskets change, wages change, though not oftener than once a year. The employees are assured that what they are able to purchase with their wages they will be able to secure next year and in other years. Perhaps I have not stated the plan well as I do not have the details before me at this moment. It is evidently that is well considered, however, has the endorsement of prominent economists of various universities. With this announcement the company made a move that was quite significant. The wages will be reduced from 73½ cents to 70 cents per hour. This reduction has been accepted without a murmur.

Grace Temple is looking forward with eagerness to the coming of Dr. Alonzo M. Petty on Easter Sunday. We know Doctor Petty will bring an aggressive, resourcefulness and vision to his work here that will be stimulating to those who are around him. He comes from a great church, well organized, with a body of men directing its affairs. We will have their cordial and hearty cooperation in a field of service that is large.

Simultaneous Revival Meetings in Tacoma

By C. OSCAR JOHNSON

ON FEB. 14 a new adventure in evangelism for Tacoma was launched. Ten churches cooperating in simultaneous evangelistic meetings with their pastors and evangelists in the church except three of the smaller churches. This campaign was under the di-

Rev. John M. Currie, recently of Boston, who has been serving as the director of evangelism for the Western Washington Convention. The members of the twelve Baptist churches in the city have been strengthened and drawn closer together by these meetings. There has also been a strengthening of the bond between the pastors, and a deepening of the consciousness that we are workers together with God, and last of all there has been a large number of decisions for Christ and membership in the church. The meetings closed, with exception on Sunday night, Feb. 28. We have not had sufficient time to give complete results of the campaign. Up to date there have been about three hundred decisions of one kind or another. There have been a large number of baptisms and a great many have decided to place their membership in the Tacoma churches.

Doctor Currie was the preacher at the Sixth Avenue church, Rev. Willis E. Tibone, pastor; Dr. E. H. Hicks of the Fremont church, Seattle, was the preacher at the Bethesda church, Rev. J. Cochran, pastor; Dr. Lippard of Chicago preached at the German Baptist church, Rev. J. A. H. Wuttke, pastor; First Swedish Baptist church, Rev. S. Grandahl, pastor, had two assistant preachers, Dr. F. J. Erikson of Portland preaching the first week, and Dr. Erick Lindholm, of the Second Swedish Baptist church of Seattle, the second week; Rev. Archibald Macintosh of the Gatewood church, Seattle, preached at the Fern Hill church, Rev. Macdonald Milne, pastor; Rev. J. C. Kellogg of the Kay Street church did his own preaching. The Bethlehem church (negro), Rev. A. L. Bird, pastor, conducted its own campaign; Berean church (negro), Rev. C. H. Graves, pastor, did likewise. The Swedish-Finnish church cooperated in the meetings and was unable to have regular services. Dr. John Bunyan Smith, of San Diego, Cal., was the preacher at the First church, beginning Wednesday, Feb. 17. A feature of these meetings was the combined meeting of all the churches on a day at noon in the auditorium of the First Baptist church, when Dr. John Bunyan Smith brought a message of power and winsomeness. Doctor Smith had a great place in the hearts of the people, not only of the First church, but of the city. The closing Sunday of the campaign was one of great victory. At the Bible-school hour there were many decisions among the seniors and juniors. At the regular preaching hour fifteen were recommended for membership, three other decisions were made at the close of the sermon. In the evening the pastor baptized thirty-one candidates, and at the close of the evening service seventeen others made public decisions for Christ and the church.

The Baptists of Tacoma feel that if Doctor Currie had done nothing else in Western Washington except to institute the idea of simultaneous evangelistic meetings in all Baptist churches in a given community he has served a great place in our convention. Already we are planning a simultaneous effort for 1927. We believe that another year we will know far better how to carry on. There are now about 2500 members of the Baptist churches of Tacoma. We have today the best standing in the community we have ever had. The largest regular church audience in the city is a Baptist audience. We find that evangelism solves a lot of our problems of difference and indifference.

A Nebraska Lovefeast

NEBRASKA Baptists had a little lovefeast all their own March 9-10. Instead of the proverbial doubleheader it was a four-feature affair. It combined the semi-annual meetings of the state ministers' association and the convention board of managers, reception for the new state secretary, H. Q. Morton, and a mass meeting for "Play Ball" Brougher. The place of meeting was Lincoln. The First and Second churches furnished the "eats and entertainment." There were delegations from metropolitan Omaha which lies on the banks of the muddy Missouri and from all intervening points westward to the sandhills which peep over the horizon toward Colorado and Wyoming.

The spirit was as hearty as the well-known "cornhuskers' conventions" when the late William Jennings Bryan lived there and was the idol of the people. The keynote emphases in the ministers' conference were on prayer and soul-winning. Secretary Morton made his maiden speech to the pastors. It had all the smiling radiance of a man fresh from the sun-kissed deserts of Arizona. He sounded a sure note of loyalty to Christ and then outlined the tasks in Nebraska as he saw them. If ever a man received a 100 per cent welcome from his collaborators, that man was Morton.

The evening session of the first day was devoted to a conference with Doctor Brougher leading. The second day was the board meeting with all delegates invited to "sit in" and share in the discussion and to get this intimate first-hand knowledge of the state policies and program.

The closing session on Wednesday evening in the First church crowded that great structure to capacity. Doctor Brougher gave his inspiring address on "Play Ball." There was a unanimous rising vote to carry on together in the kingdom tasks. The determination to raise the united budget in full was reinforced.

A gentle rain was falling during the sessions but clear skies followed and a flood of sunshine set the larks singing on a thousand hills, for the green was already coming into the fields. These were no ordinary days and this no routine meeting. Lincoln, March 9-10, 1926, will go down in the history of Nebraska Baptists as days of destiny when the spirit and love of the crucified and risen Christ knit all hearts into a new unity and anointed them afresh for the sacrificial service of victory.

With the Board of Missionary Cooperation

Self-starting Laymen an Asset

A SELF-STARTING group of laymen is a possession to be prized by any church that is anxious to insure full payment of its missionary quota before April 30. Last year some of the best results chronicled by churches that had a real problem on their hands in the last weeks of the period allotted for completing missionary funds were made possible by teams of speakers chosen from among the laymen. The addresses were short and to the point. "If we actually believe in missions and have a sincere desire to obey Christ's command to give the whole world the gospel, we shall produce every dollar of our quota," one layman told his fellow church members and added: "If we do not pay our share into the missionary funds, let us at least not give evasive reasons or plead poverty, but come right out and say that Christ's commands interest us less than some things that we want to do to please ourselves, and that there are other places where we think our money will yield us more enjoyment than if we put it into the missionary funds. This church and the people of this town have plenty of money for anything they want to do." That was about all, and it was enough.

The plan of having active men and women write letters to other members of the church, asking all who have pledged to be sure and pay up before April 30, also produced good results and is a good method to follow wherever there is a large number who are behind the schedule with their payments. In a western church last year, the pastor sent out a letter saying that one of his laymen had offered to subscribe one-tenth of the church's missionary deficit if nine other individuals or families could be found who would each do the same.

Churches Keen for Better Methods

The March meeting of the administrative committee found the secretarial staff of the Board of Missionary Cooperation together for the first time in weeks. Not only for Doctor Bowler but for most of his associates this has been a strenuous winter, because every available man has been used to widen the sphere of influence by personal contacts with every part of the Northern Baptist organization. The denomination is highly responsive, too, and from the standpoint of hearty, sympathetic cooperation the situation is one that makes men and women zealous in the cause, willing to work to the limit of endurance. Most of them are doing it, too.

Any one who thinks that the every-member plan has to be urged upon the really live churches of the denomination has a wrong idea of the way Northern Baptists are tackling their financial problem by the sure and steady method. During his attendance at one state convention Doctor Agar received no less than twenty-three requests from churches that wanted him to make personal visits and help put the plan into effect.

Success of the Brougher Meetings

The latest report of the field activities committee of the Board of Missionary Cooperation shows that Doctor Brougher, between the second week in January and the last day of February, addressed more than 41,000 people, representing an aggregate of 960 Baptist churches in ten states. In eight of the thirty-three centers covered, he was accompanied by Doctor Bowler who shared with him in the programs arranged and assisted in tying up the inspirational message with the plans for carrying it out. Without exception these meetings have been reported as having a far-reaching influence in the interest of the denominational program, and many have considered this the most outstanding series of meetings which has ever been held by the denomination. Doctor Brougher will complete his second circuit on April 5, after visiting twenty-four centers throughout the West.

Numerous Field Events During First Two Months

During January and February, pastors' institutes were held in seven states, which were uniformly well attended and brought forth from pastors and state secretaries many comments as to their value.

Dr. A. W. Rider, field secretary of the Foreign Society, was secured for a series of addresses and local conferences during the month of February in Kansas, Iowa, Illinois and Michigan. In one case, at the close of Dr. Rider's address, the church voted unanimously to restore $3000 to its missionary budget and pledged itself to see that it was paid before the end of the fiscal year.

Twelve one-day Bible and missionary conferences were held in Massachusetts during February, and reached a much larger portion of the Massachusetts constituency than was reached last year by the single large conference at Cambridge.

In cooperation with the Laymen's National Council, a series of laymen's banquets were held in Southern California, Arizona, Colorado, Michigan, and Indiana. Doctor Padelford and Doctor Robbins served as teammates for Mr. Witty in conducting these meetings.

Field Workers and Deputation Speakers Kept Busy

The entire field force of the Board of Cooperation has followed a very strenuous program during the first two months of this year. Rev. J. C. Killian has been promoting the every-member plan in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and Rev. R. L. Kelley has been doing a similar work in Minnesota and South Dakota. Doctor Huntley has been working in Pennsylvania, Connecticut and Indiana; Mrs. Carrie Robinson in Nevada and Kansas; and Rev. Frank Peterson in Southern California. The service of these field workers has been commended in the most hearty way by the pastors and secretaries of the states where they have served. The staff has recently been enlarged by the appointment of Rev. B. H. Ward of Nebraska as a field representative who will give his entire time to assisting churches in carrying out the every-member plan. Mr. Ward will begin his work May 1.

The records of the past two months show that missionary deputation speakers rendered service in nineteen different state conventions. The deputation program will be carried on through the remainder of the fiscal year, through the use of national secretaries, field workers, pastors, laymen and women who are being enlisted to visit many of the churches to present the denominational situation and meet with the church officers at conferences as to methods for raising their full quota before the close of the fiscal year. Considerable time and attention will also be given during the following weeks to the assignment of speakers to the state conventions and associations and the women's annual district meetings.

President E. H. Rhoades is planning to visit a number of the centers in the West during the month of April.

Here, There and Everywhere

"HELL-BENT FOR HEAVEN," is a sample of the peppery messages of Doctor Bustard, supplying the pulpit of Doctor Brougher at Los Angeles.

THE KANSAS BAPTIST ASSEMBLY will open its 1926 session on Tuesday, Aug. 3 and continue for ten days.

MRS. ANDREW J. STONE, eighty-three years old, died Jan. 31 at her home in Fairmont, W. Va. She was a member of the Broadus and Burdette families, both prominent in the history of the Baptist denomination, and had herself been a member of the denomination for seventy-three years. She was for fifteen years vice-president for West Virginia of the Woman's Baptist Home Mission Society and was a pioneer for women's missions in that state. She was a charter member of the First Baptist church, Fairmont.

THE MARCH NUMBER of the International Journal of Religious Education, Dr. W. Edward Raffety, editor, has featured on its cover the educational building of the First church, Evanston, Ill. The Journal has eighty pages, more than forty of which are given to church-school architecture and equipment. Individual copies can be secured for fifty cents each, by addressing the Journal, at 5 South Wabash avenue, Chicago.

DR. EDWIN S. STUCKER, Ottawa, Kan., has concluded meetings with the First church, Washington, Iowa, in which were over thirty professions of faith.

FIRST CHURCH, PONTIAC, ILL., recently closed a series of meetings, that were beneficial to church and community. Pastor John S. Brinkman preached, assisted by Rev. and Mrs. L. James Kindig, the "singing evangelists."

HUGO MONNAHA, a full-blood Mohave-Apache, has the distinction of being the first Indian ever ordained in Arizona to the Baptist ministry. The ceremonial was in Bethany Baptist chapel, in an Indian camp a mile above Clarkdale, the structure one that had been erected and paid for by the Indians themselves.

REV. L. T. REED, now of Plattsburg, N. Y., will enter upon the pastorate of the Second church, Philadelphia, the first Sunday in April, succeeding Rev. W. M. F. now with the First church, Fremont, Mo.

MISS GAYE HARRIS, the Christian Americanization missionary for the Central district, has been doing effective work in Piqua, Ohio, the last four weeks.

TEMPLE CHURCH, Chicago, has an unusually effective musical service. One of the programs of the choir was broadcast recently, and the orchestra is in demand for entertainments. Pastor J. H. Hughes will conduct a pre-Easter evangelistic campaign.

PASTOR CLARENCE HILL FRANK, Peekskill, N. Y., has a class in preparation for church membership which will continue until Easter.

PASTOR D. A. PITT of Central church, Norwich, Conn., was the preacher at Northfield schools, Feb. 21.

B. C. CLAUSEN, Syracuse, N. Y., preached on "Why I Do Not Believe the Bible," invited his people to deal with it in that fashion on the following Wednesday evening.

ONE HUNDRED ADDITIONS by Easter is the goal set for his church by Pastor John Watts at Lawrence, Kan.

TABERNACLE CHURCH, St. Louis, dedicated its new educational addition, the Bethel church was dedicated the same day. Dr. Henry Alford Porter was the preacher at both services.

PASTOR JAMES S. BRAKER, First church, Springfield, Ohio, is preaching a series of "hearthstone sermons." During his pastorate 179 have been added to the church. The new house is under construction. Pleasant street chapel has asked for recognition as a church.

LINK LUNCHEONS at one o'clock are an interesting feature of the work of the church at Wilmette, Ill.

REV. E. A. SHULLS at Garfield church, Chicago, recently baptized Mr. L. Burris, a noted baseball player. Shulls is receiving a stream of young people into his church.

OREGON BAPTIST PASTORS' conference declared anew 100 per cent for prohibition and pledged loyal support to the foreign mission work of the denomination.

EV. LEWIS JACOBSEN of Sioux City, Ia. spent some time in an interesting travel at Manhattan, Kan.

AT FIRST CHURCH, Worcester, Mass., more than 100 persons sat down to a general night banquet and were served by Camp Fire Girls.

EV. HOWARD THURMAN, negro, of Western Theological seminary, occupied the pulpit of Rogers Park church, Chicago, Sunday morning, Feb. 14, and in the evening spoke to the young people of the same church, Evanston.

ELECTRIC CROSSES seem now to be the fashion for church signs in Baptist churches. YOUNG PEOPLE of Judson Memorial church, Minneapolis, presented Booth Tarkenton's comedy, "Clarence."

FIRST CHURCH, Elgin, Ill., had the members of the First Congregational church as guests, Feb. 21 and Mr. J. L. Kraft, "the man," of Chicago was the speaker.

EV. HENRY ERICKSON, missionary in China, now at home on furlough, was the speaker at First church, Bridgeport, Conn., last night.

PASTOR EDWARD BLEAKNEY of Tabernacle church, Utica, N. Y., will conduct a training course for prospective church members until next year.

PASTOR W. D. WHAN of Waukegan, Ill., displays his Easter decision cards with a beautiful picture of Jesus inviting men to life.

Chicago, office of THE BAPTIST, will present tonight with apologies to Edgar Allen Poe, a message entitled

The Raving

"As I was sitting lonely
In my study, one morning, thinking only
Of the mighty glorious sermon I'd preached the night before;
Suddenly I heard a tapping
As of some one gently rapping,
Rapping at my study door,—
Simply this, and nothing more.

"All at once I heard a clatter
As of some one stirring pancake batter;
And my heart began to patter
As I hastened toward the door;
For I hastened, half in anger,
Muttering to my study door,—
Muttering this, and something more.

"'Tis some caller I lamented,
Boob or agent, half demented,
Come to visit and my favors to implore;
Or perhaps some sap or woman,
Only little less than human
With designs upon my leisure,—
With an endless stream of gabble,—
Some intolerable bore.

"With my bodings thus concentrated,
Open flew the door and entered,
A Something that chilled me to the core;
In its hand a little scroll
Which before me did unroll;
It was like a postman's letter,
Showing me to be a debtor
To THE BAPTIST of Chicago
For a year's subscription,—oh!
$2.50, and nothing more.

"Then to me this Presence smiling,
While my spirits all were riling:
You have been a churchly worker,
But in fact you are a shirker,
Preaching what you have not practiced
On this world's Plutonian shore.
To THE BAPTIST, it appears
You are sadly in arrears,
And this debt lies like a shadow,
Like a grim and ghastly shadow,
Darkly on your study floor.

"Said I, 'My foxy ghostman,
With your craft a la the postman,
If I am not mistaken
You will have your courage shaken,
And you'll take away your bacon
From that shadow on the floor;
By my silly procrastination,
I've invited your visitation;
I acknowledge my obligation
To THE BAPTIST. It is worth it,—
And,—much more.'

"Here I grabbed my checkbook, gasping,—
With my fountainpen a-rasping,—
Wrote I quick my check to pay it;
Resolved to let it ride no more.
Then unto the Presence turning,
My hot pride within me burning:
'Fiend or demon, I abjure you;
Chilling Presence, from me fly!
But the Presence had departed,
It had vanished through the doorway,—
It was banished by my checkbook,—
And I saw it, nevermore."

"WCOY now signs off. Get the checkbook pronto. Goodnight."

He is now engaged in a series of meetings with Evangelist Frank M. Dun

THE DAYTON BAPTIST Social Union held its annual meeting on Tuesday evening Mar. 2, at the First church, Dr. G. Weit, pastor. A large gathering listened to an uplifting address by Dr. A. Archibald of the First church, Yonkers, on the topic, "Is It Possible to Make Christ King of the World?"

EIGHT HUNDRED NEW members in record of Dr. Thomas J. Villers in four years at the White Temple, Portland, Ore. Sunday, Mar. 7, was fourth anniversary with the church. The communion which followed morning sermon on "Seasons of Revival," he extended the hand of fellowship to thirty. People began to gather for the Sunday night service before doors are open at 6:30. By 7 o'clock auditorium is full, and for twenty minutes the missionary committee puts stereopticon address on one of our home or foreign mission fields. At 7:30, the adjoining chapel also filled, the regular evening service begins, always beginning with an evangelistic appeal and a gospel hymn played softly on the organ.

REV. J. AUBREY SONDUFER began his pastorate at David City, Neb., on Jan. 1. There have already been conversions, baptisms and a rising interest in church life.

ON JAN. 27, 1926, AT HOLDREGE, Neb., occurred the ordination of Roy H. Johnson. Moderator, Rev. C. M. Foreman; Secretary, Rev. C. M. Starnes; of Juniata; examiner, Dr. Edward J. Dan of Grand Island; and ordination sermon by Rev. J. S. Umberger of York.

REV. A. V. ALLEN of the Jefferson Avenue church, Detroit, Mich., recently completed four years with the church. During this time there has been a steady growth. During the past twelve months 121 new members were added, seventy of these by baptism. Total membership today over 700. Highest Sunday-school attendance is 556.

REV. H. H. SMITH of Morrisonville, Ill., reports a gracious revival covering several weeks led by Rev. Verne F. Oglesby of Oreana, Ill. Twelve were received by baptism and two by experience. The results included a gift of $150 from the congregation to Pastor Smith.

REV. JAMES W. JACOBUS, pastor of Vassar, Mich., led a revival effort recently assisted by Rev. Earle T. Fay of Winona Lake, Ind., and Rev. Harold Hoffman of Walled Lake, Mich. Fifty have united with the church. A unique feature of this meeting was to secure enough persons to read scriptures continuously from 3:00 a. m. to 7:30 p. m. one day to read the entire Bible from Genesis to Revelations. The pastor has been five years with this church.

BRIG. GEN. WM. G. EVERSON, pastor of the First church, Muncie, Ind., has recently in five years 554 new members. The Sunday school runs an average of over 600. The prayer meeting more than 300. Receipts for all purposes have amounted to more than $150,000. A new location

Building has been recently purchased for $40,000 and plans are laid for a new one to cost $325,000. Audiences crowd the house.

Rev. FRED YOUNG of Kankakee, Ill., and the First church, Lincoln, Neb., Mar. 18.

MIDWINTER PICNIC was a recent enjoyment at First church, Austin, Chicago.

Rev. THOS. B. MARSH, Saulte Ste Marie, Minn., reports a revival covering many souls. Baptism almost every Sunday. Many professed conversion in a single day. Fifty were baptized at one time. "Back to the Bible" is the slogan.

Psychology of Leadership, by Henry Edward Tralle. New York: Century Co. $1.75.

In this book Doctor Tralle has organized a great many valuable commonplaces with regard to the development of character. The liberal use of quotations and references to related works reveals a mind that is alert to the duty of keeping acquainted with the literature of its particular field. What is said under the title of "Psychology of Leadership" applies to the development and improvement of mind and character in general. There is not that emphasis upon the peculiar problems of leadership which one might expect. Other works have cleared the way for a really penetrating and principle-exposing work in this field, and although the hard-working genius of the writer is manifest in the arrangement of material, in collecting quotations and bibliography, and in fitting of titles to subject matter, one feels nevertheless when the book is closed that there is still left a place for a notable work in the very significant field of the psychology of leadership.

—GEORGE E. HAYNES.

The Science of Keeping Young, by Alfred W. McCann. New York: Doran. $3.

Some books are like a door on hinges. They move, but never out of a fixed orbit. Such is "The Science of Keeping Young." The oft-repeated thesis of the book is the futility and folly of attempting to keep young while robbing the body of those elements in food that restore wasted tissue with materials which keep the arteries soft, the blood rich, the organs healthy and all the functions normal. There is a gold mine of information in every one of the eighty-two sections of the book. It is little short of a tragedy that the human race in the most civilized countries has persisted in denaturing food stuffs by stealing from the wheat its natural salts, from the cane its life-giving limes and from nearly all vegetables, meats and fruits their vitamin values. Mr. McCann handles the crime of food deterioration for commercial purposes without gloves.

—JOHN A. EARL.

Jesus and Our Generation, by Charles Whitney Gilkey. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. $2.

Forty thousand people in India in six great student centers heard the six chapters of this book last summer as the series of Barrows lectures which Mr. Gilkey delivered with unprecedented acceptance. As an interpretation of Jesus to India the lectures possess unique value, but their value to western Christianity is not less in another direction. For years it has been increasingly clear that in the field of pure scholarship the modern scientific interpretation of Christianity has won its place of supremacy. But a vital question has been whether that interpretation can express itself in the terms and passion of a sweeping and triumphant evangelism. These lectures have the distinction of having so stated the modern conception of the gospel as to strike the keynotes of the deity of Christ, the atonement, regeneration and the kingdom of God for new and surpassing enterprise in world evangelization.—U. M. McGUNAGLE

The Oxford Book of Prose. Chosen and edited by Arthur Quiller-Couch. New York: Oxford University Press.

"Any anthology of English prose is difficult," states this anthologist in preface—a preface, by the way, which is a most enjoyable and enlightening of reading. "I have read pretty widely among the originals for this book, during five years for its special purpose. The result leaves me convinced that no honest scholar can pretend to acquaintance with the whole of English prose or even with the whole that may yield good selections. All one can do is to spread a wide and patient net and report that he brings the best of his haul." The "best of his haul" ranges from John Trevisa (1326-1402) to living authors of the day, but he ends the selection of material with "writers who had already solidified their work by 1914." This reviewer is vastly pleased with the work it is like having a tapestry woven of the gleaming threads of the literary productions of the centuries placed before you. The work is a remarkable accomplishment and will no doubt be met with the high appreciation it deserves by those who have the true sense of literary values. It is a great literary collection in small compass—one small volume, of 1000 pages of India linen paper easily held in one hand.

Steeple among the Hills, by Arthur Worth Hewitt. New York: Abner Press. $1.75.

Here is a worth while book about country church by a man who has been pastor of a country parish for eight years in Vermont, his first and only torate. He has had opportunities to come a city pastor, but he has deliberately preferred the rural church, because the latter offers better chances for better work for the kingdom of God. He has written the best book on country church that has come from the press for many a day. He knows his subject by actual experience and is master of a very attractive style of writing. Some of his conclusions are unlike those advocated by experts who have made surveys of the country church. He holds that the pastor in the country ought to study agriculture; that is not business. He also says that the so-called community church as a rule is not desirable. The author is a poet who sees the country with the eyes of a poet. He loves the country and understands it and has said so many things of good common sense that one wonders everybody might read his very interesting book.

The Boarder Up at Em's, by Anice Terhune. New York: Macauley Co.

This bit of fiction is laid in a village among the New England hills. The intimate life of the community is strikingly revealed. The story centers about a girl who, having been expelled from college, contracts a fake marriage, and deserted by her supposed husband and about to become a mother, takes refuge at the home of Em Offord Isham. Em is prim, pious, rather puritanical and proud of her regular and chaste life. How to shield a girl in trouble, reconcile her with her parents and condone her frailties gives Em the proverbial peck of troubles." The characters carry on long conversations in the quaint vernacular of the hills. Ultra-conservatism faces modern problems. Apart from its vigorous, interesting style and its frank realistic treatment of modern laxity one concludes his reading of it with a feeling that the author has wasted a lot of good color and fine technique on an inferior if not unworthy theme.

Tinsel, by Charles Hanson Towne. New York: Appleton. $2.

When Mr. Towne wrote "Tinsel" it is unlikely that he felt he was setting down a sermon on the deceitfulness of riches. Not that "Tinsel" is a "preachy" or a moralizing story. It is anything but. It has a grip on the interest from the moment the over-plump Della Nesbit appears as Miss Columbia in the fourth of July parade of the town of Eureka until, a fashionably slender Mrs. Nesbit-Nesbit, she gives the most picturesque and photographed society function of the year at fashionable Newport. Before the reader passes a canvas life—every-day people whom you might meet any place. So real they are that you follow with a feeling of dismay at their corrosion by the touch of riches with applause those whose poise is never shaken as they hold to true values to the end. Awnings carried Elisha Nesbit from poverty to the millionaire class. Della, his wife, becomes obsessed with the desire to become a society leader. Her "splurge" is the story. This involves a clean, upstanding son, Bruce, and his young wife, to the point of tragedy; Lorna, the daughter, who remains true to real things through all her mother's dereliction; Elisha, the husband, small of stature, humble, who on occasion can speak with a voice of authority, particularly when it comes to the breaking of the prohibition law under his own roof; and the never-wavering friends, Richard and Carrie. The younger set is depicted—its bad and its good side; its inanity and its virility. This is a book that forces home truths that need to be cried from the household. Old and young should read it.

The Key to Faith, by Michael O. Gershenon. New York: Macmillan. $1.50.

Gershenon, a Russian Jew, was one of the outstanding scholars among those of his countrymen who have considered religion the fundamental interest of man. A philosopher and critic, he warned against that intellectual activity which turns men from reality to ready-made formulas. Something more than sound reasoning is necessary if the soul is to live. He presents a challenge to the moral personality, that "cosmic element in man." "The Key to Faith" is his attempt to pass to us the values he found in the moral contents of the Old Testament. He is not interested in the scientific conceptions of Genesis. The Hebrew religion with its growing conception of God, he speaks of as a height where earth borders on heaven, and human vision becomes the expression of the divine. By this inquiry into the religion of the Old Testament, he comes to the conclusion that "the exchange of the will to differ for the preference to conform (as the right idea of man's proper conduct and the unalterable condition of his prosperity) is the key to faith and the essence of religion."

DR. GEO. D. KNIGHTS of Long Beach, Calif., recently completed fourteen years of service with the First church. The young people of the church planned a fine reception for the pastor and his wife.

REV. C. H. BURRILL, pastor of the Atwater church, Los Angeles, Calif., has an attendance of about 100 children in the morning service, which features a story period. This church, which is only three years old, has been self-supporting for a year. It has a Sunday school of over 250. Twenty-three new members have been received since Sept. 1.

THE FIRST CHURCH, Youngstown, Ohio, Rev. A. C. Archibald, pastor, was host to a large gathering of men of the Mahoning association on Mar. 8. The speakers were Judge Witty and Dr. W. H. Main.

PASTOR W. B. PERCIVAL of Mesa, Ariz., has recently had the assistance of Rev. R. S. Beal of Tucson. There were fifty-eight additions of which thirty-four came by baptism. Just half the new members are men and boys.

THE AVERAGE ATTENDANCE of the Sunday school at the First church, Osage, Iowa, for February was 172. Rev. E. H. Koster is pastor.

MR. LEE FRANCIS LYBARGER represented Bucknell University at an important intercollegiate debating contest at Grove City college on Mar. 13. Mr. Lybarger recently won the championship of the Pennsylvania intercollegiate oratorical contest.

REV. ROBERT H. PRATT has accepted a call to the church at Evansville, Wis. He began his pastorate on Mar. 7.

REV. ROBERT LINCOLN KELLEY is spending the months of March and April with the churches of West Virginia as field representative of the Board of Missionary Cooperation.

TEMPLE SCHOOL of missions, in Dr. Brougher's church, is running near 1000 members.

The Psalms Outlined

By Arthur Emerson Harris, D. D.

An outline analysis covering each song of the Psalter. The author has prepared this volume not only with the classroom in mind, but also with thought of the much larger groups, ministers and laymen as well, who are using the Psalter for devotional purposes, and who are glad to receive the brief suggestions such as are contained in the analyses and the comments, mostly spiritual in character, presented in these pages.

The author seeks to analyze each Psalm so that its contents may be seized at a glance. A master of alliteration, he has employed this device as a convenient aid. Preachers will find the book a help in constructing sermons. It has also a distinct devotional value. $1.75 net.

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for April 4

(EASTER LESSON)

JESUS APPEARS TO HIS DISCIPLES

Lesson Text: John 20:24-21:25. Golden Text: John 20:29

Though the review of the quarter's lessons came last Sunday we have an additional lesson in the Gospel of John for Easter Sunday as Easter falls this year on the first Sunday of April.

The Appearances

John confines himself to four appearances of Jesus after his resurrection, viz., to Mary Magdalene; to the ten, Thomas being absent; to the eleven, Thomas being present; and to seven of his disciples at the sea of Galilee. In all the appearances recorded by John, the occasion of each appearance of the Lord is unbelief and discouragement. Against the background of a kind of hopelessness John throws the bright light of Christ's presence with startling contrasts. To Mary he said, "Touch me not," but to Thomas he said, "Reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side." These are apparent contradictions which require the skill of a trained interpreter to harmonize them. At any rate John seemed to be more anxious to show the dramatic force of the appearances of Jesus to his discouraged and disbelieving followers than to harmonize details of the narrative. What could be more dramatic than the scene in the garden when Mary alone sought the body of her dead Lord after finding the tomb empty? Convinced by neither angels nor by him whom she took to be the gardener that her Lord had risen from the dead she cried, "Tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away." Out of that terrible obsession she was lifted by the recognition of her Lord who had come back from the grave in living form. The other three appearances of Jesus recorded in John's Gospel are no less dramatic, if indeed the appearance on the sea of Tiberias is no more dramatic. But these appearances do not introduce a new Jesus in new scenes. He is the same Jesus appearing in the same places and to the same people with the same spirit and message.

The Evidences

The numerous appearances of Jesus after his resurrection to his friends during forty days constitute the evidence for his resurrection. We do not know anything about the process through which our Lord's body went while it lay in the tomb, but evidently it did not see corruption. The mortal put on immortality almost at once, and while the body retained the marks of identity which it bore before and after the crucifixion, it was a different body, what Paul calls, a spiritual body. But the important thing is that death did not reign over Christ. He conquered death and rose from the tomb immune to mortality, and because he lives, we shall live also. This is the message of Easter. The evidences for the resurrection of Jesus are as well attested by historic proof as the evidences for the life and career of Julius Caesar.

"It's ridiculous to say a woman can't keep a secret—any woman can if she really wishes to," said Mrs. Gushit. "Why, I've kept a secret for twenty-five years, and it isn't because folks haven't tried to worm it out of me. But I've never told any one my age since the day I was thirty."

"What's the idea, mother?" questioned a protesting Jean on a sub-zero day. "Do you by any chance imagine anybody wears clothes to keep warm?"

My grandfather wrote a few poems, of which I am rather proud, so when I was asked to give a reading at our church social I chose one of them.

But I was so embarrassed by the pickers that greeted my introduction of the subject that I could scarcely get through. Perhaps it was stage fright, but more likely just my bad grammar that made me say: "I shall now read to you a poem written by my grandfather, who has lain in his grave many years for his own amusement."—O. C. S. in Chicago Tribune.

"Arguments are like cats: if you take them up by the tail they twist and scratch you."—Christopher Morley in Thunder on the Left."

A Canadian newspaper calls attention to an advertisement of a nursing-bottle that concludes with the words: "When the baby is done drinking, it must be unscrewed and laid in a cool place under a tap. If the baby does not thrive on fresh milk, it should be boiled."—Youth's Companion.

After a woman had finished a long list of complaint against her husband, her patient pastor said: "Why not try taping coals of fire on his head?" "Well, I'd sorter hate to go that far," retorted the woman. "Though I've tried taping water and it ain't done no good."

A scientist predicts that in ten years' time there will be no servant girls. He appears to be just ten years behind the times.—London Opinion.

Among those who have lately landed on English soil let us not forget the Prince of Wales.—American Lumberman.

News Notes

"Glowing and glittering with all the glamour of royalty's splendor and tragedies, the crown jewels of vanished Imperial Russia—$264,000,000 worth of flashing crowns, sceptres, diadems, rings and necklaces—are going on sale by order of the soviet government, so that thousands of American-made plows and tractors may furrow the soil of a land in need." So gloats an exchange. The report seems to be correct. If so, the soviet government, albeit driven by necessity, is doing one of the most statesmanlike things now transpiring in this whirling world. The nation that converts crowns into plows, and labors to satisfy hunger rather than pride, is facing the morning.

What is the moral indictment against the moving picture industry? Perhaps its most precise formulation is that of the fourth national moving picture conference held in Chicago, Feb. 12, in the following particulars: Motion picture producers in the United States of America with a marvelous opportunity to preserve and transmit the finest traditions and holiest institutions of our ordered national life to future generations are largely exploiting the most unrepresentative of all phases of modern society. Motion picture producers have signally failed to respond to requests and suggestions of forward-looking citizens that films be improved in this respect. Their failure to do so has already induced unfortunate misapprehensions of American life and ideals in other countries. The block system of marketing theatrical films by producers is in restraint of trade and fair competition, depriving communities of even local option in the choice of films.

Banding birds is a new and interesting industry. The Pomona, Calif., College News gives the following sketch: Bird banding itself is a simple process. Small aluminum bands which in no way interfere with the life of the bird are placed on one of its legs. Each band carries a registration number and the letters, Biol. Surv. (Biological Survey). All banding is carried on in cooperation with the bureau of biological survey of the United States department of agriculture and only trained men are allowed to conduct the work under federal and state permits. Birds will travel thousands of miles on a migration and return the next year to the same locality only fifty feet in diameter. In the western states over fifty active banders banded 10,000 birds last year, while over 100,000 birds have been banded to date in the United States.

In the present crisis in France, ministers do not fare well, especially if they have children, and they all seem to have children. The low birthrate of the French middle class does not affect ministers' families. France owes to its Protestant pastors a substantial portion of its intellectual elite. The teaching profession, the law, the ministry, the medical profession are full of ministers' sons. One family alone, the Monod family, has to its credit a remarkable number of distinguished men, many of whom are in the ministry. A French pastor receives from 5000 francs to 7500 francs, the latter pay going to the married men. Add to that a small indemnity of residence and then put the sum into dollars (at 3.65 to a dollar) and see what you get: the princely sum of $200 or $250! How can they bring up their children and give them the kind of education that they should receive? French Protestants have been alarmed for some time over this plight of their pastors. An association has been formed to distribute to them yearly allowances from 300 to 600 francs per child. A sum sufficient to grant this allowance to 1140 children has been raised. The sum, however, which in dollars is ridiculously small, does not seem sufficient for the needs. The association aims to increase it. The French Protestants have generously responded to the call and have not appealed to outside help. However, there may be Americans concerned over the fate of French Protestantism, descendants of Huguenots who still feel the call of the blood that may like to help these belated victims of the war and after war. The treasurer of this association is Mr. Maurice Hottinguer, banker, 38 rue de Provence, Paris. In this country Prof. Othon Guerlac, 3 Fountain Place, Ithaca, N. Y., will gladly transmit any contributions that may be sent him for this cause.

IS THIS TRUE?

Here is a charge reported to have been made in February by a well known Japanese editor and publisher, in an address at a banquet in Tokyo. Twenty American business men were present:

"Unfortunately the religion of the nations which now dominate the world is of the masterful, imperialistic, and exclusive type, and therefore cannot be counted on as a force for harmony, at least so far as relations between East and West are concerned."

Has this editor given a correct interpretation of the religion of America? Is Christianity really the advance agent of the economic and political imperialism of Western nations?

The way to refute his charge is to support adequately those Christian men and women in Japan—Americans and Japanese—who promote international brotherhood, remove race prejudice, and bring people to a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ.

Your missionaries in Japan—men whom you know personally and of whose sacrificial work you have heard—are doing that.

They need your prayers. They depend on your gifts. The successful completion of the present fiscal year will show your most loyal and hearty support.

Folks, Facts and Opinion

By way of antidote to the lack of power to think which some critics of American life note with sadness, the Inquiry, "published on the top floor of 129 East 52nd street, New York," is designed to awaken constructive thinking. It publishes discussion outlines for the study of current and vital topics. Practical directions are given for conducting such discussion studies. The last number coming to hand deals with the subject, "Superior People." It not only gives the reader something to think about, but shows him how to think and sets him to thinking. The light it throws on questions of race and class makes the ordinary shallow prejudices of people on these subjects too silly for laughter—almost silly enough for tears.

Outstanding representatives of the church, the stage, and the motion picture industry, at a meeting at the Waldorf hotel, New York City, upon invitation of the drama committee of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, appointed a committee, headed by the Rev. George Reid Andrews, chairman of the committee on religious and educational drama in the Federal Council of Churches, to proceed with a constructive program of action leading to closer cooperation and affiliation, between the churches and the theater. Members of that committee are Chancellor Elmer Ellsworth Brown, the Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, Rev. Samuel McCrea Cavert, Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson, Frank Gillmore, John Golden, Will H. Hays, Otto Kahn, Rev. Charles S. McFarland, Rev. John A. Marquis, Carl F. Milliken, Channing Pollock, Felix M. Warburg and Prof. Luther A. Weigle.

Italy's progress in the extinction of liberty may be traced in its new laws empowering the government to revoke the citizenship and confiscate the property of any Italian abroad who utters words or commits acts which, even though they do not constitute crimes, the government considers likely to cause disorders within the realms or damage the prestige of the existing regime abroad; making the premier responsible only to the king, instead of jointly to king and parliament as heretofore, and also providing for the fining and imprisonment of those speaking or acting in a manner derogatory to him; recognizing the fascist labor-unions and the fascist employers' association as the only organizations through which industrial questions can be aired, designed to abolish strikes and lockouts by enforcing compulsory arbitration; virtually eliminating local elections, and giving extensive administrative powers to prefects appointed by the central government.

Hearings on the new education bill were held Feb. 24-26 before the joint committee of the senate and house of representatives of the United States. Many witnesses appeared for and against. The printed report of this hearing will become the textbook for those who are discussing the proposal for a department of education with a secretary in the president's cabinet. Address your congressman personally care United States senate or house of representatives, Washington, D. C. Ask him for a copy of the report of the Joint Hearing on S. 291, or H. R. 5000. It will be sent free to any citizen.

The meeting of the Chicago Baptist Association will be held at the Englewood Baptist church this year. The date is a month earlier than in past years, May 9-12. The effort is being made to approach the goal of a Baptist week for Chicago. All meetings and addresses of the association will be centered around the general theme of the Baptist contribution to the present. There will be some radical departures from past custom or rather radical additions to past methods. On Sunday, May 9, every pastor in the city is being requested to exchange pulpits with some other Baptist pastor, speaking on some phase of the above general theme and advertising the association gathering for the week. On Monday evening, instead of one general meeting, there will be three regional meetings, one on the south, west and north sides. The lines will follow the district division lines of the B. Y. P. U. These will be meetings for fellowship and discussion of some vital problems of our church work. Two other features will be choral singing on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings by choirs gathered from the churches of the South and North districts. On Wednesday evening, there will be a pageant of the history of the First church. This will anticipate a much larger pageant next year of the story of Chicago Baptists. The ministers will meet as usual on Monday morning. The women will hold their meeting on Tuesday afternoon. The young people will hold their meeting on Tuesday evening. On Wednesday afternoon, there will be a great mass meeting at which some outstanding representative of the denomination will speak, with possibly a representative of another denomination. Wednesday evening will be the meeting of the Chicago Baptist Executive Council.

The last week of July, the eighteen international congress against alcoholism will be held in Tartu, Esthonia. To this congress, each three years, come leading representatives of anti-alcohol and educational societies and government officials of Europe, America (North and South), Australia and the greater part of the world. The congress is held this year in the Baltic region because of the keen interest and activity in the struggle against drink that is marking public opinion in these countries since they became independent states at the close of the world war.—Tartu (Dorpat) is the seat of one of the oldest universities of the world, founded in 1632.

Bishop Blake has stirred up a mass adverse criticism in the Methodist papers. In a syndicated article in these papers he suggested that the virgin birth of Jesus is a matter concerning which freedom of opinion may be tolerated within the bounds of orthodox fellowship. He said: "The deity of Jesus depends not upon his relations to Mary, but upon his relations to God." Reactions among the readers and editors of those papers, perhaps expressed in a single sentence from the Central Christian Advocate: "Unless the New Testament is a wanton fabrication the definition of the relations of Jesus to God is concretely given in the recital of his relations to the virgin Mary."

The wide extent of lawlessness rampant in the nation, is seen in the following table of thefts for 1925, as estimated by Wm. B. Joyce, chairman of the National Security Company, of New York. Stock frauds, $1,000,000,000; credit frauds, $400,000,000; burglary, large theft, $250,000,000; forgery, $100,000,000; embezzlements, $100,000,000; sea piracy and custom frauds, $100,000,000; railroad freight robberies, $25,000,000; home building frauds, $25,000,000; miscellaneous, $1,000,000,000, making a total of $3,000,000,000. This list makes no count of frauds in connection with the building of good roads. A former secretary of the Highway and Municipal Contractors association, states that in Texas the state highway commissioners have recently let a contract for asphalt paving a section of 1080 miles of highway at an expense of $2,000,000 more than they should spend for the work. In one year in Texas, within two years, speculation in oil stock stole from the public more than $100,000,000. Such a survey raises the question: How far is lawlessness a "business proposition?" This question assumes even larger proportions when we add to this summary political graft of all kinds and capitalized bootlegging, both of which are rooted in the legitimate activities of private business.

Progress in deciphering and translating the literature of the Aztecs, reveals a wonderfully varied and rich artistic expression in all sorts of literary forms. The peculiarity of their poetry is that in the Algonquin of Longfellow's "Hiawatha," it runs exclusively in evenly measured trochaic lines.

Hemp is coming back, say the papers. The machine has been perfected for breaking which will make the production of hemp plant financially remunerative, and Kentucky will revel again in the beauty of its hemp fields. The old days of Kentucky hemp were full of tragedy and romance which new hemp crops may recall to memory but can never reproduce in fact. Nevertheless, welcome, hemp.

Seventy chaplains connected with army organizations, in a meeting at Washington, recently declared themselves unanimously in these terms: "We do not believe that war is a civilized or permanent method of solving difficulties between nations, any more than fighting to a finish between individuals. It is a state of anarchy. We hate its waste of substance. We hate its profligate expenditure of human energy. We hate its needless sacrifice of human lives and the misery and pain, the physical torture and mental anguish which accompany it. We hate the poisonous prejudices and suspicions and enmities which it leaves in the world! War is a curse! And we pledge ourselves to work for peace. We are not militarists. At the same time we doubt the wisdom of pacifist agitation and refuse to join the peace-at-any-price propagandists. No nation or people can long endure in the terrible antagonisms of our restless world unless its stalwart manhood be willing to be prepared to defend it. We therefore believe in and shall strive for a policy and program of adequate national defense."

Somebody seems to be socially awake among the Baptists of Rangoon. "Good News," published by the Immanuel Baptist church of that city, says in its issue of Jan. 17: "We see pushcarts, with enormous masses of timber, iron or lead, pushed through the streets by coolies whose strength is not adequate for the task assigned them. Who cares for these men are overworked or abused? As we pass along and see them, their naked backs gleaming in the hot sun, the sweat pouring in great streams down their bodies, their faces expressive of absolute anguish as they tug and push and thrust against the heavy load, do we care? Do we plan to do anything about it? Why is there no Christian opinion in Rangoon to put a stop to these things? When the Irrawaddy delta strike occurred a little while ago, did any single follower of the Lord Jesus Christ make an effort to find out the rights of the case? Was there any attempt to discover whether these antagonists were being fairly paid for their services? The strike failed of course; the company was victorious; but was it right? Was any Christian hand stretched out to help these inarticulate Chittagongians, or were they simply crushed into submission by the power of a gigantic corporation?"

Albion Woodbury Small, one of the foremost sociologists of the country and professor emeritus and former head of the department of sociology at the University of Chicago, died suddenly, Mar. 24, at his home in the Del Prado hotel, Chicago. He is credited with having introduced the science of sociology into America and has since 1895 been the editor of the American Journal of Sociology as well as author of many books and treatises on the subject. He is survived by his daughter, Mrs. Hayden Harris, at present in Paris, and a brother, Dr. C. P. Small of Chicago. Mrs. Small died in 1916. Professor Small came to the University of Chicago in 1892, as one of the famous group of men who were brought there by President Harper upon the foundation of the university. He was a member of the Hyde Park church, Chicago.

During the first week in March an all-California congress of religious education was held in San Francisco. Many of the foremost leaders in religious education on the coast participated in the program. Findings represented the mature conclusions of the most competent educators in the group. The heart of interest lies in the pronouncement that "religious education must be given an assured place in the potential educational plan of every American boy and girl. To this end, there must be found means of cordial cooperation between religious bodies and public school. This cooperation will be in spirit and common purpose rather than organic. The injection of sectarian dissension within the public school on the one hand, and the touch of political power on the church are equally to be deplored and must be guarded against with the utmost care." Not only Christians but also Jews were represented on the program and the findings. It is proposed to follow up the findings by persevering efforts to work out an acceptable and effective plan of cooperation.

The difference in ease of transportation between New England and the level Mississippi basin appears from the comments on a great new locomotive that has been put into operation on the Boston and Albany railroad. This monster is eighty-seven feet long, and, it is said, will haul fifty freight cars—a load that would be a joke in the valley states.

The public schoolteachers observe May 18 of each year as Good-will day with exercises stressing the thought of international friendship. It has been suggested that the young people of our churches might well participate in a similar type of service. The Sunday immediately prior to May 18, which this year is May 16, will be observed as "International Good-will Sunday."

Jan. 8, Hon. Wm. C. Langford of Georgia introduced into congress a bill to secure for Washington City and the District of Columbia a Sabbath law. Opponents of the bill were the Seventh Day Adventists, the Religious Liberty Association, the Anti Blue Law League of America, some labor organizations, representatives of theatrical and movie interests and others. The opposition was led by the Seventh Day Adventists who attended the hearing in great numbers and who have been untiring in their efforts throughout the country to flood congress with petitions against the bill. Among those advocating the passage of the bill were the Lord's Day Alliance, representatives of the Presbyterian, M.E., Protestant Episcopal and other churches, W. C. T. U., Boy Scouts of America, Federation of Churches of Washington City, Barber's Union and Bible classes of Washington City.

In order to keep the record clear on the interdenominational student conference held at Evanston, Ill., last December, here is what it had to say about war: "We believe the church should excommunicate war, dissociate itself from the war system, and refuse henceforth to allow the use of the church as a medium of preparation for, or prosecution of war. Because we favor a positive education for peace, and because we believe that the present military training program of the war department in high schools and colleges gives war an ultimate sanction, perpetuates the war system, delays disarmament, intimidates students and faculty, and inhibits free discussion, we suggest abolition of military training in church and denominational schools; abolition of military training in high schools; and abolition of military training in colleges and universities, including the immediate abolition of the compulsory features in land grant institutions. The church should guard and guarantee the right of an individual to follow the guidance of his own conscience when that conscience advises against participation in war. Because war is a negation of the value of human personality we condemn any attempt to impose universal conscription of manhood on the United States, such as the proposed legislation before congress."

The Federate School of Missions, in which Baptists are one of the affiliated denominations, will hold its twentieth annual sessions, at Mount Hermon, Calif., July 3-10. Mrs. C. W. Brinstad, wife of the Baptist executive secretary of the Northern California Convention, is chairman of the committee that carries on this Federate School of Missions. Dr. F. A. Agar will preach at Mount Hermon, July 4, morning and evening. The foreign textbook will be "Moslem Women" by Doctor and Mrs. Zwemer, who have given their lives to work among Moslems in Arabia and Mesopotamia, being now in Egypt. Mrs. Young of San Diego will teach this book. The home mission topic will be rural America. Various missionaries will be heard. There will be a children's story hour, conducted by Mrs. T. H. Hageman, based on the junior study book. There will be evening lectures, a morning period for a normal class and another period for methods. There will be exhibits of literature by different denominations.

Why do the native races tend to decline and disappear in the face of colonization by the white race? Sir Joseph Henry Caruthers offers this explanation: "The real trouble has been that our white race has generally been in too great a hurry to impress its standards in order to create conditions of settlement, trade and commerce, and of law and order, to which white people are accustomed but of which the natives are quite ignorant. Do not continue to insist on the plea that civilization dooms those whom it attempts to bring under the pale. I come from Australia where this damnable doctrine that the native race is doomed is resulting in their extinction. In Tasmania the entire native race has been wiped out and it is but a memory even to the oldest inhabitant there. Why did this occur? Chiefly because the entire mass of the aborigines was removed to an adjacent island, and once they were deported they died of broken hearts. One such tragedy is quite enough for the knowledge of any decent white man."

For a fresh and discriminating way of assessing convention functions, let the Alabama Baptist contribute the following editorial hint: "A convention may not logically baptize converts, or administer the Lord's Supper or ordain candidates for the ministry. And certainly a convention has no more business dabbling in the matter of faith and doctrine which our Lord committed wholly to the churches than it has in doing the other things which lie within the province of the churches."

The Chicago B. Y. P. U. stewardship team, consisting of Merle Lucas, city president; B. J. Badger, North District president and member of the executive committee of B. Y. P. U. of A.; Elen Benson, South District president; and Margaret Clague has been on the job almost every Sunday since the first of February. Already Warrenville, Ill., Epiphany (Chicago), Logansport, Ind., Galesburg, Ill., Maywood, Ill., and Delavan, Wis., have received visits. At Delavan, John Singleton, president of the B. Y. P. U. of A., accompanied the team.

Mr. Sheba, a non-Christian, editor of the Japan Times and Mail in a recent editorial has this to say: "It is common enough to say that Japan has won her present place in the world through prowess at arms, as if mankind had no criterion for judging the greatness of a people but the brute instinct to kill each other. No, that is not the only criterion, nor yet the main criterion. There is a higher standard, indeed, the highest standard, namely the quality of civilization. What is it that has given Japan her present civilization? It may be claimed that Japan has had centuries of oriental civilization, that has prepared her to rise to a higher plane of humanity and enlightenment. But no amount of sophistry will hide the fact that it is the Christian workers and Christian civilization that have lifted Japan above the darkness of old ideas and backward customs and put her on the path of progress and higher culture."

An outline for men's groups in the scheme for developing a missionary church has been prepared by the department of missionary education of the Northern Baptist Convention. Copies may be had by addressing the department of missionary education at 2 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Alarm was excited by the announcement that the "Damned Souls Society of Atheists" had been formed among students of Rochester University. It was another sign that the Christian religion is going to the dogs. But here is what the Campus, organ of the students, has to say on the subject: "To the critic person it is obvious that a group of five or six avowed members, and they almost entirely underclassmen, can present a general indictment of the university of the student body. The Campus takes this opportunity to reflect student opinion on the matter as being heartily displeased with the whole affair and repudiating the group's connection in an official way with the student body of Rochester." And presently the free will be forgotten.

What twelve million women think about prohibition and the way in which it is being enforced in the United States will be told in Washington, Apr. 11-12, when the woman's national committee for law enforcement has its second annual convention at the Washington Hotel. Delegated representatives from nine national organizations of women on the committee and leaders from a number of others will participate in the Washington meeting. The committee was formed three years ago when a group of women's national organizations decided that they wanted a fact-finding agency of their own, independent of regular temperance societies. It is political nor does it attempt to control politically; but it hears all political points of view and brings its conclusions to the attention of the public. Its main object is to counteract dangerous propaganda and to offer solutions for problems of law enforcement.

THIS we know—

*We drop a seed into the ground,
A tiny, shapeless thing, shrivelled and dry,
And, in the fulness of its time, is seen
A form of peerless beauty, robed and crowned,
Beyond the pride of any earthly queen,
Instinct with loveliness, and sweet and rare
The perfect emblem of its Maker's care.*

*This from a shrivelled seed?—
—Then may man hope indeed!*

*For man is but the seed of what he shall be,
When, in the fulness of his perfecting,
He drops the husk and cleaves his upward way,
Through earth's retardings and the clinging clay
Into the sunshine of God's perfect day.*

*No fetters then! No bonds of time or space!
But powers as ample as the boundless grace
That suffered man, and death, and yet, in tenderness,*

*Set wide the door and passed Himself before—
As He had promised—to prepare a place.*

*Yea, we may hope!
For we are seeds,
Dropped into earth for heavenly blossoming.
Perchance, when comes the time of harvesting,
His loving care
May find some use for even a humble tare.*

*We know not what we shall be—only this—
That we shall be made like Him—as He is.*

What Can Save Our Faith and Fellowship?

EDITORIAL efforts of THE BAPTIST have been frankly and obviously directed towards eliminating causes of friction in the Northern Baptist Convention and towards strengthening all of the factors of good understanding and fellowship. From references in the Baptist papers and from correspondence reaching this office, it is apparent that all classes of Baptists understand what we are trying to do, and, except in a few instances where brethren are committed to a divisive policy which consistency impels them to maintain, all classes of Baptists sympathize with our purpose and efforts. The considerateness with which brethren of diverse theological opinions offer comments on our course touches our hearts and awakens in us an increasing sense of trusteeship for constructive thinking and careful utterance. Our plea for the Northern Baptist Convention to leave conditions of membership and other terms of identification of Baptist churches to those methods and agencies which have long been employed with success and success among our churches everywhere, appeals to a deep instinct of spiritual freedom in the hearts of our people.

But where there has been a deep disturbance of feeling, and where grave fears have been awakened, misgivings are not easily and quickly dispelled. In some minds there lingers a question as to what security there is, in the absence of some defining pronouncement of the convention, that the Baptist denomination will not drift from its original moorings in the first principles of Christian faith. That is an honest question and a true answer is due.

Consider then what forces created, kept, prospered and unified the Baptist denomination through the trying ages before the Northern Baptist Convention was born. We find our fathers said that salvation comes by personal faith in Jesus; that the believer has direct personal access and is personally and directly responsible to his Lord; that the New Testament, interpreted by every believer for himself, is the common guide of faith and practice for both the individual and the church; that the believer is regenerated by the holy Spirit to eternal life, and is preserved and perfected unto by the power of God; that Jesus Christ himself is the immediate and effectual Head of the church; that in loyalty to him the local church is self-constituted, self-governing and subject to no visible authority external to itself; that the fellowship of the churches exhibits itself in free cooperative associations and adjusts its problems through equally free and fraternal councils; that a church cannot delegate any of its functions to any ecclesiastical organization external to itself; that the open Bible released in the hands of the people anywhere will reproduce the type of Christianity embodied in a Baptist church; that the Baptist denomination is itself the product of such forces; and that its only bond is that of a common unity of the Spirit. This was the standard interpretation and guaranty of the Baptist movement a century ago, fifty years ago and twenty years ago. Is it not just as true now? What can destroy a movement built upon such a foundation?

That movement created our conventions and missionary organizations for the purpose of expressing its life. If they were nonexistent it would still exist and would create other organs for its uses. But it is more than they. It looks far beyond them for the sources of its life, its authority, its validity and its unity. How little does it depend upon a mere by-law of a convention! And how little can such a by-law do towards creating and sustaining it!

Varieties of type in thinking, in doctrine, in organization and in culture exist among Baptists, always have existed, and, in the very nature of the movement, are likely to continue. Here and there an extreme form of liberalism or of fanaticism may be found. But such developments are incidental and temporary. As every man catches his vision, testifies of his experience and contributes his teaching, the great Christian common sense of the mass sifts out the true from the false, and presently the abnormal development is eliminated by the process of free spiritual selection. There is in the ordinary local church a marvelous power of discernment, of selection and of elimination which Jesus implicitly trusts and which we can afford to trust.

But are these original forces of the Spirit of Christ at work effectually in the life of the denomination now? If not, the last place to go in order to invoke them is the hurly-burly of a convention. If there is doubt of their presence and power such doubt constitutes a divine call to every Baptist to start evangelism anew among his neighbors in order to restore these creative and conserving forces in our denominational life. But they are still here and still powerful. Touch a Baptist church intimately almost anywhere and you will find it ready to respond in the old life of spiritual beauty: God, and not convention rules, brought the Baptist denomination into being; God, and not rules of a convention, is "our help in ages past, our hope for years to come." The kingdom of God is not coming through debate about a by-law. Only the regnant spirit of Christ can save Baptist faith and fellowship, or make them worth saving.

The Power of An Endless Life

EVERY human being upon reaching the stage of personal consciousness finds himself in the presence of a great antagonist. He faces a world which is not all and always friendly, and sometimes seems not at all friendly. He meets conflicts which early leave scars on his body or his soul; looking about him, he observes others of his kind meeting the same kind of conflicts or more fearful ones and bearing the same kind of scars or deeper ones. High human endeavors meet defeat after defeat, and the drama of life ends for all alike in the tragedy of death.

From the moment of this discovery the problem of life is a problem of power. Who is sufficient? Whence cometh my help? Life becomes a quest in which men resort to every promising device for reenforcement. They invent tools and weapons to lengthen and strengthen their arms. They associate themselves together in many ways to gain the strength of union. By the methods of scientific and philosophical investigation they pry into the secrets of nature in the hope of turning nature itself to the service of man. They turn inquiring eyes of faith towards the heights and call to the Unseen and the Infinite for help in the struggle for existence.

And they are not unheard and unhelped. Invention helps. Society helps. Research helps. Religion helps. But most of all religion is the supreme auxiliary of life, because it reenforces the spirit of man. And this it does not merely because it is an outlet and discipline of faith, but because all through the ages in manifold ways God has revealed himself to, in and through the actual experience of those who seek him. Behind a frowning world is a friendly face, smiling in good-will and saying, "Fear not, I am with thee."

Full and final voucher for the presence and sufficiency of a friendly God is the person of Jesus Christ, and the way of a full and victorious outlet of life is pointed out through his own death and triumphant resurrection. Before he died he had overcome the world and shown mankind how to overcome it. After he died he rose from the dead and converted death itself into an incident of immortality. Since his resurrection no fortune however ill and no pain however deep has been able to silence the paean of eternal triumph on the lips of his people.

His resurrection has been followed by a new release of power in the lives of men through faith in him. The Eternal Spirit has become a present human inheritance. The power of an endless life is operating in the human struggle here and now, making the weakest of us victorious in many battles with the world which we should otherwise lose, and giving a firm assurance that in the long run the weakest of us is both unconquerable and resistible. Whatever Easter may have meant to the primitive people as to our generation in its prophecy of a reflowing tide of life over the broad landscape, it can never lose its rich significance of spiritual resurrection which came in it with Jesus' rising and which now burgeons in widening areas upon the earth.

Twenty-Seven Days Will Tell the Tale

FROM the date of this paper to the close of the first year of the Northern Baptist Convention there are only twenty-seven days. No figures are available at this date to show just how near the constituency of the convention to meeting the budget call for the closing year. And exact figures are not material, for each church is keeping tally of its own budget and will be able to check up its own account, and this is the essential matter. If no church fails the convention cannot fail. If one church fails, it contributes to the failure of the convention. Its failure has the effect of a vote that the convention shall fail.

Put the matter this way. Suppose that next Sunday morning the following resolution should be introduced at the meeting of your church: Resolved, that in the judgment of this church it is desirable that the Northern Baptist Convention fail to raise the full amount of its missionary budget for the current year. How many would raise their hands in favor of it? Rarely, one. But suppose the words "fail to" be stricken out; how many would vote for the resolution so amended? Nearly all. Suppose that the further resolution be added: Resolved that this church will do its full part towards raising the full amount of the convention budget before May 1. That is the resolution and everything depends on what the churches are actually going to do about it.

What our churches do is going to rebound upon them. Suppose that at the communion service May 2, eight thousand pastors shall announce to their congregations that the budget of the Northern Baptist Convention has been raised; will such an announcement contribute anything to the enthusiasm, the self-respect, the fellowship and courage of the churches? Surely, it will. To render possible such an enrichment of the common life of our people and to start them forward with hope and courage in stronger fellowship for larger undertakings, would be ample recompense for even unusual sacrifice. If our churches can see this and feel it they will gladly make sacrifice.

But it is to be remembered that the budget was projected on such a moderate scale this year as to be almost below the sacrificial standard. Moreover, in a larger measure than ever, the churches themselves fixed their own budget standards, and all of them were invited to do so without any outside constraint whatsoever. Never more than this year was the budget a self-expression by the churches themselves of a sense of their own responsibility and independence. Let there be equal freedom yet. If any church wishes to do so let it propose to its membership this resolution: Resolved that the budget set for this church for itself for the current year is beyond its reasonable ability and no further effort to raise it ought to be made. If many churches would pass such a resolution? Few, if any.

What then is the conclusion? It is obvious. It is twenty-seven days to raise the rest; let us do it.

The World in Transit

BY THE ASSISTANT EDITOR

ye, Aye, Sir: It Is Soldierly Speech, But—

Hanford MacNider, assistant secretary of war, speaks: "By the industrial mobilization plan of the war department the government hoped to prevent a repetition of the waste and confusion that occurred in the first year of America's entry into the world war. What we want is not a great army but an expert nucleus, not a great gathering of war material to fret us in peace, nor any great mobilization of men or arms, but a well-thought-out, comprehensive and intelligent structure of emergency insurance plans." But permit a suggestion. Within fifty yards of the desk in which these lines are written and at this very moment there is a long breadline of unemployed and hungry men waiting to be fed by the women of a church. Yesterday two men in that line fell unconscious in the snow from weakness. Why not attempt a real mobilization for "well-thought-out, comprehensive and intelligent structure of emergency insurance" against such conditions as these? Is warfare more important than welfare?

Congress Shall Make No
Such Law; But It Does

According to the constitution of the United States, there is one thing congress cannot do. It can make no law prohibiting the freedom of speech or of the press. But it respects that prohibition about as much as bootleggers respect the eighteenth amendment. Since and during the war the whole question of the freedom of speech became acute in a new form. The problem is how to preserve liberty and at the same time to keep it as nearly as possible fool-proof. Some restraint there must be. All that any man can justly ask is that all access to facts and all expression of opinions be equally free. Why not adopt the forum idea? Provide a community forum in which the free discussion of all questions of current interest shall be permitted and protected. Impose such police supervision as may seem needful over irresponsible utterances on the streets and in private or factional assemblies. If any man thinks that he has not been treated fairly by the police, give him the right of appeal to the public forum to state and argue his proposal, with the privilege of anybody to refute him on the same forum at the same time. Such an arrangement would combine freedom, fairness and fullness of discussion with equal control in the interests of order and decency. Only proposals fit to survive could live through such a forum, and no proposal need fail to get a fair hearing. Some such principle could be applied to the press and must inevitably be applied to the radio.

Caveat Emptor Begins to Give Way to Ethics

Something like a veritable revolution has taken place in commercial ethics. Formerly men trafficked on the basis of individual judgment. He who had anything to sell had the right to take for it all that anybody else was willing to pay, and in the absence of actual fraud a contract once made, no matter how unjust, was sacred. "Caveat emptor" was; and perhaps still is, the maxim of law—let the buyer beware; he makes the contract at his own risk, and when it is made, let him keep it without whining. But the new law is now finding expression in the highest business circles and that in order to moral validity in a contract there must be equality of bargaining capacity, equality of position for bargaining and equality of resulting advantage. It is not enough that there be no fraudulent representation and that the contract be voluntary; there must be also fundamental equity. Consequences of the adoption of the new commercial ethics when carried into practice are far-reaching, especially since business is coming to be organized into vast units. Will it mean, for instance, that goods and service must be supplied to the community at the actual economic cost? In order to secure such equity, how far must community control extend over credit, over capital wealth and over the economic organization? What percentage of the price of a commodity or a service ought to be charged for the cost of management, for remuneration to investors and for capital reserve and expansion? Under the old system of competitive trading such questions were tabu to the public. They were private business. But under the new system of collective bargaining between public and quasi-public groups, with the new ethics of the contract, they will inevitably become public questions. A revision of comparative valuations will become more insistent. People have been asking in some bewilderment why an attorney for the moving picture business should receive ten times the salary of the president of a university. As business educates them in the new ethics of the contract they will ask such question with clear and decisive purpose.

Seven Hundred People to the Mile
Produce More Than They Can Eat

Stefanson's alluring story of "The Friendly Arctic" finds its mate in another story of "The Friendly Tropics." It is represented, for instance, that the Island of Java, with a land area of 50,000 square miles, supports a population of 35,000,000, and exports large quantities of food. Compare those figures with your own state. Indiana, for instance, with a little more than 100 to the square mile, is complaining of overcrowding. The fact is that human beings have only begun to scratch the surface of the economic resources of the world for sustaining a high degree of human comfort and culture. With scientific production set free from artificial interference, it can provide for many hundreds of millions more people than ever existed on the earth. There need be no trouble about a living when we learn how to live together.

At Least One Man Knows How To Split a Hair Diagonally

Father John A. Ryan of the Catholic university at Washington is genial, interesting—and careful. He is the spokesman of the social action group in the Catholic church, and he takes advanced ground almost to the point of radicalism. He has published a pamphlet on the subject of "Industrial Democracy from a Catholic Viewpoint," which may serve as a foil to the pamphlet by Norman Thomas on "Industrial Democracy." In brief, as Father Ryan sees things, the Catholic teaching opposes socialism, but it has a "leaning towards workers' control", would view with approval "government ownership and operation of the railroads", "the presence of government representatives on boards of directors", "labor sharing in shop management", "labor membership in boards of directors", "co-operative ownership and management", and a transfer of "the dominant control from capital to labor", provided that any such arrangement guarantees to the investor a fair rate of interest plus protection against the risk of the business, and provided that ultimate labor control shall come as "a development of a gradual process." Just how to find a formula for the industrial democracy of Father Ryan and avoid that of Norman Thomas is a fine study in dialectics.

Death and the Life Beyond

VI—The Illumination of Our Lord's Resurrection

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

THE difference between Christianity and all other religions lies in the supreme demonstration which Christianity alone offers to the world of a wholly worthy Person who makes clear to mankind the real meaning of the life beyond. Others, as we have seen, have doctrines, beliefs, reasonings, monuments and minor demonstrations concerning that life; Christianity has the major demonstration, and with it the perfect doctrine. The soul of our religion is the Person of Jesus Christ, to whom all faith is directed and from whom all inspiration is derived. And the core of that faith, as objective, is found in the fact that Jesus proved himself to be "the Prince of life." No discussion of the life beyond has any real validity for Christians unless at the center of it the chief place is found for the mighty fact of the resurrection. It is absolutely vital for us. It is a fact, not of speculation, but of life. The earliest apostolic preaching was insistent upon the fact that the same Jesus, whom wicked hands had crucified and slain, had been "raised" from the dead by the mighty power of God. This was proof, they declared, that Jesus was the Messiah of the Jews and, indeed, the Lord of all human life. He was the "Lord of the dead and of the living." They announced this message, not in secret places and to credulous fools, but in the very capital where Jesus had been crucified, and in the presence of the multitudes who had witnessed the tragedy. The high officials of the Jewish church could not contradict them; all they could do was to fall back upon that last refuge of weakness; namely, persecution and vilification.

"Because I Live Ye Shall Live"

Why was the whole emphasis placed upon the resurrection of Jesus from the dead? It was because of what he was, and what he claimed to do. The point was not did a man rise, but did this man rise—this person with a spotless character and a perfect humanity, who claimed to be the revealer of the character of God and the Redeemer of the character of man. It meant everything for the disciples whether or not this divine Friend and Teacher and Saviour, cut off by tragedy in his thirtieth year, was now alive or annihilated. They declared that he had reappeared in life and offered many infallible proofs of his survival and victory. They had seen him, touched him, heard him speak as of old—hence their emphatic witness to what they knew to be true. But the resurrection of Jesus means everything for humanity. If this unique person, this finest flower of the human race, had perished upon the cross, then there is an end at once to all human hopes of survival. For if he, so wonderful, has not survived, it is absolutely certain that ordinary folk have no chance of continuous life. There is therefore no heavenly home and no heavenly Father. All goes into the gulf together. It is because in Christ the whole human question is involved that the matter becomes so vital. Our whole fate is wrapped up with his. He said, "Because I live ye shall live also." The corollary of this is true; if he has perished we shall perish also.

We, who have loved and lost, are tormented with questionings and anxieties about the fate of our dear ones who have left us. Where have they gone? What are they doing? In what conditions are they living? Are they still bound to us by living ties, or has death severed these forever? Can we communicate with them or they with us? Shall we meet them again? There are men who affect indifference to such questions. They cannot know what it is. But wholesome people cry with Browning,

"Truly there needs
Another life to come! If this be all
And other life awaits us not—for me
I say 'tis a poor cheat, a stupid bungle
A wretched failure. I for one protest Against it and I hurl it back with scorn."

Men speak of these cries of the heart as being "morbidity." They are nothing of the kind. They are normal and are a sign of moral health. Absence of such a feeling is no sign of naturalness; it is rather a sign of callousness. To the sorrowful heart the Easter message comes as a gospel. It is good news that the Redeemer of mankind is immortal and that none can interrupt his work. It is good news that in him the hopes of man are secured and that they are not raised to be mocked.

Easter Day—the Watershed of Life

Easter day is the watershed of human life; on this side there is gloom, loss, despair; on this side all is light, hope and joy. The resurrection of Jesus belongs at once to two orders, the temporal and the spiritual. On the one side it is part of the web of history, and falls within the category of scientific investigation. On the other side its deeper meaning can be apprehended only by persons who spiritually have kinship with the Christ. In this aspect it is incapable of a demonstration; it can be known only by those who deliberately set out to know it. In my recent volume ("Jesus Christ and the Modern Challenge," Chapter VII on the Resurrection of Christ) I have marshalled and analyzed the evidence for the historicity of the resurrection, leaving no point of modern criticism unnoticed. I shall not therefore repeat what was written in those pages. A few sentences must suffice in "the way of a resumé."

It is not denied that Jesus died upon the cross on Good Friday about three o'clock. The Roman certificate officially announced the fact. His dead body was entombed and guarded by a company of Roman soldiers. At daybreak on the third day his body was not there, and that body has never been found. All of the disciples were at first entirely sceptical when the story of the resurrection reached them. So far from being predisposed to believe they doubted; and one of them strenuously denied the possibility of such a happening. In one hour the doubt and denial was changed to fervent belief. For forty days afterwards the Master appeared to them at intervals and instructed them in their future duties. At the end of that time he ceased to manifest himself to them. That we call his ascension.

Belief in the resurrection completely transformed the disciples. They who were Jews and Monotheists, became worshipers of Jesus Christ, yet their worship of him did not displace but rather enriched their worship of the God. The cross which had been a symbol of disgrace came for them a symbol of victory. These men, who honored the Sabbath, transferred the day from Saturday to the following day in honor of the resurrection which took place on that day. Even more remarkable than this change in their beliefs was the change in their character. Men of low condition, self-seeking and often cowardly when Jesus was yet with them, they became new persons under the influence of the new faith. Their social life as transformed. Belief in the resurrection fused a number of unrelated units into a solid, compact fellowship, which became the church, the greatest society the world has ever known.

The apostles did not lie when they told their story, nor were they deceived by themselves or by others. There is a rational way of accounting for the belief in the resurrection of Jesus other than by admitting its truth. Every rationalistic theory which has sought to account for the resurrection is today discredited. This is the resumé of the argument, which is elaborated in the chapter referred to.

The denials of the truth of the gospel story are all based, in the last analysis, upon a certain theory of matter. Beginning with this theory the story has been attacked, or written in the interests of a prejudice. Meanwhile evidence has been upon the march. The old theories of matter have now been abandoned. Quite new conceptions have been formed. Psychical science has opened up many mysteries of our human personality, and shown by experiment that man is not a prisoner in an iron cage made of ponderable matter. The discovery of radio activity has changed the whole material outlook, as the findings of psychical science have changed the whole spiritual outlook so much that Mr. F. W. H. Myers felt safe in predicting that within 100 years mankind would believe in the resurrection of Jesus on scientific as well as spiritual grounds. Today we may ask with increased confidence the question St. Paul put to King Agrippa, "Why should we be thought a thing incredible that God should raise the dead?"

The Resurrection a Fact and a Gospel

In the light of advancing knowledge the burden of proof is upon the unbeliever. The hour has come when unbelief must justify itself—a thing it has never yet done—stand down. We can no longer talk of the "incredible." The word belongs to the vocabulary of primary and not advanced knowledge. When Jules Verne published his romance of the submarine, everybody said it was incredible. Today, unhappily, it is part of the equipment of our age. Had a prophet, half a century ago or less, spoken of wireless aircraft and half a score more of our modern miracles he would have been met with the cry "incredible." Advancing understanding of the forces of nature has changed the incredible into the commonplace. The resurrection of Jesus, "incredible" to Victorian rationalism, is now coming within the focus of the same line operation, which in other aspects forces its modern miracles upon our notice. For it must be remembered that the resurrection is attributed by the apostles to the Divine Energy; the application of a higher law. Jesus was "raised by the power of God." He was "declared to be the Son of God with power, when he was raised from the dead." The resurrection ceases to be "incredible" when it is understood to be due to the Divine Power. Viewed morally, it would be incredible if Jesus had not been raised. He, the perfect and pure human Person, was cut off at an early age from the malice and sin of man. Is that to be the final end of virtue such as his? Has supreme goodness no rights of survival? It is incredible that in a moral universe the word should remain with wickedness. That would mean the dominance of devilry in a system of things which was moving on towards perfection. Of two things one must be admitted: either there is no morality, no justice, no truth in the universe; or Jesus, who was the embodiment of all goodness, triumphantly overcame the stroke directed against him. There is no third thing. We must choose between the two. The resurrection of Jesus is a fact of history; it is also a gospel. It proclaims for man the victory of life. It demonstrates it upon a plane where we can appreciate it. We may now be sure that we are not under the tyranny of matter; we have the liberty of the spirit. Hence we offer to Christ our worship and we place in him our confidence.

The resurrection is also a great illumination. It is a revelation of the future life, in so far as we need to know it while we are here below. It is impossible to avoid asking questions about that life. Will personality remain intact? Shall we be clad in bodies, and what kind of bodies? What occupations will absorb us there? Shall we be reunited to our true friends? What conditions of spiritual progress prevail there? Is the door between this life and that "bolted, barred and banged," or is communication possible or permitted between the departed and ourselves? We cannot avoid these and similar questions. In the resurrection life of Jesus certain of these questions are answered. St. Paul speaks of Christ as "the first fruits of them that are asleep" (1 Cor. 15:20). The first ripe fruit is the type for the rest of the crop. Our Lord, divine as he is, remains the representative man and "the representative Christian." His resurrection is not only the pledge, it is also the pattern of our own. Employing St. Paul's illustration of the "first fruits," what can we learn about the nature of the life beyond? In what way are our questions answered?

The Continuance of Personality

First of all we have light upon the continuance of personality. Death made no difference whatever to the soul of Jesus. He remained the same person on the other side of death as on this. He "manifested" himself to his old friends, called them by their old names ("Mary," "Simon"), resumed his old discourses (Luke 24), continued his old interests, promised his perpetual presence with them, inspired them for their future work and then, having reached the limit of material "manifestation," retired permanently into that superior world in order to perfect his work of redemption. He remains the great High Priest and continues to "save to the uttermost all that come unto God by him." This is the common faith of Christendom. But it carries with it a revelation regarding ourselves. "Because he lives, we shall live also," and as he lives. Our personality also will not be broken by death. We remain personal beings there as here. We take with us all the treasures of the soul which here below we have accumulated. We shall not forget those to whom we have been united by the bonds of spiritual affinity. Whatever divine service we have commenced on this side will be completed yonder. We do not enter a world of "ineffable idleness," but a world where love and service reign. Good men and bad men alike, in their respective spheres, will have at least one thing in common; they will retain their personality whatever quality it be. Dives will no more forget his brethren and his earth life than did the blessed Lord himself. But what a difference in the memory! Here we have light upon that tormenting question of recognition in the life beyond. Shall we know each other again and resume the old relationships? The question cannot be answered with a simple yes or no. Some persons do not desire any resumption of the old relationships. The bonds which bound them to their kith and kin or to their partners in life were blood bonds or conventional bonds only and their continuance is not desired. Our human relationships have two sides: material and spiritual. The first we share with the animal creation, and these always tend to loosen, finally dissolving in death. If the bonds which attach us to our fellows belong only to this order, they end with the material phase of life; there is no spiritual permanence in them. Spiritual attachments belong to another order. They are based upon the law of affinity. They can never be forced upon us by the accident of birth or partnership; they result from choice. Brothers and sisters of the flesh ought naturally to be joined to each other by the higher ties of the spirit. But frequently these ties are lacking, and persons are driven to seek the brothers and sisters of their spirit in other men and women, who, unrelated to them by blood, are one with them in the higher life. When these spiritual affinities find their root in God, they become immortal, because they are united to the eternal love. When, therefore, we ask the question, "Shall we know each other there?" we can answer only in terms of affinities. The spirits that are one with each other and one in God can never be severed. Neither time nor form can make any difference to the quick perception of the spirit. We shall most certainly be reunited to all who are one with us in the deepest things. If we desire reunion then we must forge the spiritual bonds, or there will happen yonder what happens here—we shall seek those only who are our spiritual kin. It is to this practical business that we should set ourselves. Only thus will our anxieties disappear. Jesus has said the final word upon this matter when he declared that in that world "they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels." Spiritual affinities alone guarantee reunion and recognition beyond.

We have light also upon the question of communion with the departed. One of the articles of the "Credo" is "I believe in the communion of saints;" an article which is vigorously disbelieved as it is piously repeated. The entire attitude of many Christians toward their "dead" is a convincing proof that they do not believe in the communion of saints. The departed are put out of their minds, or the place where their bodies lie becomes a shrine, as if their souls were under the sod, or the trappings of mourning are displayed in quite a pagan manner. The departed are entirely shut off from them as if they did not exist. Is this what the resurrection of Jesus leads us to conclude as the right attitude to adopt? Those first resurrection manifestations were typical as well as personal. They tell us that Christ and Christ's people are not barred from our earth life, nor we from their life. The communion the disciples had with Christ was continued after he had passed over. The communion we have had with our loved ones may be continued. Our dead are not in the cemetery; they are alive and close to us—nearer than we imagine. Between them and us may there not be mutual thought? Can they forget us? Ought we to forget them? To forget, on either side, would seem heartless. Two friends, in loving union with each other, but resident 10,000 miles apart from each other, do not cease to commune with each other because their bodies are not in contact. Distance makes little difference to communion on earth; why should it cease when one is removed beyond the veil?

Finally there should be mutual comradeship. Amongst the "ministering spirits sent forth to do service for those who shall inherit salvation" (Heb. 1:14), who shall say that some we have known are not included? In any case Holy Scripture teaches that we are helped by those who serve on the other side. And may we not help them too? Whatever we may think of this phase of the subject, we ought to restore for ourselves and others the precious truth of the real communion of saints and not leave it to be defiled and disfigured at the hands of necromancers.

The resurrection of Jesus throws light also upon the nature of the spiritual body. It is an ancient question, and a natural one, "With what body do they come?" In our present life upon earth our spirits are clothed in a material body, the elements of which are drawn from the soil and the air. The fate of this body is well known. When, in its final earthly form, it is worn out; or when by accident it becomes uninhabitable for the spirit, the particles which compose it are disintegrated and disappear.

They pass into other chemical forms, but as human abode their mission is forever ended. Those decayed remnant will never be revived. "Flesh and blood doth not inherit the kingdom of God, nor doth corruption inherit incorruption." Yet it is clear that there is some relation between the body that is and that which is to be. To us St. Paul's illustration of the grain and the harvest, the buried seed never reappears in its old form, but there within it a principle of life which is capable of creating a new form. What the relation is no man can tell; we must always remember our ignorance. But it is rational to believe that life which has woven an organization fit for our earthly home, is equal to the task of weaving another body fitted for our spiritual home. That is the position assumed by the New Testament writers. "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body." "We shall not be unclothed, but clothed upon." The connection between spirit and body is permanent in principle. As on this physical plane a material body is absolutely necessary for the expression of our spiritual personality, so on the spiritual plane a spiritual body will be necessary for its corresponding expression. And in the resurrection body of Jesus Christ we have a type of what our own spiritual bodies will be. "We wait for a Saviour . . . who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory" (Phil. 3:21).

What then can we learn from a contemplation of the risen body of Christ? First, that it was not a revival of the old matter, but a transformation of it. That body belonged to a superior order. The transformation was rapidly effected in his case. It was the same, yet not the same. There were upon it marks of identification, yet it was entirely freed from material laws. Matter presented no obstacle to its free movements. It could pass through closed doors, and travel at a rapid rate. It could "manifest" itself upon certain occasions, but it did not remain visible for long. It appeared, disappeared and reappeared during the great forty days. Jesus was moving "along the borderland of two worlds," until what Dr. Newman Smythe calls the "limits of spiritual manifestation" had been reached, and thenceforward Jesus ceased to be seen of mortal eyes. The disciples, on their part, were unable to respond to further and higher manifestations. But the evidence had been given, and it was overwhelming, that the Lord was really alive. Rationalism disbelieves the story of our Lord's appearances, or reduces them to the level of merely subjective visions. Psychological research, however, has rendered credible for all whose minds are not sealed by inveterate prejudice, the truth of the gospel story. In very truth it has established the word of Paul, that Jesus in his resurrection life became the "first fruits," and the type of the life immortal as spirit embodied. Details are hidden from us, but the general truth is clear. The power that wrought in Christ will work also in us—"we shall be like him." There is a practical side as well as an illuminative one in this great truth. In the light of what we shall be, we are called to order our present life. The Bible places great emphasis upon the discipline of the body, not simply because it is a vehicle for the spirit here below, but because of its mystic connection with the spiritual body which even now is being woven by us. As men carry wounds and scars upon their physical bodies, so they may carry scars upon their spiritual bodies. If we believe in our "type" as set forth in the risen body of Christ, then we are under obligation to discipline our entire nature, body included, so that we may be worthy temples of the Holy Ghost. But disciplined or not we shall pass hence, and it all depends upon us whether our spiritual body will reflect the shame of our sin or the glory of a spirit made pure by the one Redeemer.

Throwing Away Our Greatest Asset

"Life is ever Lord of death, and Love can never lose its own."

BY ROBERT GORDON

SOIL is man's most valuable asset, says H. H. Bennett of the United States department of agriculture, in the February issue of the Scientific American. From it we must derive the bulk of our food for all time. Yet we are heedlessly throwing it away. It has been shown by actual measurement that within twenty-four years, erosion has moved seven inches from the surface of an important part of Missouri land. In a single county an area of 100,000 acres, formerly rated as excellent for farming purposes, was classed by a recent survey as "rough, gullied and unfit for anything but scant grazing and timber. Millions of acres thus are threatened. Mr. Bennett writes, "It is the personal duty of every citizen who can think beyond the absolute needs of the moment to take an active part in safeguarding our soil from this fearful, unrestrained erosion."

With that we agree and shall do what in us lies to preserve for future generations this great, good gift of God our fruitful American soil. But there is hereby suggested to our mind a situation more serious and a need still more urgent. Doubtless Mr. Bennett himself would assent to our greatest asset is, after all, not the dirt on the hillsides but rather that "supersubstantial" soil in which spiritual life itself is rooted. That sense of the reality of an eternal order within the veil is a sacred soil which must be preserved if that bread is to be provided by which the souls of men are sustained. By neglect great areas have been wasted. Yet many are so unconcerned that we can truthfully say they are literally throwing away our supreme treasure. What think ye of that man who spends six days in the fields and on the seventh leads out his boys to continue the same, "making hay while the sun shines", leaving not an hour in which to gather a few stalks of golden grain from the fertile valleys of God's Book? Or where do you classify that business man who, being his own master, spends six days in the whirl of commercial and social affairs and the seventh on the highways in a whirl of it, while months slip by without an hour for public worship? Or what have you to say for that student whose ritual Saturday-night frivolity leaves him so exhausted that on Sunday morning that all he has mind or strength for is the comic strip and breakfast served in bed? Or what shall we say of a whole civilization so steeped in a materialistic spirit that even in the sanctuary the eternal gospel is commended because "it pays"? I saw a group stand in breathless awe before the amazing wonder of a new Pierce-Arrow and then heedlessly and hilariously slip through portals whence issued strains of "Holy, holy, holy!"

Man Is of the Skies

There are values greater far than any dealt in by the real-estate agent or the banker. Indeed, if we would understand this earth at all we must know more of heaven. Things are viewed in their true perspective only when seen against the background of the immutable and eternal. Regardless of the price-tags in Vanity Fair and despite all the prudent counsels of Mr. Worldly Wiseman, we maintain that the supernatural and spiritual are our supreme concern, for in his true essence man is not of the earth but of the skies. As real as the waves that wash our shores, are those mysterious, invisible waves of force that make our compass needle trembling toward the north and make us sure of that better country beyond our sense horizon.

Crowded we may be in the poor cabin of our life, with scarce elbow-room, yet, as Sperry reminds us, every ship carries three flags. On the main mast is the house flag of the line, at the stern rail the flag of the port of hail, and at the fore peak flies the flag of the land toward which her prow is set. Oh mariner on life's sea, what dost thou signal back when passing ships inquire, "Whence and whither bound?" We may not know much of the "scenery and the circumstance" of those mysterious shores, but to sustain our souls we must know something of the coasts of life, "that outer Infinite which unweaned babies smile at in their sleep when wondered at for smiling."

What an appeal in all this for the glorious Easter message! "Start a woodlot," Bennett says, "or at least lay down a stretch of sod." We can each do something to lessen the fearful erosion of that soil that signifies so much. Christianity is still a reasonable faith. No problem has arisen that need cause any man to cast away his hope in Christ. On the contrary there are new voices speaking with a new authority bidding him believe. If any have been frightened by discovery of the dependence of the soul upon the body, let them know the reverse has now been made equally clear. The soul has power over the body. A stroke of sorrow may blight the body or a cup of joy rejuvenate it. Materialism itself has been discredited in the house of its friends. Matter was dissolved into molecules, then atoms, and now electrons. "The atoms in a drop of water," says Sir Oliver Lodge, "outnumber the drops in the Atlantic ocean; while electrons are about a thousand million million times smaller than atoms". These tiny bits of negative electricity circling about specks of positive electricity like stars in their infinitesimal spheres have been called "strains in the ether". And what is the ether? "We do not know but it is not matter". So science slips into philosophy. And the eminent scientist, Haldane, writes, "The material world which has been taken for a world of blind mechanism is in reality the spiritual world seen very partially and imperfectly. The only real world is the spiritual!"

The Parables of Nature

Perhaps more will be reassured by the simpler lessons from analogy. Jesus found parables everywhere in nature. The fields that have slept in seeming death all winter will one of these days burst into life and beauty. All have witnessed miraculous metamorphoses. The tadpole becomes the frog; the caterpillar dances in the sun, an animated flower. The caddice-larvae leaves its mummy-like encasement at the bottom of the stream to rise through the water, shake the dust from its wings, and fly through the upper air of a new world. We have seen the waterfowl athwart the sky in the long flight from pole to pole. They fly expectant and are not disappointed. Men, too, especially at their noblest, hope for a better country. Shall the instincts of the birds be proved more trustworthy than the instincts of men?

"Thou wilt not leave us in the dust,

Thou madest man, he knows not why;

He thinks he was not made to die;

And thou hast made him, thou art just."

But better than any arguments are the unanswerable Easter anthems. No melodies more surely uplift the human heart. "I have heard the mavis singing his love song in the morn." I have heard the skylark pour from the clouds a flood of harmony upon the world. I heard four French singers defy the might of Germany in the stirring tones of the Marseillaise. I heard in Notre Dame two great choirs sing until antiphonal responses echoing and reechoing through far-stretching aisles and lofty arches made that vast sanctuary seem almost an anteroom of heaven. But more impressive and inspiring than all that was the Hallelujah Chorus sung in Paris on the first Easter after the armistice by the choir of the Church of England. Men were there from every land. Their uniforms still bore the stains of battlefields. The vision of countless graves was in their eyes. They stood amid the ruins of a continent. And then, while trumpets seemed to sound from the hidden battlements of eternity, we heard that wonderful assurance, "He shall reign forever and ever and ever Hallelujah!"

Sir Max Maspratt, the English chemist, declares, "The greatest danger threatening civilization is materialism. Bennett in that recent article writes, "Even hillside terrace of scrub growth and weeds will prevent ruinous washir of the soil." We may not be able to plant a forest, but ar of us can set out a scrub-growth terrace and safeguard little area against unbelief's erosion. We may live so umphantly as to persuade men of the truth to flesh ar sense unknown, "That Life is ever Lord of Death, ar Love can never lose its own!"

The Resurrection an Attainment

AN EASTER SERMON BY THE EDITOR

That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, becoming conformed unto his death; if by any means I may attain unto the resurrection from the dead.—Phil. 3:10-11.

THE antecedent of the text is found farther back in the chapter. Paul is presenting his balance sheet to the Philippians in which he shows on one side the loss of all earthly advantages and on the other the profit of having Christ. Going back to the eighth verse we catch the connection: "Yea verily, I count all things to be loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord; for whom I have suffered the loss of all things and do count them but refuse, that I may gain Christ, and be found in him, not having a righteousness of mine own, even that which is of the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is from God by faith; that I may know him—" There is so much in this whole passage that a volume would be necessary to do it justice. But this much may be said by way of paraphrasing the thought of the apostle: the vital, personal, practical knowledge of Christ is worth more than everything else because that real and intimate fellowship brings all that really enriches life; viz., Christian integrity and personal immortality.

What is Meant by Attaining Immortality?

In another place Paul says, "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 6:23). Now if eternal life is a gift—a free gift of God, as the Revised Version puts it, how can it also be an attainment? The contradiction is apparent only because all the gifts of God rest upon conditions. Therefore immortality rests upon conditions, and Paul states the conditions with great force and clearness. The resurrection from the dead means personal immortality in the highest sense. It means life expressed through a glorified body, life enriched by all that Jesus enjoyed after his resurrection, life free from the limitations of mortal existence, life triumphant over all the power of sin, disease and death. That and probably more Paul had in mind when he said, "If by any means I may attain unto the resurrection from the dead."

Immortality is an attainment because it is the extension of a spiritual life begun here and continued hereafter. But it should never be forgotten that the one who would participate in immortality must live the immortal life here. Immortality is not a gift which can be bestowed apart from a man's moral state. That is the reason Paul places righteousness before resurrection. His first great aim is to be found in Christ with Christ's own vital righteousness making his life beautiful and luminous, because only in this way can he share the resurrection of Christ. There is no other spiritual alchemy by which this mortal can put on immortality, no other way by which this corruption can put on incorruption. There is a false notion in the minds of many people about death. They seem to think that when the body is cast aside at death the spirit will blossom out into beauty and immortality regardless of the kind of life one lived while in the body. This is to make the body the cause of evil, whereas the body is in large part only the instrument of evil; to invest death with powers of regeneration which it does not possess; to assume that God bestows the gift of eternal life upon those who die without regard to moral and spiritual condition. Immortality is an attainment in the very definite sense that we must live the eternal life here if we are to participate in the resurrection hereafter.

A young man cannot enter college without the attainments necessary to college entrance. A man was converted when he was eighteen years old. His early education had been neglected. Shortly after his conversion there was born within him the strong desire to become a minister of the gospel. He went to the principal of the academy, told his desire and asked to be taken into the school. But the principal soon learned that the young man could not enter because of lack of the necessary preparation. So he put him in the fifth grade of a public school. When he finally entered the academy his burning desire was to attain unto the freshman class in the university, and by and by he was ready for the university which he entered and from which he graduated in due time. There was no royal road to learning for him. His education was the gift of friends and education who had endowed the schools to which he went but he had to make use of the gift by hard work and close application or he never would have participated in the graduation exercises of the senior class in the university. So is it with the resurrection from the dead. Life, eternal life, is the gift of God, but we must use the gift by participating through the sufferings of Christ, by engaging in the service of Christ and by cultivating the spirit of Christ if we are to share in the resurrection of Christ.

How is Immortality Attained?

Paul tells us that we attain unto immortality by knowledge. "That I may know him . . . if by any means I may attain unto the resurrection from the dead." This knowledge is not theoretical and academic knowledge about Christ. It is possible for a man to know all the facts about the life of Christ and all the philosophies which have grown out of the facts, and yet never attain unto the resurrection from the dead. Take the one word often applied to Jesus—Saviour, but the only man who knows the reality involved in that word is the man whom Je as actually saved. Another man may know far more about the word literally and historically and be able to define it in all its various meanings and applications; but if he does not know Jesus as Saviour by experience, he does not know the reality of which the word is but a symbol.

Paul does not leave us in doubt as to what he means by knowing Christ. He analyzes his thought for us. His knowledge of Christ involves knowing the power of his resurrection. There are several elements of power in the resurrection of Christ. There is the power of evidence for Christ's deity. (See Rom. 1:4.) Then there is the element of the power of the revelation of immortality. (See 1 Cor. 15.) But the thought Paul had in mind in his text was more personal and practical than these. His desire was to know the actual power of Christ's resurrection in his own life as he battled for victory with temptation, as he met opposition from the enemies of the cross of Christ, with patience and tolerance, as he suffered the pain of the thorn in his flesh with joyful resignation, as he languished in a Roman prison and faced death without fear. He remembered how Christ was raised up from the dead on the third day in spite of all the powers of evil that strove to hold him in the tomb. It was for the actual experience of the power that lifted Christ out of the grave that Paul yearned as he wrote these words, "That I may know him and the power of his resurrection."

This experience of the power of Christ's resurrection in daily life is inseparable from the fellowship of his sufferings. Paul experienced the sufferings of Christ. Nearly everything that Christ suffered Paul suffered. The second and third chapters of Philippians should be placed in parallel columns. I do not make Paul another Christ. Not for a moment. The sacrifice of Christ stands alone and the cross of Christ is supreme as the symbol of salvation provided by the grace of God for sinful mankind. There is no other name given under heaven or among men whereby we can be saved. But as the moon reflects the sunlight so Paul reflected the sufferings of Christ in his own life.

What do we know about the sufferings of Christ by real experience? What have we given up for Christ? Have we ever gone hungry and thirsty that others might be fed? Have we ever been persecuted? Have we ever been homeless? Have we ever been buffeted, spat upon, reviled and ridiculed? What do we know of Gethsemane? Have we ever fallen faint under the cross we were too exhausted to carry? Can we say in any true sense of experience that we are crucified with Christ?

If we do not have fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, being daily conformed unto his death, how can we expect to attain unto the resurrection from the dead? Unless the cross is taken up into our own lives daily I see no hope of immortality for us. I know of no other means by which we can attain unto a resurrection from among the dead.

An Affirmation of Faith

BY MARGARET E. BURTON

I BELIEVE that man has a transient body and an eternal soul.

I believe in the brevity of death, and in the endlessness of life.

I believe that the risen Christ is the visible witness to the sublime truth that the grave has no victory and death no sting.

I believe that immortality becomes a necessity to any man who seriously sets himself to become like Jesus.

I believe that immortality is something to be lived rather than something to be proved.

I believe that love is the life of all that lives, and that love reached perfect deathless bloom in the beauty of Jesus' life.

I believe that the life everlasting flows from the Fatherhood of God as the stream from the spring.

I believe that He whose mercies are new every morning and fresh every evening; who brings into every epoch of my life a new surprise, and makes in every experience a new disclosure of his love; who sweetens gladness with gratitude and sorrow with comfort; who makes every year better than the year preceding and every new experience an evidence of his skill in gift-giving, has for me a future of glad surprise, which I would not forecast if I could.

I believe that for us there waits a life in God, in which his children shall attain their Christlike selves in Christlike fellowship, with one another and with him, their Father.

I believe that the universe is God's house, that this world is not the only habitat of the living, but that in his house are many rooms.

I believe that death is only pushing aside the portiere and passing from one room to another;

that Paradise is not a distant country, but only the Other Room.

I believe that life is continuous; that there is not a sleep and a future awakening; that there is not a shadowland from which, by and by, the spirits will be summoned, but that life goes on without a single break.

I believe that death is a glad awakening from the troubled sleep which we call life; an emancipation from a world which, beautiful though it be, is still a land of captivity; a graduation from this primary department into some higher rank in the hierarchy of learning.

I believe that the dead possess a more splendid equipment for a larger life of divine service than was possible to them on earth—a life in which I shall in due time join them if I am counted worthy of their fellowship in the life eternal.

I believe that Life is ever Lord of Death, and Love can never lose its own.

I believe that death sets powers free, so that our blessed dead continue to be in our presence and companionship more than ever before; that they can serve us better, be closer to us, than when they were in the flesh.

I believe that the final test and witness of spiritual force is seen in the ability to cast the bodily life away and yet continue to give help and courage and wisdom to those who see us no longer; to be, like Christ, the helper of men's souls even from beyond the grave.

I believe in holding daily life under the quiet light of eternity, and in pasturing our thoughts in the amazing love of God. (Compiled from quotations from Hugh Elmer Brown, Lyman Abbott, Henry Sloane Coffin, Charles Brent and Phillips Brooks, in "The Star-Promise," Woman's Press, New York.)

The Devotional Life

The Veil as Gossamer

"Jesus saith unto her, Mary"—John 20:16

BY NORMAN MACLEAN

IT is on Jesus that our eyes are this day fixed. He comes back from the valley of shadows and lo! he is still the same.

He Lives

What changes he underwent we know not. That he came back cannot be doubted. Indeed I do not see how it could be otherwise. . . . Death could not hold such an one. . . . And as he stands confronting Mary, saying, "Whom seekest thou?" and we hear him say "Mary!" there comes the overwhelming impression that he is still alive: that he still gives life and power and inspiration. "My Master" . . . And nineteen centuries have verified it so.

"Touch me not" is his admonition as Mary in rapture tries to clasp his feet. . . .

There is an intellectual arrogance which would tabulate the attributes of God as an entomologist would analyse an insect. . . . The mystery of life! Let us never approach the Eternal with the easy familiarity of greeting an acquaintance! . . . The old familiar intercourse is ended. It cannot be renewed. She must know him henceforth as soul holding converse with soul. His presence must henceforth be to her as the undying Spirit. . . .

Individuals

We come back to it: that dear name, Mary. As we hear it we feel that the veil separating the seen from the unseen has become thin as a web dew-woven. We know ourselves to be individual hearts, dear as if none existed but just we. It might well make us wonder that Jesus could have gone through all that, and that he should come back with the familiar name of a once neurotic woman on his lips: Mary!

It is so also on this Easter day. We believe that Jesus is with his people everywhere today: for the Spirit of Jesus is just the Spirit of God, and God is everywhere. . . .

But we think of God as beholding us in the mass: as looking on this congregation and seeing a thousand people as one sees a crowd. Not so. It is not in the mass that God sees us, but as separate individuals, each of us more valuable than all the treasures of Golconda—for each is a separate entity with none other like us. Just as Jesus sees the one woman and says, "Mary" with infinite love: so God sees each separate heart and knows all about us. He knows how Mary sitting over there has to help an ailing mother, sacrificing the pleasures of life she longs for, at times with rebellious tears.

The Knowing Heart

He knows. And all about Jean and the wages she gets, and how much of it she spends on her dress and on her amusements, and how little she gives her struggling parents. He knows. And about John who goes about the city with a rebellious heart looking for work and finding none, with care so black on his brow that he sometimes says: "There is no God, or if there is, he doesn't care!" And about Peter who is in the far country, but has come by force of habit to the church today away from the swine troughs . . . to sing the old hymns. He knows. And about Andrew who has read up a little second-hand knowledge and who will tell you that God is a myth and immortality a fable . . . for he himself has proved it! The universe is to a worm only what the worm can make of it. And the heart of the All Father has a special tenderness for the little worms who prove to each other that the clod in which they wriggle is all the universe there is. And about John Smith and his wife who have come to church on Easter day, with an ache in the heart, thinking of the sons who once sat beside them drinking the chalice of the grapes of God, and who will never more return nor see their native country!

Ye Shall Live Also

Each separately God sees and God knows all about, and God yearns over, and to each he says: "As I live, ye my children shall live also. Death can have no dominion over you. Peace be unto you."

Called by Name

Oh, to hear it now deep in our hearts! "Mary." Listen! There's your own very name whispered in your ear . . . Mary . . . Jean . . . George . . . "Seek me who turn the shadow of death into morning! The Lord is my name." . . . As we kneel and adore, truly the veil between us and the dead becomes thin as gossamer.

Meeting Helps" on C. L. P. Topics for April 18

Note: All references hereafter made in these "Meeting Helps" will be to the following books; "Modern Discipleship and What It Means" by Woods; "Twelve Tests of Character" by Fosdick; "The Man Nobody Knows" by Barton; "Gates and Keys Bible Books" by Robinson; "How We Got Our Bible" by Smyth; "A Short History of the Christian Church" by Moncrief; "Peasant Pioneers" by Miller; "God's Dynasty" by Lerrigo. The books may be had from the American Baptist Publication Society. A few others may be added later.

* * *

Every Baptist pastor has at least one book which gives something about Baptist teachings and beliefs. More than likely "A Restatement of Baptist Principles" by Jones, may be found on most bookshelves. If you will ask your pastor, therefore, for some such book, he will be glad to let you take it for your meeting. Get in mind very definitely that these beliefs are.

In order to present the lesson in an interesting way, it will be necessary to do a little work. You will probably be able to borrow a child's coaster wagon from one of your neighbors if you do not have one in your family. Out of heavy wire (which may be had at any hardware store) make an arch over the top of the wagon, similar to the supports on a prairie schooner. Perhaps it will be best to have one of these wire arches at the front, back and in the middle, in order to keep the cloth with which it is to be covered from falling in. The cloth may be any white material—bleached muslin—or, in extraordinary cases, even paper would do. Whatever material is used should be tacked down with thumb tacks.

Then make some "milestones" out of cardboard or wood, covered with white paper. Each one of these should bear the names of some outstanding Baptist principle, these principles being as follows: Soul's Direct Relation to God, With the Key to the Kingdom, Christ's Supreme Headship, Church a Spiritual Democracy, Symbolism of Ordinances, Obedience to Christ, Severance of Church and State, Individual Freedom, Give the Binding Factor, Church's Supreme End.

These "milestones" should be placed along the front of the meeting room, either tacked up on the wall or standing on the floor. During meeting, the "covered wagon" as prepared above may be placed at one end of the room. As each member of the group tells about a principle, he may take the "covered wagon" to the "milestone" about which he is telling, explaining at the same time that the Baptists were the pioneers in each of these principles. After the last "milestone" is reached, the leader may explain that the Baptist principles have been established, and while there is no pioneering in the way of general principles, the Baptists are still pioneering in other ways, these ways being discussed later in the year.

This may be a good time to introduce the young people's convention at Los Angeles, since the keynote is "Adventure for Christ" and the song "Lead on, O King Eternal."

Whither?

"Youth—flaming, equipped, willing—will lead the world—but whither?"

That is what the leaders of youth want to determine. They have agreed that what they would put into the North America of tomorrow they must put into the youth of today. By determining where youth is headed with the world, the leaders may plan more adequately for the deflecting of the path into the right way, should it be in the wrong. They may know, then, just what is needed in the lives of youth to make tomorrow's North America better than today's. They will be more conversant with the desires, and will, therefore, be able to shape their programs accordingly.

So one thousand youthful representatives of Christian America are wanted on April 16, 17 and 18, in Birmingham, Ala., at the Young People's Conference. Thirty-five denominations and fifty-four state and provincial organizations are united to be represented.

At this conference, the youthful representatives will learn of the best road of life along which the world might be lead. Inspirational addresses will challenge them to do their best in leading the world aright. In the conference and discussion periods, they will voice their opinions, discuss questions of importance and have their thoughts directed along lines of a Christian solution of these problems.

Such topics will be discussed as "Christian Citizenship and the Family," "Christian Citizenship and the Nations," "Christian Citizenship and the Churches," "Christian Citizenship and the Social Problems," "Christian Citizenship and the Races." Questions which have been raised before by various youth groups will be brought up for discussion and consideration at this conference: Should the United States have joined the World Court? Is war ever justifiable? What are the faults of the church and how can they be remedied? How can youth help the churches work together?

Some of the nation's greatest leaders with a message for youth will be on the program. Mrs. E. A. Overton, a member of the faculty of the Chicago Training School; E. D. Soper, vice president of Duke University; Harry Holmes, field secretary of the World Alliance of International Friendship through the Churches; Will W. Alexander, director of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation; Stanley High, assistant secretary of foreign missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and Howard McCluskey, a faculty member of Michigan University; these are to be the leaders who will help direct the thought of those present at this conference.

What the young people present at the conference give as their opinion on the matters brought up for discussion, will help determine what the future programs for young people will contain. Do you want to help?

A quota of representatives for the Baptist young people of the Northern Baptist Convention has been set. Shall we not have representation? Any one who finds it possible to go to Birmingham April 16, 17 and 18, should write to headquarters office about it. (Yes, they are at the same address as THE BAPTIST.) You will then get further details about credentials.

But there is one way in which we can all help, whether we are there in person or not. That is by praying that these youth may be guided into the right paths; that our present-day leaders may be helped in their task of preparing the young people; and that our world may be bettered by what is done at that conference. You'll help

"Our union had the best social affair in its history on Friday evening, Mar. 5, when we put on the 'Fact party.' It was a successful evening throughout. Two weeks and a half were used in preparation for it. One innovation was the 'eats'—served cafeteria style—Sustaining Facts (sandwiches), Cold Facts (Eskimo Pie), Stimulating Facts (Coffee). We have our copies of 'Money Talks' and expect soon to present it."

The Chimney Corner

The Easter Note*

By THOMAS JEFFERSON VILLERS

ONE memorable Sunday morning, I left my hotel in Jerusalem, followed the road along the city's northern wall, and ascended Mount Calvary. Seated there in the sunshine, I was reading the account of our Lord's crucifixion, when the bells in the Church of the Redeemer began to ring, calling people to worship the crucified and risen Christ. It was an experience never to be forgotten.

When the chiming had ceased, I walked reverently down the western slope to a garden, in which a sepulcher hewn out of solid limestone is located. It is the only rock tomb in that vicinity. It is plainly a Jewish tomb, and evidently belonged to some wealthy man, like Joseph. It was a new tomb, even yet not finished. It was "nigh at hand," as John tells us. It is the only burial place that answers every requirement of the garden sepulcher.

Across the doorway is hollowed a groove along which the rounded stone was once rolled to close the opening. Cross-pieces inserted by the Crusaders, to make feed-troughs for their horses, are still in place. Stepping inside the tomb, you are confronted with the anointing stone projecting from the farther wall toward the door. Against the wall at the extreme right is a space large enough, if finished, to accommodate two bodies. In the southeast corner a slab is set up between the south wall and the anointing stone; these with the east wall make a complete loculus, or bed for one. At the southern end of this bed a pillow is cut in the rock. Thoughtlessly I stepped over into this loculus and began measuring it, when suddenly it occurred to me that my unhallowed feet were standing where the sacred body of my blessed Lord once lay. Trembling with emotion, I climbed out, and with uplifted face asked forgiveness. Then I read the Easter story, and worshiped.

I had just come from the Tombs of the Kings, across the Nile from Luxor. Far under the mountain I had descended to an immense cubical room, whose blue ceiling glowed with golden stars, and whose approach was ornamented with hieroglyphics of the king's exploits. In the center of this room stood a huge sandstone sarcophagus, enclosing a thick wooden coffin. Within that double enclosure lay the body of Amenophis the Second, who had been lying there shrouded and garlanded for more than 3300 years! With bared head in the Calvary sepulcher, I thanked God not for a royal tomb, but for an empty tomb. Then I thought of Mohammed's grave,

*No long waiting need we know,
While the slow months come and go;
No set Lent observe, if we Make all time our Lent to be;
Not one festal, brief and bright,
But a year, where every morn
Hearts made ready over night
Wake to find an Easter dawn.*

said to be decorated with rubies and sapphires and diamonds to the amount of $10,000,000, but covering still all that is mortal of the prophet; and I thanked God not for a jeweled tomb, but for an empty tomb. The message of the bells lingered with me. I hear them yet, sounding the Easter note.

Sarah Delavan's Easter Hat

By CAMILLA MERRIAM

SARAH DELAVAN started to church at the first call of the bells this Easter morning. She wanted to get there early to see her Easter hat come into church.

All of her life Sarah had wanted something new to wear at Easter time—not because she wanted to "show off," but because she felt the fitness of having her outward appearance to correspond with the surge of joy that always flooded her being at the newness of life all around her in fragrant burgeoning buds, lilting bird notes and white clouds scurrying across a blue, blue sky.

But there had never been anything new for Sarah at Easter time. She had been born a child of poverty; as soon as she was old enough to earn money, her small wage was used for younger sisters' and brothers' clothes and for food and rent and coal. Then she had married and there were her own little ones to provide for. And so the years went by. She was a little piece on the sunset side of the Hill of Life now—and never had she had a thing new for Easter.

Then Charley, the boy who had always seemed to understand her very heart of hearts, sent her a check for twenty-five dollars and with it a letter of love that in itself would make many days bright. The letter ended with: "Every Easter that I remember, mother, you have said something like this, 'It seems like a body ought to wear new clothes at Easter time just because everything else is so shining new. It would make it seem more in keeping with the day. Maybe next year I'll show the way to do it.' Now, I'm making the way for it. You take this twenty-five dollars and buy a hat, don't stint on the hat—get a humdinger that will make up for all the years you didn't have a thing for Easter Sunday that wasn't worn to rags."

All Right!

"As you have all ready been informed adjustment has been made in this matter and we are sure that now everything will be 'allright.'"—Quotation from a business letter.

The letter, however, is not all right as you probably already know. All right is always written as two words. Already, an adverb, is always written as one word and spelled with one "i".

She had intended to do just as Charles had asked her to. She had studied every hat in Brettsville a dozen times. But each time she went to the stores she stopped in at some house or other. There was the Charles place—Mr. Charles didn't have a dress, no really—just a coverall apron. And so of course she wasn't going to Easter services in blue and white apron. Well, twenty-five dollars was too much for a hat anyway—and ten dollars would buy a neat plain dress for Mrs. Charles and she could be going to church in it for many a month.

And then there were the Beckwith twins—staying away from Sunday school because they hadn't shoes. Shoes were dear now—but fifteen dollars was too much for any one woman to spend on a hat—she'd use eight of it for the twin shoes. That left seven dollars for a good hat as any women might wish.

And then she ran across old Mr. Foreman, and he was near to tears because he had broken his glasses and couldn't see a thing without them and hadn't sent to get another pair, and couldn't read a word without them. And then of it a new pair cost $6.75! He'd just come from the opticians—but without the glasses.

"Come along back," said Sarah. "Charley sent me a big check, and I like to get those glasses for you. Did you help to set my Charley's feet on the good road he's now traveling?"

"Well, I suspect I can get a mighty fine little bunch of cotton violets for my old black hat," said Sarah, after Mr. Foreman had gone smiling on his way.

So now on Easter Sunday she sat at her pew, a little, dark wrinkled, bow woman in a greenish black cape and many-year-old hat with a bright bunch of cotton violets tipping over her left ear. And then in walked her Easter hat. There was Mr. Foreman, with his new glasses, a look of rapture on his face for he could see the Easter lilies as well as the next person; and down the outer aisle came Mrs. Charles, shy but beaming with happiness that at last she could come to church properly clothed, and that she had not had to miss Easter morning; and clumping along behind their mother's broad back came the Beckwith twins.

Sarah Delavan beamed on them all.

"Easter gets to be a happier time every year," she said with a sigh of satisfaction.

BOYS and Girls

Dear Miss Applegarth,

I was interested in your subject for March exploring, but I did not have to go far to explore for I live with my grandmother in a hotel, and all the waiters are negroes. They are very kind and good. Ours is very lonely, his home in Virginia and when the hotel orchestra played "Carry me back to Old Virginny" he almost cried. He is studying to be a lawyer some day, and he will make a good one.

Natalie T. Thorne.
(St. Paul)

Dear Miss Applegarth,

I like this exploring idea very much and one of the things I discovered about the negroes was the story of Hannah Tubman who secretly helped slaves to escape to the North through her famous "Underground Road." She helped hundreds of them to find freedom from oppression this way, and I should think all negroes should honor the memory of this fine negro woman who ran such risks to help others. Some time I hope you will have a topic about India, for I have been studying that in school recently. I like all the stories and the children's letters very much.

Very lovingly yours,
Elynor Crouch.
(Washington, D. C.)

Dear Miss Editor,

I am too old to be a boy and girl myself any more, but I am too young not to enjoy your page more than lots of other pages, so I want to tell you a true story, to see if the other "boys and girls" like it. There is a fine sense of justice in the young, I think, until something in life called "money" or "success" or "indifference" squeezes it out. I think you are doing a lot to keep things fresh in all our minds.

Well, this is the story. A beautifully dressed lady got into a car. There was only one empty seat. It was beside a young negro man. But she did not sit down, she kept on standing, and I think she speaks well for the fine type of our Christian chivalry that not another man in us in that car would give that beautifully dressed lady a seat. She deserved to stand, for being such a snob! I was interested to see that his left coat sleeve was empty, and by and by I went over and sit next to him. He used to be in our American army, over seas, and he put that arm to "help make America safe for democracy," as we used to say those mistaken days of 1917-18. He was a fine chap, and has a good job. I am prouder to know him than the white boy, how about you? Your stories are

Dear Boys and Girls,

Mr. Blake's story makes me think of this stirring poem I read this month in the Literary Digest. It was awarded first prize in a poem contest conducted by the Boston Chronicle. Mr. Miller is pastor of St. Mark's church in Boston, and makes me wish every blessed one of us could be black for one week, or even one day, to see how it feels. I am so thrilled at the wonderful new spirit among the youth of this generation, as I see it in our church work and in our Y. W. C. A., where our Girl Reserves specialize in world fellowship, and practice it too. Let's grow up and show the world what big stuff we have in us, you and I—for although I'm quite grown-up, myself, I'm not fixed to the point of staying contentedly with worn-out ideas. Here's the poem—

Wanted: Letters in April!

AND you are, of course, the ones to write them on the new topic "War." Explore the insides of your own nice heads and see what your honest answers are to such questions as: What good can possibly come out of war? What harm does it do? Is it Christian? Why is it wrong? Does it settle anything? Did the last war settle anything satisfactorily? What must God think of it? What must the heathen think of Christians fighting, when they had supposed that the Christian God came to bring "peace on earth, good-will among men?" Write it in your own words; think it out carefully, as if you were trying to convince somebody who needed convincing. Make your own title for it. There will be a book award for the best boy's letter and another book award for the best girl's letter. Mail them by April 20 to

That cannot segregate.

Strong enough your walls to keep me in my place?

Though your partition be as thick as armor plate

It shall not separate me from white thoughts, white feelings,

And the lily white throne of God.

Earth's whitest poets come at my bidding

And sing sweetly to me

Their epics and romances of forgotten ages.

And philosophers with thoughts whiter than snow

Throng my coach

And reason with me of life, death, and eternity.

I laugh at the insolence

Of your wood and steel

Trying to imprison my soul.

Know you not

My soul is a winged thing?

While you ride my body,

I ride winds, stars, and a million suns.

When will altar, sword, nation

Be militant enough

To cast you aside as junk

A growing, robust Freedom discards?

When will college, church, and court

Seal thy eternal doom

As an old world cancer

Eating away the new world's heart?

This may seem a little grown-up to you, but if you will read it over aloud I think you will find that two readings will make quite clear what it all means. It reminds me of the story of the famous Booker Washington who was visiting a wealthy negro lady. She and her husband were cultured, interesting people, and their home was full of the best books and magazines, and furniture in the best of taste. Said Doctor Washington: "Do you travel much—I see you are interested in masterpieces and history?"

Said she: "No, I don't travel." And something in the sadness of her voice made him understand.

Said he, equally sad: "No, we don't travel, do we?"

For a lady of culture and refinement likes to be treated that way wherever she goes; and if you and I can't treat her that way, then she will prefer to stay home in her beautiful house and do her traveling in her own library chair, through a book. I, myself, hate to think of our being so cruel. But you and I can change it. We do change it every single time we overlook the color of a person's face and act in the friendliest fashion to this our brother, or our sister. It is going to revolutionize the world, our growing up to act that way. Do please remember!

Ever hoping to see Baptist boys and girls leading the way, I am

Among Ourselves

West China Letter

By JOE TAYLOR

YESTERDAY and the day before, I spent in attending the annual meeting of the Chengtu Baptist church, Rev. Donald Fay, pastor. It was the first meeting of its kind for the church and was not largely attended; indeed, there were never over twenty-five people in the church building. Most of these were those who are working in the church as helpers or students from our schools at Chengtu with a sprinkling of teachers. A few missionaries were in attendance and were heartily welcome to all the discussions and actions taken.

Very Much Chinese

The church building needs to be seen to be appreciated. It is the "upper room" of a Chinese residence. By knocking out certain partitions and putting in a new board floor we have succeeded in getting a room that will fully accommodate all the worshipers on an ordinary Sunday. At times like Christmas and Easter there may be need of a bigger place of worship; but for all ordinary purposes, for some years to come, the room is big enough. It has paper windows, some of which are opened the year round. In the back of the church is a small garden with a few palms in it where the chickens of the janitor come to scratch during morning service. Between the place of worship and the street, are a number of rooms which are used for various purposes; one section of them has been fitted up as a parsonage; another is used for women's guest rooms, while still another is used for a kindergarten and children's church. As one enters the courtyard from the street, he sees on each side of the passage pictures, mostly taken from the Sunday edition of the New York Times. And usually there are a few people scanning them much interested in the ill-fated Shenandoah or a wrecked railroad train or a flock of aeroplanes. On one side of this passage, there is a door leading into a reading room that has been made out of two or three shops that front on the street. Just a little more of knocking out of partitions; some tables and benches and some daily papers and magazines—and you have a very good bit of social effort on the part of the Chengtu Baptist church. It is all so very Chinese that no one feels strange to the place. I very much hope that even when we can have some money with which to build a new church plant in Chengtu that it will be very much Chinese.

Having had a walk around most of the church property, let us get back to the meetings. At the first gathering, there was a discussion of the "Unequal" treaties, a young Y. W. C. A. secretary giving the history of the main treaties involved. The pastor is enthusiastically in favor of the abolition of them all; but I could not detect any great desire on the part of the audience to follow him. Then we had a brief history of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society and some of the reasons for its being so heavily in debt, and a hint of what was done at the Northern Baptist Convention at Seattle in 1925. It was quite evident to the gathering that there is little if any hope of getting any more funds from America than we are now receiving and that we must find some other source of revenue. Just here the pastor gave his solution: that the church endeavor to become self-supporting by the end of 1936. That he continue to be their pastor, but that he go out and earn his living doing some other work and give such time as he can to his pastoral and pulpit work. This is one way of doing it. Is it the wisest way? Will it succeed in building up strong Christian churches? There certainly is enough work for a full-time pastor at this church.

The Annual Resignation

I wonder if Mr. Fay is copying a certain enthusiastic pastor in New York state in resigning at the annual meeting. Maybe he has read or heard of Doctor Clausen; anyhow he gave in his resignation to the church and then left the room while they decided to elect him as their pastor for another year. When he was called back and told that he had been chosen as their pastor for the next twelve months he agreed to stay for that period. He had a well thought out campaign to offer to the church for the coming year. Among the things he advocated was a greater degree of self-support and he sets a good example in this regard. Another plan was a week-day kindergarten and he would go out and try to get the funds. The mission absolutely declines to underwrite any more new work; so this means that Mr. Fay has to get the funds among his friends in Chengtu. A third plan was a dispensary three days a week with one of the young doctors who will graduate in medicine from the West China Union university in charge. This will cost quite a sum of money and it is not yet apparent how the scheme can be put through. It is a thousand pities that this young pastor has to pull so hard. He is harnessed to a low power church; one that is not rich in this world's goods, and one that has, as yet, caught but a restricted vision of what the church of God can do in a great city like Chengtu.

The hardy annual was brought out in full blossom—increased in salary. One gets used to this in Szechuan. The data that we have been able to gather show that it takes $16 per month for a family of three to live. If the family is large of course there is need of more money. The cost of living is going up almost daily. It is awful to see the condition of a lot of these people in Chengtu. Between sessions, I took a walk through that part of the city for which we Baptists are responsible; and I was hindered every now and then by some of the most loathsome looking beggars that I have seen in Szechuan in twenty odd years. They are a menace to the health of the whole community and a sickening sight. They are in greater numbers just now as we are on the eve of the Chinese New Year. Rice jumps and it always jumps up. Fuel is becoming dearer every year. Vegetables and oil cost more each season. No wonder that the preachers, doctors and teachers who are working in our institutions cry out for more salary. But—and it is a big but—the missionaries cannot find any more. The board cannot grant any more. They are driven back upon their own resources at a time when their native province is being beggared by a set of military robbers. It is heart-breaking to have to live here just now. On every hand calls for further service; doors swung wide open to people friendly; workers coming out of our schools in larger numbers each year; a deeper appreciation of the spiritual import of the gospel of Jesus Christ—an order from headquarters to mark time. Just what the definition of tragedy will depend on the one framing it; but at times one is conscious of being part of spiritual tragedy on the mission field.

Norway

By J. A. OHRN

(The Rev. J. A. Ohrn is the pastor of the Baptist tabernacle in Oslo, and is a leading Baptist figure in the country. He speaks with the fullest knowledge of Baptist conditions in that land.—J. H. Rusbrooke.)

THE Baptists of Norway have won a position of good esteem. They are considered a real factor within religious circles. Formerly they were avoided now they are sought. They are elected into public offices; they are in requisition as speakers in national religious conventions alongside the foremost men of the Established church. The Inner Mission—a home mission society within the Established church—even employs as preachers men baptized as believers. Belief in believers' baptism is more and more making headway. Many people are baptized without joining the Baptists. The heaven is working.

Our opportunities are very bright. The country lies open for us and our work. Our methods have come into use among the Lutherans, and there is—within the established church—a religious movement with which we find it hard to compete because of our limited resources.

Our country is very extensive in the direction north and south. Even if we use the fastest means of travel, a week is required in order to reach from one end to the other, and our work is scattered throughout the whole country. We have twelve small churches north of the Arctic circle. We have a mission and some for deep-sea fishermen close to the North Cape. A missionary and his wife are stationed there. We have an evangelist traveling throughout the whole district—Finmark—with headquarters at Hammerfest. The rest of the country is divided into four districts or areas, each of them with a traveling evangelist. We have a general missionary for the whole country, and a worker among the young people. We have a publication department which is doing excellent work, issuing two periodicals and a considerable amount of other good literature. Twenty thousand copies have been sold of our Christmas number. Our theological seminary with its four-year course, is doing well. It has three instructors and twenty students, there is room for no more.

In Congo Belge we support seven missionaries, and the interest in this mission work is very strong.

What we need is consecrated lives and greater self-sacrifice. We need a thorough-going revival within our ranks and throughout. The whole country needs it and is groaning for it.

Pacific Coast Letter

BY LEONARD W. RILEY

THE friends of Dr. A. M. Petty on the Pacific coast, and they are many, are rejoicing with him over the call of his son, A. Ray Petty, to become pastor of the Grace Temple church of Philadelphia, as successor to Dr. Russell Conwell. Ray Petty is a product of the Pacific coast and but one of many contributions which this western country has made to our leading churches in the east. Though a graduate of Occidental college, he was for a time a student at Linfield college. This call is evidence of the high grade of work Doctor Petty has done during the twelve years of his pastorate of the Judson Memorial Baptist church of New York City. Ray's brother, Dr. C. Wallace Petty, is pastor of the First church of Pittsburgh, Pa. The careers of these sons are sufficient to account for the youthful energy which Dr. A. M. Petty is putting into his work as field secretary of the Home Mission Society. "A wise son maketh a glad father," and two of them are certainly enough to make any father more than twice glad.

Pastoral Changes

The First church of McMinnville, Ore., rejoicing that Rev. W. Everett Henry, of the First church of Yakima, Wash., has accepted a call to become successor of Dr. C. L. Trawin. Doctor Henry is a graduate of Crozer Theological seminary and has already held three notable pastorates on the Pacific coast: at Twin Falls, Idaho; Everett, and Yakima, Wash. He assumed the new relationship at McMinnville the first of April.

The First church of Everett, Wash., has called Rev. H. Robinson McKee, now pastor of the First church of Keokuk, Iowa. Brother McKee is expecting to move to Washington about July 1. He will find a splendid church and a large opportunity in Everett.

Gilman Parker

Friends of Rev. Gilman Parker will be glad to hear that he is still living at Puyallup, Wash., and is still engaged in his quiet way, in evangelistic work, though now in his eighty-first year. Brother Parker has been in the active ministry ever since he was twenty-eight years old. His pastorates cover five states and include such churches as the First, Seattle; Grace, Portland; Alameda and Corning, California. He served six years as executive secretary of the Oregon State Convention and was for three years Sunday-school missionary in Iowa. During his ministry he has baptized more than 1500 candidates. He is now pastor emeritus of the First church of Puyallup, Wash.

News Items

Rev. E. H. Hicks recently conducted a series of meetings with the Bethesda church of Tacoma, Rev. Earl Cochran, pastor, in which twenty were received for membership, with others to follow. The Bethesda church expects to start work on a new building at an early date.

Rev. Daniel Bryant, in connection with his pastorate at Corvallis, Ore., finds time to deliver sermons and addresses in other communities. He recently preached in Eugene and also in Salem and has conducted a special meeting with the struggling church at Lacombe.

The annual banquet of the Baptist young people of Spokane was held, Feb. 26, in the Presbyterian church. Five hundred young people were present. The toastmaster was Rev. Owen T. Day of the Grace church, and the main address of the evening on "The Four-Square Life" was delivered by Doctor J. Newton Garst of the First church.

Rev. A. C. Lathrop of Buhl, Idaho, held a three weeks' meeting recently in which forty-one have made public confession of faith in Christ. Twenty-seven have already united with the Buhl church and two with the Castleford church. Pastor Lathrop's people last year spent $1000 in improving the church building, all of which has been paid for. The Sunday-school attendance has reached the 200 mark and already larger accommodations seem necessary.

Other pastors may find the following series of sermons suggestive: Dr. E. H. Shanks of Salem, Ore., has preached on "The Lessons of Grace," "The Law and His Grace," and "The Triumph of Grace." Dr. W. E. Henry is now in the midst of a series on the general topic, "Opened by Power Divine."—(1) "The Grace in the Garden," (2) "The Eyes of Two Men," (3) "The Old Testament Scriptures," (4) "The Minds of Men," (5) "The Portals of Heaven." On the general topic of "The Menacing Monster—Materialism." Dr. John Newton Garst has, (1) "Hogs or Men," (2) "Pleasure or Contentment," (3) "A Living or a Life," (4) "Fortune or a Soul," (5) "Here or Hereafter."

Rev. Henry Sweetsir Burrage, D.D.

An Appreciation

BY E. C. WHITEMORE

FOR far more than a generation Doctor Burrage was one of the leading Baptists of New England, and none have surpassed him in the range and quality of his work. Of old New England stock—and its spirit dominated his character and all his work—he won a real success in many different lines.

He was a soldier who saw a large amount of active service and rose to the rank of major. His relations to the Loyal Legion and to the old soldiers of the Civil war was honorable and in the true spirit of comradeship. The life which he volunteered for his country in his youth, he used until his death at ninety years in patriotic service.

He was a good minister of Jesus Christ, ordained at Waterville and successful in his pastorate. He was an editor for thirty-two years, making Zion's Advocate a contribution to the thinking and development of the Baptist denomination throughout the country.

He was a historian. For the Maine Historical Society, of which he was a foremost leader, he wrote many carefully prepared monographs, and he gave to the society the impulse of his enthusiasm and the accurate results of his Faith

"EXCEPT my fingers on the nail-prints press,
And I may thrust my hand within
His side,
Still am I skeptic," doubting
Thomas said.

So was he granted all his heart's duress,
Nor any outward evidence denied,
Until he cried, "My Lord!"
with humbled head.

And then the Master's mystic arrow sped;
"So thou believest what thou hast descried?
And findest in thy fingering success?"

There are who see the dawn before the red;
Who drink from brooks that in far mountains hide;
And answer to the unborn historical study. For the Baptists he wrote "The History of the Baptists of Maine," "The History of the Baptists of New England," "The Act of Baptism," and many smaller volumes. His "Baptist Hymn Writers and Their Hymns" brought from a silence of forgetfulness not a few exquisite hymns and restored them to the praises of the church. For several years he has been state historian of Maine, writing such volumes as "Maine at Valley Forge," "Maine at Lewisburg," "The Northeastern Boundary," and editing "War Papers."

For many years also he served on the boards of his denomination; at Colby, where he was the efficient chairman of the committee on art; at Brown, his alma mater; at Newton, ever dear to his heart, and on numberless committees concerned with the real life and progress of his denomination.

He was a discriminating and faithful friend who gave to many of the younger ministers of the state counsel and companionship that they could not find elsewhere. With rare appropriateness, he could say, though he never said it, "I have fought the good fight—I have finished my course—I have kept the faith."

Several weeks ago he was injured in an automobile accident while crossing the street at his home at Kennebunkport. It was not supposed that he could sustain the shock, but day after day went on, and life remained. Almost unconsciously he kept saying, "Isn't it time for the boat to come in? Isn't it time to go aboard?" By strange coincidence, and without any knowledge of Doctor Burrage's words, Doctor Mower in his address at the funeral said: "In the pleasant village of Kennebunkport Doctor Burrage elected to spend the closing years of life. In the long ago many a fine ship was built in this quiet haven. Shipbuilding is most interesting work. The keel is laid. Piece by piece the heavy timbers are put in place. The deck is laid. The masts are set and the rigging and sails are bent, and then, on the full tide, some day the noble ship slips away from its moorings, out of the harbor to the open spaces of the ocean. Farther and farther it recedes from vision till it reaches the place where the blue sky and the ocean seem to meet. And then the noble ship disappears from the range of human vision. We say, 'it has gone.' But it is in the assurance that other eyes will discern its approach as it enters some faraway harbor."

Charles Robert Lamar

By J. SHERMAN WALLACE

AN item in THE BAPTIST, Mar. 6, told of the "death of C. R. Lamar," at Springfield, Ore. It must have been thirty-five years ago when this good man began work in Western Oregon. He came to Lebanon where many of his neighbors from Tennessee had settled nearly a generation before. There was no Baptist church at Lebanon. He began preaching in the town and soon organized a church. He was not a great preacher, but he was a good man, a true friend and an earnest worker for Christ. I remember hearing a woman in after years say, "Lamar can't preach for sour apples," but although she was a life-long Methodist, and a leading worker in the Methodist church of the town, she was frequently seen in the Baptist church listening to Lamar. Well, I am glad she came. She afterwards got a son-in-law out of that Baptist church.

My father with his family lived four miles north of Lebanon in a community still known as "Tennessee." A schoolhouse was near our home, called the "Tennessee school." C. R. Lamar preached in this schoolhouse regularly and occasionally held "protracted meetings" there.

I had been inside a church building once or twice before this and had often heard Methodists preach in schoolhouses, but C. R. Lamar was the first Baptist preacher I ever knew. He often came to our country home where we were wresting our farm from the forest. Under his friendly ministry my father and mother openly confessed faith in Christ as Saviour and I saw Lamar baptize them in the Santiam river near Lebanon. A few years later, during the time of one of these "protracted meetings" in the schoolhouse, I knelt with others at the old recitation bench that stood across the front of the little room, then rose, and in the presence of friends and neighbors, confessed my faith in Jesus Christ as my Saviour and consecrated my life to him as Lord. I was only a country boy, but that night I knew I would be a preacher. Some time later, on a cold winter day while the snow was falling, C. R. Lamar baptized me, with about twenty-five others, in the Santiam River, at the same spot where I had seen him baptize my father and mother a few years before.

Lamar went away from Lebanon, but returned for two or three pastorates there. When I was eighteen I went away to college. At Christmas time of that first year, I preached my first sermon at the Dayton Prairie schoolhouse in Yam Hill county. A few days later I was surprised to receive by mail from the church at Lebanon a license to preach. Lamar had done it. When I returned home for the summer, he encouraged me to preach in the church.

I did not see my old pastor again for more than twenty years. When I learned he had lost his eyesight and must retire from the ministry, I wrote at once to the secretary of the Oregon State Convention, urging that a pension be secured for the disabled veteran. This was promptly done.

Two years ago I was in Oregon for a week. I made a trip to Springfield and late at night, after much effort, I found the humble home of my old friend. He could not see my face, but it was worth going across the continent to know his joy as I tried to tell him of my appreciation of his sacrificial service for me and mine long ago.

C. R. Lamar never received a living salary. I doubt if in those early days he ever received a stated salary. If it was stated, it was probably never paid in full. He took what the people gave him and never complained. He worked not for money, but for the joy of working for the Lord he loved. He was one of the many thousands who have labored gladly and humbly, unknown beyond a very narrow circle, but who have left the world better because they have lived. Now he has received his reward. He has heard his Master's commendation, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Fifty-Fifty

SOME years ago fifty public-spirited citizens founded the Phi Beta Kappa organization to the end that a higher degree of scholarship might be encouraged and recognized. It would be impossible to trace just what of incentive inspiration and actual intellectual achievement has resulted from the establishment of this honorary degree.

Recently another fifty citizens have organized for quite a different purpose and with vastly differing results. This committee of fifty urges us "in the name of patriotism" to join the National Association against the Prohibition Amendment, Inc. The first reason given for joining is: "The association has by far the largest membership of any organization of citizens who are opposed to prohibition." When was it that size of membership became an indication of guarantee of the worth and standing of an organization? Would the American predilection for superlatives betray us into joining any association of sufficiently imposing proportions regardless of its aim and purpose?

The other reasons given for joining the association presuppose that we do not believe in prohibition. Is this supposition justified? Is it not, rather, an insult to our intelligence in view of the testimony coming from the employers of many railroad and factory hands regarding the benefits which have actually resulted from prohibition? Would we deliberately vote to restore to the corner that licensed saloon which constantly beckoned the working-man and extracted from his pocket the money for his family's rent, food, clothing, recreation, even in many instances, life itself? Perhaps the members of congress and United States senators who belong to this committee of fifty think that we would. If we would not, then they should be so informed by personal letters and by the character of our votes when their name are up for re-election. It is time for Christian people to speak in no uncertain terms, and in a language which is readily understood. That language, in the case of public officials, is often the language of votes. This is another reason for our presence at the polls on election day, intelligently prepared for voting.

So long as Baptists think for themselves in determining their stand upon principles at issue; so long as Jesus Christ is our Guide in faith and pracice, not only in religious but in social and political questions, just so long will our membership and support be withheld from associations and organizations which would secure personal privileges or financial gain at the expense of the safety and happiness of others.

Boston Letter

BY CHARLES H. WATSON

IN the possible pastor of the First church, Boston, there is keen and widespread interest. Besides being itself the original Baptist church in Boston, dating back to 1665, it has in its present body the old Shawmut Avenue, Warren Avenue, and Bowdoin Square churches, wrapping their precious traditions. The general property right that we all feel in a church so richly historical, gives us strong desire and settled expectation that the new pastor will be a man of whom we can be proud. He will take his place among the outstanding ministers of the Back Bay district which the noble meeting house of the First church helps to adorn. No other church among us could awaken such general interest as we are having, and that finds expression from time to time in the city press.

Of course what outsiders feel, the guiding minds of the church will feel the more, as they face the responsibility that challenges them. All the traditions of the old church center in a leader of weight and scholarly authority, and his appearance will make us happy and hopeful.

William Henry Spencer

After the lapse of too many years, even a conspicuously good man becomes almost an unknown to the present generation. But older Baptists will well remember Doctor Spencer, who recently passed from us in Cambridge in his eighty-eighth year. He was a heroic soldier in our Civil war, becoming "Major Spencer," and for sixty years was a heroic minister. He was a Brown and Newton man. In his Newton class were W. W. Bakeman, W. T. Chase, J. V. Osmerhout, and J. B. G. Pidge. In chivalrous manliness Doctor Spencer was outstanding; also in old-fashioned Christian courtliness. He had but three pastorate. The twenty years of his maturest vigor he gave to his pastorate at Waterville, Me., where he blessed both the college and the city. As a radiantly devoted minister he was eminent, and as a ripe, sweet old man among us, he was a model. He kept us beholding the transformation in which old age becomes a crown of glory.

Rabbi Levi

We have in Boston a Jewish minister who emphatically is a voice, both for his own and for other people—Rabbi Levi of Temple Israel. Recently he gave our Baptist ministers an hour of refreshing. He was raising the question, "Can the Jew and the Christian meet?" Of course he had plainly to tell us how and where we had failed, and still fail, "to meet." So overwhelmingly did he marshal his facts that it seemed refreshing to be ashamed of them. Planting himself squarely at the Jews' point of view, he talked like a Christian. For a long time nominal Christians have been supplying him much of what he had to say, and he was saying it with patness and facility.

Resolutions

Whereas, Dr. James Loring Cheney, who has been assistant pastor of the Euclid Avenue Baptist church (Cleveland) for the past ten years, has deemed it necessary on account of ill health to retire from active service with us; and

Whereas, by the unfailing devotion of both himself and Mrs. Cheney, they have endeared themselves to every member of the church; and

Whereas, by their sympathetic understanding and hearty cooperation with the Bible School, its officers and teachers, they have made for themselves a place in the hearts of all, that will be difficult to fill; and

Whereas, in their self-sacrificing spirit and untiring zeal in the work of the church they have spared neither their health, their time nor their money;

Be It, Therefore, Resolved:

1. That we, the members of the Euclid Avenue Baptist church, accept with reluctance Doctor and Mrs. Cheney's decision to retire, because he has left us no other course to follow.

2. That the Euclid Avenue Baptist church do hereby express our sincere appreciation of Doctor and Mrs. Cheney and of the long and faithful service they have rendered this church which they loved so well.

3. That we wish for Doctor and Mrs. Cheney God's richest blessings and pray that He, in his infinite wisdom, may speedily restore them both to health and strength; and we wish them to feel that their highest reward consists in the love and esteem of the countless hearts they have touched and helped through their years of service.

4. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Doctor and Mrs. Cheney, a copy be spread upon the records of our church, and that copies be sent to THE BAPTIST and to the Watchman Examiner for publication.

Committee on Resolutions,

A. B. Woodruff

Wm. C. Baumgart

E. M. Smith

We had to admit that, for the Jew, Christian history was not pleasant reading. Instead of surprise that the Jew was sometimes bitter towards us, we found amazement that he was ever able to be sweet. Anyhow it was refreshing for Jew and Christian to "meet" for an hour on Monday, Mar. 15, when Rabbi Harry Levi had the platform.

From East to West

The call from Winchester to Lincoln, Neb., of Rev. Clifton H. Walcott, brings one of the removals that attract attention. Pastor Walcott has served thirteen years in our state, six of them in Winchester, and seven in Sharon. He is a Brown and Newton man, has solidity as well as facility, and there is a saturating felicity that lightens the weight. He is president of our Boston Ministers' Conference, and keeps things safe and genial. He is just the man for a university city. There is a plenty in his mind and spirit that such an environment will call out.

Noon-day Sermons

The Lenten season has been a period of abounding noon-day preaching. Never have we had so many sermons during the dinner hour. If sermonic emphasis upon the passion of Jesus were needed, certainly we have had it. For the first time we have had daily Lenten sermons in Tremont Temple by our Baptist ministers. Not crowds, but a goodly number have attended, and the preaching has been of a high grade, and ably helpful.

Latterly, a noticeable stressing of music of the showy order has occasioned remark and some criticism. Necessarily the service must be short; why should the music be long or suggestive of elaboration? Some of us recall the old Lenten services in St. Paul's, with almost a full hour of Phillips Brooks, and no music except as the vast congregation almost lifted the roof with those great hymns of the faith that now are rarely used, and sometimes forgotten. Give the preacher time to make a fire, give the people a great hymn, and then listen.

Some Happenings

Doctor Franklin's address on the present situation in China compelled the sympathetic attention of the ministers. He laid no claim to knowledge beyond present possibility, but confessed to a condition so chaotic as to baffle anything like positive understanding. Looking at China in the throes of the appalling difficulties that our western diplomacy has helped to make for them, he spoke with that intelligent Christian sympathy which, more than anything else, has kept the grateful confidence of the Chinese in America. It was just the message from a missionary secretary that we expect and welcome. There was a background of faith that the growing determination of a really great people would find a way out of their troubles, and the Christian missionary would help.

The Annual Meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention, Washington, D. C., May 25-30.

We again had the proof on Monday, Mar. 22, that we never outgrow our early relish for a good story and an attractive picture. The announcement that Dr. A. T. Kempton would give his picture-lecture on Palestine, gave the ministers' conference what it rarely has, a crowded house. Doctor Kempton is our graphic minister. His taste and preferential interest permanently lean that way, and all the brotherhood of churches has reason to know it, for he is generous. It was particularly appropriate as a Lenten lecture, for it put in swift, graphic story, and richly illustrated history, the redemptive life, and the accompanying scenes that we are all dwelling upon.

We have a still youthful looking patriarch at Revere—Dr. Nelson S. Burbank, whose thirty-fifth pastoral anniversary there the whole city has just helped to celebrate. He has so grown with the city, and the church so grown in around him, that he never could extricate himself; thus instead of trying to back out, he has kept going deeper and farther in, much to the joy of the church and the city. He is a shining record.

A Send-Off

It is just announced that we are to give President Walcott of our ministers' conference a "send-off" from Winchester to Lincoln, Neb. His keen sense of humor will melt down the inevitable avalanche of appreciation that descends upon a modest man at such a time, and carry the sweet residue away with him. He is well worth sending off so far, and would have been a good man to keep nearer the hub of things.

Indianapolis News

By FREDERICK ARTHUR HAYWARD

THE Pre-Easter spirit is excellent in Indianapolis. On all sides are evidences of the endeavors of our leaders to urge the spiritual things first. The Church Federation of the city has held a series of meetings in Keith's theater with Dr. Frederick Shannon of Chicago as the noon-hour speaker. The attendances have not been entirely satisfactory but the meetings indicate the desire to stress proper things. City business men are now contemplating closing business during a period on Good Friday and encouraging the workers to attend some one of several services to be held in hallowed commemoration of the Lord's death.

All the Baptist churches show unusual zeal in special services and preparations for Easter. Many churches have held evangelistic meetings and with marked results. Pastoral exchanges and noted evangelists have held up the cross of the Saviour. Sunday-school goals have been set and beautiful music is being prepared to make this sacred season of the year spiritually uplifting.

The B. Y. P. U. Rally

The Indianapolis B. Y. P. U. rallies have always been good. The plans and the programs are carefully made. This quarter Rev. Ernest R. Evans gave the address of the evening on "The Call of Christ to Christian Service." The attendance was sufficient to crowd the College Avenue church; when the actual reports reached the secretary 691 reported from societies and, with the visitors, made an attendance of nearly 800. This meeting held on Monday, Mar. 15, was a real contribution to the work. Moving pictures of the "Trip to Los Angeles" were presented together with "the Yellowstone attractions."

First Church

When the "Philadelphia call" came to Dr. Frederick E. Taylor the people woke up to the contributions Doctor Taylor was making, not only to his own church but to the city at large. Organizations in and outside of churches protested. Doctor Taylor remains and the city is happy. No one going to the First church can believe for a minute the decision to remain in Indianapolis was a mistake. The First church is crowded at all services. On Sunday, Mar. 21, three were baptized and at the night services not less than a dozen walked down the church aisle in response to the invitation. More than 50 per cent of the audiences are men. Dr. O. R. McKay, the associate, is rapidly making a place for himself in the life and program of this church.

The winter college, having such speakers as Gilkey, Goodspeed, Robertson, Wayman and Geistweit, closed two weeks ago. The attendances reached nearly 600 average in classes and more than 800 in the general sessions. It was the greatest winter college ever conducted in Indianapolis by any church in the city.

The Federated Baptist Churches

The fifth year of the secretaryship of F. A. Hayward closed with Mar. 15. During this period the organization has been perfected and incorporated. The spirit of the city is fine and every church has a pastor. During the five years the following facts stand out:

Two churches dissolved because of inefficiency and unfortunate location.

Two churches organized in the reconstructive program. Both are housed in satisfactory manner—Temple in a $24,000 property and Exeter in a $6500 property.

Nine churches were holding half-time services five years ago and today all have full time services.

Five dead churches studied and three have been resurrected. The others are beyond help.

Twelve new buildings have been built since 1921, and the total valuation of this "building program" reaches $336,500.

One new building, Woodruff Place—will probably cost $125,000. This is the result of a fire destroying the old building.

One contemplated new building on North Side, costing probably $250,000.

Nine churches making intensive repairs costing $14,000.

Four new parsonages, estimated cost $24,000.

Three new pipe organs installed in white Baptist churches in past period.

Obituary

Elizabeth Weldon Hough, born in Richmond, Va., 1852, and died in Oklahoma City March 13, 1926. She was married to Rev. John W. Hough in St. Louis in 1874, and immediately went west with him under the auspices of the Northern Baptist Home Mission Board, their first pastorate at home being at Evanston, Wyo. During long ministerial career in Illinois, Iowa, Kansas and Nebraska, she faithfully supported her husband in every worthy endeavor. Her husband died in Oklahoma City about four years ago, and she will be buried by his side. She leaves two sons, Alva Carey Hough, of Oklahoma City, and Dr. J. Walter Hough, of Cushing, Okla. She was a member of the First church of Oklahoma City.

Christian Comes to the Hill Difficulty

"He fell from running to going, and from going to clambering upon his hands and his knees, because of the steepness of the place."

"The narrow way lay right up the hill, and the name of the going up the side of the hill is called Difficulty. Christian went now to the spring, and drank there to refresh himself, and then began to go up the hill, saying,

"The hill, though high, I covet to ascend; the difficulty will not me offend; for I perceive the way to life lies here; come, pluck up, heart, let's neither faint nor fear.

"Better, though difficult, the right way to go,

"than wrong, though easy, where the end is woe!"

From "The Pilgrim's Progress," by John Bunyan.

THIS is the season of the year when Baptists come to their Hill Difficulty—the completion of the year's budget. Will April, 1926, find us ascending it in the same cheerful and determined spirit that was Christian's when his way lay up the hill? Like the pilgrim visualized by the famous seventeenth century Baptist, we as a denomination face a choice. We can choose the easy way of letting things go, of giving indifferently only what we can easily spare, or we can rouse ourselves and others to the tragedy which will take place if the word must go out in mission fields, temporarily saved by the Lone Star fund: "We must close this station for lack of money to keep it going."

If for no other motive than pride in the historic achievements of our denomination, we should be unwilling to let this happen. Think of the thousands of Baptists who, like Bunyan, in the early days of the denomination faced every kind of discouragement and persecution for the integrity of their faith. Think of our missionaries who, like Judson, penetrated into dark and unexplored corners of the earth, facing death from the ignorant and superstitious people whom they came to help. After years of resistance, many of them are just beginning to see the full results of their work in the spread of Christian ideals, and in the respect and confidence they are winning from foreign peoples who come in contact with them. Shall we tell them that Baptists at home are no longer interested in their achievements, thus flinging away carelessly an honor in which we might take the greatest pride? It would seem that such a heritage as Baptists have should carry with it a sense of noblesse oblige.

Our Hill of Difficulty this year is by no means an insurmountable one. The budget was cut down to the very lowest possible point by the finance committee last summer. With the help of the Lone Star fund it was found that $5,360,000 would just cover the support of Baptist activities for the current year, although it was necessary on many fields to reduce the staffs or to postpone needed repairs. For a denomination of our size and potentialities this budget is a small one, and well within our power to collect if we will only realize how much depends on its being raised. Up to Jan. 31, the date of the last report, we had succeeded in bringing in $2,686,029, or a trifle more than half of the full amount. Three months lay ahead in which to collect the remaining sum—$2,673,971, or practically half of the year's budget. A Hill of Difficulty indeed, but when we realize how much is at stake, is it not "better, though difficult, the right way to go"?

As a matter of fact, the total sum to be raised is not so important to keep in mind, as the matter of each church congregation doing its full share. The fate of Baptist missions for the ensuing year is now in the hands of the local churches and their members. If every church reaches its missionary goal, the denomination has no need to worry, but let us all keep in mind that a chain is only as strong as its weakest link, and that applies to a chain of churches such as compose the Northern Convention as much as to any other kind of chain.

Statistics recently compiled as to the way in which American people spend their money, show approximately 17 per cent of the average income going for luxuries and only about 4/10 per cent for the support of religious work. From the boards of all denominations comes the same story of indifference to missions, and of consequent cuts in the budget. Isn't it time this tide of materialism was stemmed, and that "the things not seen" received their due? Baptist churches can show the way by coming full strength to the support of the year's missionary budget. "Every church victorious" should be our watchword during April.

Dr. B. S. Hopkins of the University of Illinois, it is announced, has discovered a new chemical element, classed as a metal, and has named it illinium. It will be observed that he is employed in a state institution, a position which is supposed to destroy initiative and incentive.

Here, There and Everywhere

OTTAWA UNIVERSITY sends a delegation to the biennial conference of Pi Kappa Delta at Estes Park March 29 to April 2. One or two of the faculty also attend.

THE MOREHOUSE college school of religion, a long-cherished dream of President Hope, and now scarcely a year old, is developing under Director Hubert and Professors Lewis and Reddick in a manner that has won the approval and confidence of the negro ministers of Georgia. Morehouse college is making plans for a Bible school, open to both men and women, to be held in connection with its summer school.

WITHOUT ANY SPECIAL meetings, Pastor J. H. Hughes of Temple church, Chicago, received twenty-four candidates for baptism, Mar. 21.

ON ACCOUNT of ill health, Dr. James Loring Cheney has been compelled to retire from the position of assistant pastor of Euclid Avenue church, Cleveland. He has served the church for ten years with rare devotion and faithfulness.

AT THE recent state W. W. G. convention held at Dayton, Ohio, the Piqua W. W. G. Chapter won the reading contest picture for the seventh consecutive year. Miss Alma Noble, in making the presentation said there were only two other chapters in the Northern Baptist Convention that had achieved this distinction. Piqua W. W. G. also qualified as a standard chapter for the third consecutive year.

ON MAR. 16 the faculty and students of Shurtleff College pledged over $12,000 toward the centennial endowment fund, thus bringing the amount needed to win the goal down to $50,000. Great enthusiasm was manifested by the students, nearly everyone of whom pledged and most of them out of their poverty. This was a free-will offering. The college now faces the task of securing $50,000 more in pledges before July 1 or forfeit the $133,333 offered by the general board of education.

DR. LAWRENCE N. SIRRELL was stricken down Sunday, March 14, while engaged in a successful ministry with the First church of Cohoes, N. Y. Shortly after the death of Mrs. Sirrell, two years ago, Doctor Sirrell's health began to fail, necessitating a somewhat less strenuous ministry. About a year ago he was advised by his physician to go to a sanitarium for complete rest and treatment. He went to Clifton Springs where he remained for a considerable time. His recovery was so probable that the physician advised that if he would secure the services of an assistant for a few months, he would then be able to resume his work. The church had made such arrangements at the time of his death. Doctor Sirrell occupied his pulpit on Sunday and conducted his prayer service on Thursday evening. The following night he was taken ill. Funeral services were conducted by Dr. Frederick Allen, of the Fifth Avenue church, Troy, N. Y., assisted by Rev. Thomas A. Hughes, Dr. A. M. Prentice, Dr. Charles L. Leonard, and Rev. Victor Blekkink.

DR. W. W. KEEN, to whom indebtedness must be acknowledged for many a helpful suggestion, calls attention to the phrase casi belli, in a recent number of THE BAPTIST. The form of his reminder is a request for the assistant editor to decline the noun casus. The latter "begs to decline." The case is simple. The use of the wrong form was a schoolboy blunder due to haste and lack of attention. Thanks and best wishes to Doctor Keen.

CONCERNING THE TANGLE that arose in Kansas in the business of the Anti-Saloon League, National Superintendent Scott McBride gives the information that the irregularities were traced to their author, that a new state superintendent for Kansas is now in charge and that steps have been taken to guard against a recurrence of the difficulties.

DR. AMBROSE M. BAILEY of Seattle, in a signed statement, warns Baptist churches against Edward Elmer Edwards, who, it is reported to him, is soliciting money on the pretense of being a deacon in the First Baptist church of Seattle. Doctor Bailey says that the said Edwards is not a member of the First church, that he offered himself for membership, promising to bring a letter from the First church of Denver, but the same night solicited money and left the city.

REV. WM. C. DEER, Iowa Falls, Iowa, has this striking, almost choking, statement in a recent bulletin: "Beware that

On Easter Even

WHEN the sun sets, let me say,
"Each day is an Easter day,
When the Lord may rise in me,
Bringing life and victory;
Every eve an Easter eve,
When my heart a glorious guest
Must make ready to receive,
Swept and cleansed and duly dressed.

On its altar there shall lie
Lilies white of purity;
Roses white and roses red
Shall their grateful odors shed;
Passion flowers with cross on breast,
Violet purple sweet, I'll lay
Where my Lord's dear feet may rest,
Haply—on this Easter day."

So each night, O faithful heart,
Keep thy vigil, draw apart.
Dress thine altar fair and fit,
Sure the Lord will hallow it.
Death in vain forbids Him rise,
Sin in vain would bar His way,
And, each morrow, in the skies,
There shall dawn an Easter day!

IMMANUEL CHURCH, Salt Lake City, Utah, Rev. G. W. Cassidy, pastor, has made arrangements to broadcast its services the second Sunday morning of each month and the morning and evening services of the fourth Sunday. The station is KSL, 300 meters. Doctor Brougher's "Play Ball" address was broadcast on Mar. 23 from this church.

REV. HOWARD THURMAN, negro student at Rochester Seminary, is speaking in many churches. His grandmother came to America as a slave. Pastor Chas. F. Banning of the Delaware Street church of Syracuse, N. Y., says Mr. Thurman is a capable and brilliant speaker, and his family has made more progress in two generations that many of the descendants of the Mayflower have made in 400 years.

AT A RECOGNITION COUNCIL held Mar. 8 in First church, San Diego, Calif., Rev. John Bunyan Smith, pastor, Mr. Nowe and Mr. Woolam were inducted into the Baptist ministry. Chaplain C. C. Bate was moderator and the sermon was by State Secretary W. F. Harper. Practically every church in the association was represented.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF., has a big down-town Bible class taught by John Bunyan Smith of the White Temple. The class meets in the Broadway theater. It publishes a snappy weekly paper called the Em Bee Cee.

PASTOR CHAS. A. CARMAN of Galesburg Ill., was sent to Chicago by the men's Bible class of his church to attend the funeral of Dr. John Y. Aitchison and to bear to Mrs. Aitchison and John Jr., the love and sympathy of a church that he once served so well.

REV. C. L. TRAWIN, Eugene, Ore., has received eighty members during the first five months of his pastorate there. He is now delivering a series of sermon

"The Rediscovery of God." The Eugene church has real estate assets aggregating $55,000 and a cash fund of $23,000 and contemplates building a new edifice this coming summer.

REV. FRANK ANDERSON of the First church, Ilion, N. Y., has had the help of evangelist Harold Strathearn of Rochester, Mar. 11-28. This church has 700 members and a Sunday school of 400.

REV. JOHN A. ERBE, North East, Pa., reports a stirring evangelistic meeting with Rev. Margaret M. Joshua of Union City as the speaker. There were twenty-

The Saving Sense

Look what a mess the children have made of my sewing room," exclaimed Mrs. Brown. "Needles, reels of cotton, scissors—everything has been hidden in the most unexpected places. It's exasperating."

Her husband laid down his paper and smiled.

"I did that," he said. "You tidied up your desk so beautifully the other day that I thought it was only fair to return the compliment. So I tidied up your sewing room."

We hear a good deal about destructive anomy these days. Here is a story about it. The dialog is between a Florida boy and his dad.

Father, can I go down to the orange grove and pick a few oranges?"

Yes, son, but be careful to pick bad ones."

But suppose there ain't no bad ones, father?"

MR. T. T. WOODRUFF, superintendent of the Sunday school of the First church, Los Angeles, Calif., was recently severely injured by an auto. Mr. Woodruff was formerly a member of the Temple church and is widely known in southern California.

THE PASTOR of the First church, Anoka, Minn., Rev. L. E. Brough, with a group of fifteen workers recently held a meeting in the St. Cloud state reformatory. Twenty-eight prisoners made expression of their desire to follow Christ as Saviour. This church maintains a gospel auto and has an organized group of forty workers.

ON APR. 1 the offices of the Rochester Church Federation and of the Monroe County Sunday School Association were moved into the Baptist Temple.

DR. GEORGE W. TRUETT of Dallas, Tex., spoke twice before the Oklahoma state B. Y. P. U. convention at Shawnee, Mar. 26.

THE PARK AVENUE CHURCH of Plainfield, N. J., Rev. W. J. Swaffield pastor, Mar. 14-19, celebrated the centennial of the birth of Rev. Robert Lowry in 1826 and the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the church in 1876. This was a series of great spiritual meetings.

DR. J. W. WEDDELL of Clarksburg, W. Va., returning one evening recently from Mannington, W. Va., where he was assisting in revival efforts, was surprised by the members of the church where he is acting pastor. He was just seventy-one years old. There was a fine gift for Mrs. Weddell and a purse of $120 toward a proposed trip to England which Doctor and Mrs. Weddell have in mind.

SIXTY PEOPLE from Ottawa drove to Topeka, Kan., to hear Doctor Brougher.

AT SHARPSBURG, PA., recently Rev. B. A. Wilson baptized two and received one other. Mr. Wilson was recently elected editor of the Pittsburgh Association B. Y. P. U. bulletin.

THE CHURCH at Winnebago, Minn., recently contributed $2500 with which to have the church redecorated and repaired. Rev. A. C. Hageman is the pastor.

REV. H. D. ALLEN, aged eighty-five, who had served churches at Quincy, Marshall and Jackson, Michigan and at Garden City, Kan., died Feb. 25, at Seattle, Wash. His family reside in that city.

DR. JOHN A. EARL is in the Mounds Park Sanitarium, St. Paul, recovering from an operation.

SUMMER TERM

June 16 — July 27, 1926

Term divided into two periods of three weeks each. Courses for Pastors, Missionaries, Missionary Candidates, Theological Students, and other Leaders and Workers. Strong Courses in Phonetics and Missionary Linguistics. Pastors' Department—three weeks, July 7-27.

John Anderson Wood, Dean, 545 Lexington Ave., New York

"THIS is station WCOY, broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, 2320 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

"The Easter season finds THE BAPTIST sharing in the good-will and appreciation of its hosts of readers in every land. Let us share a few greetings with you tonight:

"I am getting a lot of kick out of THE BAPTIST," says Pastor Raymond S. Carman of Joliet, Ill.

"I rise to express my high appreciation of the excellent things you are bringing us through THE BAPTIST. You are making a record for world-wide religious information and for denominational clarity," says Milton K. Smith, layman of Athens, Ohio.

"We are pushing all our papers this week. You will hear of results very soon. I am determined to get 10 per cent of our people to reading THE BAPTIST. I am a strong booster for the paper and plan to put it on sale regularly on the literature table in our church," says Pastor W. T. Huxford, Estherville, Iowa.

—O—

"Through donations of money sent to this office we are enabled to send the paper to many old ministers and missionaries. One of these wrote us: "Someone did a golden deed, making himself a friend indeed." This quotation surely expresses my sentiments in regard to the person or persons sending me THE BAPTIST for 1926. I think it is the best religious paper published. Many thanks to the sender." There are hundreds of others who have served the denomination well in days gone by who would appreciate the paper if some one would send it to them. Will you do this golden deed today? Share your blessings this happy Easter season with those who have been our helpers in the kingdom. Send check marked, "For Aged Ministers," and we will do the rest.

"And here is a greeting from the Golden Gate. Sender is President Claiborne M. Hill of Berkeley: 'Your paper—our paper is improving steadily. More power to your hand which means to your heart and brain. You are on the right track in the present denominational issues.' President Hill is one of scores of our best and most trustworthy leaders who are sustaining the paper in this fine fashion.

"And what do you think of this from the bulletin of the church at Port Allegany, Pa., Rev. Earl D. Wooddell, pastor? 'Each week THE BAPTIST grows better. The editorials alone are worth the price of the paper. I wish the paper might be in every home in this church. One of our members said the other day, "This is the best issue yet." Another said, "THE BAPTIST is wonderful. I wish I could put it into every one of our homes." Still another said, "Of the nine periodicals coming to our home, I prize THE BAPTIST most of all."

"A chaplain in an eastern state prison writes: 'Enclosed find a list of forty inmates (Baptist men) to whom the sending of your paper will mean a lot. As chaplain will say that your work of sending the paper to these men cannot be duplicated by any other line of reform work. The morale of the prisoners here is increasing and I lay it largely to good reading such as you and your society is sending.' You can help some prisoner by sending $2 for an annual subscription to THE BAPTIST. We have their names. You can send a breath of the Easter season and spirit into some prison cell if you will.

"A missionary who does much hospital visiting would like to have a number of copies of the paper every week for distribution to Baptist people. We would be glad to receive gifts of money for this purpose. We will gladly give you this worker's name and address. There is a great ministry through the printed page for sick people and those laid aside for a time through need of hospital treatment.

"Montana still leads all the conventions in our denomination in the percentage of its reported membership taking THE BAPTIST. Montana has had more subscribers per thousand members than any other state for four out of the six full years that the paper has been published. Montana has a good start to hold the banner this year, 1926.

"There are a lot of the finest numbers of the year just ahead. The Pre-Convention number featuring Washington, D. C.; the Book Number featuring summer reading; the Education Number featuring our schools; and those numbers that will have the stories of the Northern Baptist Convention in Washington and the B. Y. P. U. A. convention in Los Angeles. Single subscriptions, $2.50 per year; in clubs equaling 10 per cent of resident membership, $2; THE BAPTIST and Missions, $3; Trial Subscription for THE BAPTIST, Six Months for $1.00. Get busy.

"WCOY now signs off until April 10. Happy Easter greetings!"

THE FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY of the church at Clarion, Pa., will be celebrated over a period of three days beginning Sunday, Apr. 11. Former members and friends of the church are invited to return or to send their greetings, communicating with the pastor, Rev. Wayland Zwyer. Six former pastors are living: Rev. H. R. Goodchild, Rev. George Boddie, Rev. R. R. Thompson, Rev. Charles A.

Walker, Rev. Walter E. Reynolds and Rev. Charles F. Smalley.

MAR. 1, PASTOR C. H. RANNELS entered upon his eighth year with the First church, Bayonne, N. J. Thirty-four new members were received the past year. Mar. 10 the annual reception to new members was held with Dr. H. Watson Barras delivering the address. The church begins the eighth year of the present pastorate with all bills paid and over $900 in the treasury.

REV. HOWARD C. WHITCOMB, pastor of the Calvary church of Omaha, has rented to the Grand Island College a service of real value. He spent a week in the city addressing the students at their chapel period, meeting them personally, conferring with them about their religious problems, about the acceptance of Christ, and about their life work. His straightforward message appealed to the students in a special way, as he emphasized morning after morning the value of a positive faith. The college regards itself as very greatly indebted to him for this service.

THE LATE CHARLES F. GREY, of Evanston, Ill., shortly before he passed away, made a gift of $20,000 to be devoted (on behalf of his church) to such work of the women's missionary societies as Mrs. Robert L. Scott and Mrs. Howard G. Grey should select. Of this fund $5000, with accrued interest of $50 has been sent to the Women's Home Mission Society for the purpose of providing permanent equipment for the society's work at Indiana Harbor. $5000 has been cabled through the Women's Foreign Society to Dr. Anna B. Grey toward the building of a nurses' home at Moulmein. The remaining $10,000, when needed, will also be sent for the latter object.

FIFTY-THREE years ago a few Baptists who had come to the new village of Hastings, Neb., gathered together in an uncompleted store building and organized the Baptist church under the leadership of Rev. I. D. Newell, home missionary. In 1881 a small frame building was erected and used until 1901 when a larger and modern brick building was erected. May 16, 1924, this building was destroyed by fire. The present pastor, Rev. A. S. Cross, has been with the church one and a half years. During that time the church has rallied its forces and with heroic courage. It had $18,000 insurance and a corner location worth $15,000. With this it has built and dedicated a property worth $100,000. It has a membership of 350 folks, with no rich members. Dr. F. H. Divine of Brooklyn led in raising $65,000. A varied dedication program covered the week of Mar. 7-12.

Serving almost continuously his ministry of music, begun ten months later than the pastorate of Dr. C. A. Barbour, covered that pastorate and the pastorate of Dr. A. W. Beaven up to date. Mr. Fisher is known nationally as the one who inaugurated the vesper service in Baptist churches and also as one almost without a peer in building up a service supported by the organ. There are many hymns and selections for the organ to his credit as a composer. Four years ago Mr. Fisher entered upon a new field, that of organ architecture. This work takes him to many parts of the country for consultation and for personal supervision not only at the time of installation but also in the actual building at the factories. Because of this he has asked to be released by the church on May 1.

DR. SAMUEL J. SKEVINGTON, pastor of the First church, Hollywood, Calif., extended the hand of fellowship to seventeen new members at the February communion and welcomed eleven more at the March communion. He is following a successful school of missions which closed recently with the plan of a school of evangelism at the prayer meeting hour. The largest congregations of his ministry have attended the preaching of a course of sermons on "The Christian and His Life." The church is full of missionary zeal and carrying a good missionary budget which it is paying up in current installments. Its giving is a standard of $60 a member. The Sunday school is now using four bungalows on the property that has recently been acquired for the future educational building. The lot cost almost $50,000.

MRS. FLORENCE HERMISTON, evangelist, has been assisting Rev. John Bentzien of the First church of Exeter, Calif., in special services. Twenty-nine have been added to the church, fifteen by baptism, making altogether ninety new members since the pastor came from his former field in Pasadena a little more than a year ago.

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for April 11

THE STORY OF CREATION

Lesson Text: Gen. 1:1-2:25. Golden Text: Gen. 1:1

Having studied the story of redemption, we now turn to the story of creation. There is no sublimer story of creation in all literature than the story found in this lesson text. And yet its story is simplicity itself. Its very simplicity is its greatest claim to sublimity. It is the primitive epic of creation, the original lyric of the cosmos, the classical poetry of universal beginning.

God

The word "God" stands out with striking emphasis in the whole story of creation. It is God who creates, who speaks things into being, who sees that his handiwork is good. The story permits nothing to appear by spontaneous generation; it leaves no room for materialistic evolution. God is imminent in every movement and process. And upon general lines the Genesis account of creation anticipates the most approved findings of science with reference to cosmology. It was not originally intended to teach science because science was so far, far in the future when the book of Genesis was compiled. Great injustice has been done to this simple, primitive story of creation by clothing it with literalism which it never was made to wear. Men lacking in imagination and in the appreciation of poetry have insisted on regarding it as sober prose and well-authenticated history. And because they have so regarded it, thousands of good people to this day still believe that it is a verbally correct account of creation in spite of the tremendous revelations made in modern times by the aid of telescope and microscope. How much better to leave the process of creation to the discoveries of science while we cling to the truth of the opening statement of Genesis, "In the beginning God!"

Man

Man is the flowering out of creation. He is the grand climax of the whole creative process. Everything else preceded him. Man was God's last and best handiwork. And this is exactly what modern science claims to have discovered by the scientific method. Both creationists and evolutionists agree that man is a late comer, that he is comparatively recent on the earth. They disagree simply on the mode of man's appearance. But what difference does it make whether man flowered out of all other processes into the image of God by slow development or was stamped with the image by a creative act of God in a moment? It makes no difference in the net result so long as God was in the process which produced his image, man. But it does make a difference when science is regarded with suspicion and met with open hostility because it does not agree with a crassly literal interpretation of the creation record of Genesis.

There is a group of five sermon-essays of this much loved old minister of Methuen. His mind is revealed as excepesting to study in these papers the way in which a man of other days adjusts himself to the thought and method of

Speaking in the person of an invest-to supervise their financial affairs, and warns them of the pitfalls an inexperienced investor must guard against.

Light of Faith, by Edgar Guest. Chicago: Reilly & Lee. $1.25 to $2.50, according to binding.

There has been this criticism of much of the modern poetry—it is becoming material; it lacks vision; there is in it no sense of inspiration or uplift. Refuting this comes a volume of Edgar Guest's poems—verse of "inspiration, courage, cheer and cheer,"—the kind that holds out a steady hand to a man and cheers him on his way. The first poem of the volume is one of the season. Listen to "The Light of Faith."

When the dark days come and the clouds grow gray
Men must brave them as best they may,
With never too much repining;
The bravest is he, when the shadows fall,
Who sees in the gloom of his darkened hall
The light of his faith still shining.

Those lonely days when his heart shall ache
And it seems that soon shall his courage break,
There is only one place to borrow;
A place to go for the strength he needs,
Must bind with faith every wound
That bleeds,
And cling to his faith through sorrow.

How truly forlorn is the man who weeps
When his dead lies buried in floral heaps
And friends his path are lining;
And a pitiful creature he's doomed to be

If he cannot look through the gloom and see

The light of his faith still shining.
The book contains more than one hundred poems. It is a most fitting gift book for this, or any, season.

—J. T. V.

Christ the Way, by J. H. Garrison. St.
Louis: Bethany Press. $1.

The author claims that original Christianity had no formulated creed and ritual; it was Christo-centric. The religion Jesus presented soon took the simple name of "The Way" as it is characterized especially by the writer of the Book of Acts. Its only rule and principle was to obey and follow the commandment of Jesus Christ, and to reproduce his life in the living of the believer.
The second division presents the program of Christ's place in revelation, in the life of humanity, in the faith of the church, in the home and in the world's progress. The work is thoroughly conservative and evangelistic in trend and sentiment; but not reactionary or controversial. It is charmingly written. We have not often read a volume more quickening of thought, especially to the man who is preparing for speaking in public as in an address or a sermon.

—H. O. ROWLANDS.

The Resurrection of Jesus, by W. T. Conner. Nashville, Tenn.: Sunday School Board of the Southern Baptist Convention. $1.

Avowedly this book ignores the problems over which scholars debate. Though expressing a positive faith, there is a commendable absence of that cock-sure spirit in which some discuss profoundest mysteries. Noting the transformation wrought in the disciples by the triumphant Christ, the author seeks to share with his readers the inspirations of that dynamic fellowship. As sunshine reveals the sun, so the persistence of vital Christianity is perhaps the best evidence of Jesus' resurrection. Ultimate power is the power of goodness and our present need is not so much for more money as a fresh inflow of spiritual power. Doctor Conner says, "I believe in evangelism, social service and peace programs but all these are useless unless energized by a power that is above man's". He warns those who trouble us by literalistic interpretations that the surest way to miss the meaning of the New Testament is to "stick closely to the lexicon and be logical".

Divine Vocation in Human Life, by James
Alexander Robertson. New York: Doran. $2.

This book tackles with courage and extraordinary ability a problem as difficult as that of the place and function of suffering in the world. The idea of a divine call to preachers is so generally accepted among Christians that it has been made a definite part of the examination of all candidates for the gospel ministry. A divine call is also seen in the selection of outstanding leaders in the field of art, literature and government. But who has had the daring to argue for the divine call in umbrellamending or scissors-grinding until this doughty Scotchman entered the lists?
The book pulsates with the heart-beat of a man of conviction who compels respect for his message by his erudition and clarity. Many books skim the surface and it is easy to blow the froth off in a rapid reading, but "Divine Vocation in Human Life" has height and depth as well as breadth and length.
One must read it slowly because the truth is put up in concentrated form.
The author reaches a grand climax in the closing chapter in which he shows with rare insight and graceful words that Jesus is the perfect embodiment of the divine vocation in human life and only through sharing the spirit of Jesus do men approximate perfection in responding to the high calling of God.

TOP OF THE GRADE

From that point in the road the Pioneer in his covered wagon could in the same moment view the long, difficult track behind and the inviting valley ahead.

Northern Baptists are near the top of the grade for the fiscal year 1925-26. If we go over the divide on time—in other words if we meet our missionary obligations in full before the last day of April—the path of the denomination will unfold comfortably before us, winding through a fairer valley than we have known for some years.

The final word to every church member and every local church is: YOU are an important factor. Your example will influence somebody else.

Say to yourself, "As I do in this matter of contribution to the support of our historic Baptist missions, I shall be content to have the entire denomination do."

Face the issue with an active conscience and remembering the obligation to keep faith with your fellow Baptists, with our missionaries and with Christ who commanded us to make disciples of all nations.

There is still time to make certain that your church will send its full quota to the state office before April 30th.

Folks, Facts and Opinion

Seventy-five members of the reformatory settlements in India in charge of Rev. Samuel F. Bawden took up on their own motion a subscription to the Lone Star fund amounting to ninety-eight rupees, which they promised to pay out of their next harvest.

According to the Christian World, London, eighteen speakers, including clergy and ministers of the Established, Free and Roman Catholic churches, paid tribute to Rev. Charles Ingrem at the farewell gathering held on the termination of his forty-five years' ministry at Wimbledon Baptist church.

Dr. J. H. Rushbrooke has published a directory of the Baptist World Alliance. It gives the following table of statistics of Baptist membership: Europe, 625,758; Asia, 313,701; Africa, 64,628; North America, 8,186,965; Central America, 59,302; South America, 25,928; Australasia, 31,752. And he renews his estimate of at least 11,000,000 members of Baptist churches in the world as a whole.

The National Lutheran Council, which represents 2,500,000 Lutherans in America, has appointed a committee by unanimous vote to try to persuade all the other Protestant bodies in the United States not to take any part in the celebration of the Festival of the Kingdom of Christ, a new holy day which Pope Pius XI created by an encyclical last December—decreeing that it should be observed by the Roman Catholic church the world over on the last Sunday of every October.

The following interesting story appears in the Baptist Times. A party of travelers, journeying on the fringe of the Sahara desert, stopped at a mud-thatched village near a mission station. A boy with only a loin cloth about his waist sat in the shade with a Gospel in his hand. The leader of the party told the courier to tell the boy he would give him an orange if he could tell him where to find God. The boy stood up and said to the guide, "Tell the man I will give him two oranges if he can tell where God is not to be found."

Let the off ox watch his step and not jostle the ark. The precautionary admonition is evoked by this sage reflection in the Alabama Baptist: "If indeed the federal reserve has secured the country against financial panics, we next need something to secure the people against religious panics. We firmly suspect the Ark of the Covenant is well established, but let some fool in New York make a fool statement about the atonement or something else and it is marvelous to see how men begin to prop up the Ark with their little forked sticks lest it fall and Covenant and all will be broken."

Southern papers give high tribute to the memory of Dr. Washington Bryan Crumpton, "soldier, reformer, preacher, known and loved among Baptists of the South." His death occurred Mar. 9, and he was buried at Marion, Ala.

A new use for the loud speaker has been found. Rev. T. W. Roff, an English preacher, affixed a loud speaker to the front of his church and broadcast his sermon to the passers-by. Several of them stopped, listened and entered the church to share in the services.

Among the signs of change in Russia it is reported that in the recent elections in the Ukrainian villages, ninety per cent of the Jewish population participated in the elections. The Jewish communist press points out that for the first time Jewish women were elected to the soviets and it is the first time that certain classes of the population, which were hitherto unrepresented, participated in the elections.

By way of rendering a friendly service such as we always invite from those we trust, a suggestion is offered to the Watchman-Examiner concerning its leading editorial of March 18 under the title, "Judge Freeman's Resolution," in which there is an appraisal of the recent report of the law committee. The report of the law committee does not deal with Judge Freeman's resolution. That resolution was adopted by a large majority at the convention at Seattle and is no longer under consideration. The law committee is dealing with the motion to amend the by-laws which was introduced in regular order by the method of a signed notice, with which Judge Freeman's name has no connection, and which will come up in regular order at Washington.

Occasionally somebody lights upon a topic for criticism which is both original and interesting. The Commonweal turns for instance to consider the modern rifling of ancient burying grounds in the interest of archaeology, and reflects thus: "It gives us a peculiar start to realize that during some century to come, wealthy collectors from somewhere in the antipodes may carry off the bones of Lincoln or the tombstone of Alexander Hamilton, for the instruction of brown-skinned little boys and girls. Should not our possibly helpless descendants resent, as do many of the subject orientals, the sinister and dictatorial robbery of shrines? There is an amazing disregard for alien culture in the whole venture to exploit the past—a disregard which, when one contemplates it realistically, is not merely an offense against charity but also a challenge to anything which can be termed good-will among associated peoples."

Coeducation has been tried for a generation and is now undergoing critical investigation. The Teachers' Union of New York City has created a commission to make a thorough survey of the subject, and members of high standing in the profession are expressing opposite conclusions as to the value of the system.

A straw indicating the set of spiritual winds is this item from the Spelman Messenger: "Appearing here with Sherwood Eddy, Dr. Alva Taylor, J. Stitt Wilson, and other nationally known figures in a series of meetings constituting 'Religious Emphasis Week,' Dr. Mordecai Johnson, of Charleston, W. Va., spoke to thousands of people in leading white and colored churches, and made a tremendous impression by his plea for the application of Christian principles to race relations."

Mr. Borah disagrees with most Americans upon the proposal to adhere to the World Court of International Justice. But he is entitled to be heard even by those who cannot accept his conclusion on the subject. His opposition is based upon his hatred of war. He thinks the court as at present organized, recognizes and legalizes war, and he declares, "I could never get my consent to endorse or vote for any proposition or scheme for peace which rest in the analysis on force." He distinguishes clearly between the use of force within a nation to preserve order and the employment of military power against a nation to cripple or destroy it.

Two hundred leaders of the Protestant clergy of New York City together with a few of the Catholic and Hebrew groups met Mar. 10 at luncheon at the Waldo Astoria hotel under the auspices of a citizens committee of one thousand to consider the question of law observance especially as related to the eighteen amendment. Mr. Fred B. Smith presided. The speakers were Congressman Alben W. Barkley of Kentucky and Rev. W. Russell Bowie of Grace Episcopal church, New York City. In their findings they said: "Recognizing how differences of opinion concerning the principles involved in the eighteen amendment and the Volstead act, we are nevertheless opposed to any modification of these laws, believing that present propaganda for such modification would if successful, result in the return of the saloon or its equivalent evils, and in the destruction of what has been called the greatest economic and social advance in the history of democratic government. We favor the immediate enactment of the state of New York of an adequate enforcement measure."

The National Baptist Convention (Negro) is undertaking to raise $250,000 to support its missionary work in Africa.

Official returns to the postoffice department of China give the total population as 436,094,953. Considering conditions in China, one is prepared to lift an eyebrow at the precision of the count. A mistake of one or two persons more or less in the whole number might be pardoned.

Sir Joseph Henry Carruthers, former premier of New South Wales and now chairman of the New South Wales chamber of agriculture, has issued a world appeal in behalf of the rapidly declining Melanesian races and has suggested the holding of a conference by representatives of these races and their "sincere well-wishers" some time next year. The Melanesians include the native Hawaiians, the Maoris of New Zealand, Samoans, Tongans, Tahitians and Marisians, together with scattered tribes on other Pacific islands.

Bill (H. R. 8538) introduced by Representative Welsh Jan. 26, proposes that no officer of the United States army or other person in the employ of the United States shall teach any course of military training in any university, college, school, or other educational institution, other than essentially military schools, if such institution requires any student to pursue such course as a prerequisite for graduation or for any other reason. The purpose of the bill is of course to eliminate compulsory military training from the general institutions of learning and to place it on a purely elective basis. Considering the kind of instruction that has been given under the compulsory plan, this bill seems to be remarkably moderate in its effort to save the educational system from Prussian-

Among many good things in the Christian Century, this is lifted bodily in the paper that somewhere in this broad land there may be readers susceptible to a civil-servant suggestion. Read: "Now that the colonies are plagued with the cult of athletic worship until their giant structures have no room for all the worshipers, it remained for a county in Maine to give its people to real interest in a different sort of competition. For, in the county of Aroostook, teams have been sent from the high schools of Bridgeville, Monticello, Island Falls and Houlton and these have competed in a different kind of contest. Five students are put forward by each town as its champions. These competed in penmanship, arithmetic, grammar and theme-writing, finally working up to a spelling and closing with a climatic public speaking contest. Hour by hour the community interest mounted until, as the competition drew to its close, the press reported that conservative Maine potato growers were transformed into cheering fans. Houlton won. Its three boys and two girls went home with a silver trophy. But it is a question whether all the sons of Aroostook county did not win more."

From the far West comes this interesting note in the Pacific Christian Advocate. "A few days ago there came to Portland an attorney, one M. G. Montrezza, for the purpose of forming an Oregon chapter of the 'Fascisti League of North America.' That organization seeks to promote the ideals and objects of Mussolini and insofar as it succeeds it will be disloyal to the United States. There was no good reason for suppressing the Masonic order in Italy, and the censorship of Italian newspapers and the violence done to highly esteemed public men there, are utterly indefensible. Voters in the Northwest might well inform their senators of their sentiments in this matter. The Italian debt settlement should never be ratified until conditions in Italy have been made tolerable for Catholics, Socialists, Baptists, Methodists and Masons."

The Baptist Advance serves us a good turn by saying: "There is abroad in the land a certain class of critics who make it their special business to say ugly things about great Baptist leaders, many of the charges being utterly false, and then berate these same leaders for defending themselves against their slanders. With great glee they tell how busy it keeps the leaders to defend themselves and to explain what they have said, when the only thing that occasions the defense or the explanation is the false accusation or misinterpretation of the critics. There are plenty of people who, if they have no regard for the truth, can keep really great men fairly busy explaining and defending. But about the meanest criticising that can ever be done is that which is done when these slanderers say that the defending and explaining which their slanders have made necessary are an indication of guilt." We reply: "Thank you, brother; we have been trying to think of something like that to say, having had as you may know, pressing occasion for saying it."

Delegates to the Midwest Students' Conference, representing 123,000 college students in the south, east and middle west, in session in New Orleans, went on record, Feb. 20, as opposing liquor drinking by students, an Associated Press report of the conference declares. It is understood that fraternities will be called upon especially to use their influence to put a stop to violations of the prohibition laws.

Muskrat farms invite notice. In all parts of Canada where agricultural settlement has taken place certain sections of marsh and swamp land have been passed over as worthless by locating farmers and have come to remain idle and neglected in the center of thriving agricultural communities. Heretofore these pieces of land have been considered of no economic use. Of recent years, however, they have come into increasing demand because they are the natural locations for muskrat ranches, a form of fur farming which has been recruiting many followers.

Annual observance of the third Sunday in June by churches and Sunday schools, and the cooperation of public school-teachers as well, is urged by the International Magna Charta Association, and June 15 has been set for the day to commemorate the birth of Anglo-Saxon liberty throughout the English-speaking world. The general purpose is to develop English-speaking patriotism and cooperation by linking the English-speaking nations still more closely together thus aiding world peace; by arousing our race consciousness to make it more difficult for unwise racialism to develop and for our enemies to sow trouble among us; to build up respect for law; to commemorate Magna Charta and all it stands for; to preserve our liberties through greater respect for the law and for those in authority; a proper understanding of the sacredness of citizenship, and unflinching loyalty to the flag in peace as well as in war."

It is a pleasure to quote again from the Religious Herald, the organ of the Baptists of Virginia, its sentiments concerning a pending bill to compel the reading of the Bible in the public schools of that state. It says: "Of course, there is no opposition on the part of Baptists to the reading of the Bible. On the contrary, our Christian body would yield to none in their respect and their high valuation for the Word of God. We would encourage the reading of the Bible in every way open to us, in the home, in the church, by the way, everywhere and in all possible and suitable conditions. But Baptists will never consent to have the state exercise authority in matters of religion. They are bound to protest when any such effort is made. They know what their forefathers suffered and endured. They know that they have entered into their heritage of religious liberty in this state through the toil and suffering of others. Hence the day is probably far distant when Virginia Baptists will acquiesce in any proposal to turn over to the Commonwealth any authority in the realm of religion."

Fifty-four governments have signified willingness to cooperate in a scheme whereby, for the first time in the world's history, an effort will be made to ascertain, by means of returns drawn up on a systematized and uniform plan, the true agricultural situation in all countries.

"Have we come to a place where it is impossible for men to think straight? Is education today such as to leave men and women with minds all muddy and befuddled? Have we lost the art of thinking? Whatever a man wants to be true, is that true?" So runs the inquiring mind of the Baptist Record of Mississippi. An affirmative answer seems to be invited, and it has many things to justify it. In fact these very questions are needed wherever men are trying to form, borrow or peddle opinions in these yeasty times. But the trouble is partly that the human world has outrun the human mind and the latter is floundering in its effort to catch up. In the meantime let each contribute his own fraction of interpretative thinking, and thus patiently putting two and two together we shall at last discover God's way in his world in the present generation.

Gradually the nature of the church controversy in Mexico is clearing up. President Calles' interpretation of it, as he is reported, follows: "In contrast with the attitude of the expelled priests, there have been numerous ministers of other cults who have obeyed the constitutional provisions. They have dedicated themselves to other legal activities, such as teaching secondary schools or to orientating or superintending suitable activities of their church, but without exercising their offices in ritualistic acts and leaving to Mexican ministers the performance of the strictly confessional work of their religion. These ministers have not been and will not be molested. Almost without exception the American ministers of confessional churches which are not Catholic adjust themselves while residing in Mexico to what the law demands. For this reason they are not molested, thus bringing about the development and prosperity of their churches through the work of Mexican ministers and living tranquilly and respected among us, merely performing the acts of religion."

The seventeenth annual convocation for ministers conducted by the Yale Divinity School will be held April 19-21. The Lyman Beecher lectures on preaching will be delivered by Rev. Raymond Calkins, of Cambridge, Mass. Dr. Calkins has chosen as his theme "The Christian Experience and the Christian Ministry." This he will discuss in eight lectures. The Nathaniel W. Taylor lectures on theology will be given by Prof. George A. Coe, of New York City, on "The Motives of Men." The Terry Lectures, which deal with the relation of religion and science, will be given by Professor William Ernest Hocking, of Harvard. Professor Hocking's theme is "Man, Nature and Freedom." The school, which is interdenominational, cordially invites all ministers to attend.

A copy of "Progress in Race Relations," the annual report of the interracial movement in the South, will be sent on request to any person interested, according to an announcement from the headquarters of the commission on interracial cooperation, 409 Palmer building, Atlanta. The commission wishes every person desirous of knowing more about the movement to have the report, and invites all such to write for it, together with additional pamphlets on the subject. The report, a sixteen-page booklet, contains a brief but comprehensive survey of interracial activities and achievements, the names and addresses of the members of the commission, and estimates of its work by President Coolidge and Secretary Hoover.

Mr. J. H. Oldham, of London, Methodist authority on missionary questions, points out that the pouring of European and American capital into Africa since the world war for the development of her industry and commerce, has given rise on a gigantic scale to all the capitalistic problems of the West, all the political, racial, educational, social and cultural problems which have for generations been awaiting solution in America and in Europe. "We are living in a fool's paradise," he has said, "if we think that missionaries are to maintain their present influence in Africa. Missions are now, relatively speaking, at a standstill compared with the other influences—economic, political, governmental—which are changing the whole life of Africa. Industrial, commercial and government forces are now having a great influence, and there ought to be a greater cooperation between these agencies of civilization and the missionary and educational bodies working on the continent."

OUR birth is but a sleep and a forgetting;

The Soul that rises with us, our life's Star,

Hath had elsewhere its setting

And cometh from afar;

Not in entire forgetfulness,

And not in utter nakedness,

But trailing clouds of glory do we come

From God, who is our home;

Heaven lies about us in our infancy!

* * *

Our noisy years seem moments in the being

Of the eternal silence: truths that wake,

To perish never;

Which neither listlessness, nor mad endeavour,

Nor man nor boy,

Nor all that is at enmity with joy,

Can utterly abolish or destroy!

Hence, in a season of calm weather

Though inland far we be,

Our souls have sight of that immortal sea

Which brought us hither;

Can in a moment travel thither—

And see the children sport upon the shore,

And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore.

—Wordsworth.

More than 100 Jewish students at the University of Chicago have organized the Philo-Judaes Club, which will study Jewish history and culture, provide religious contacts for Jewish students away from home and perform social work among the children of Chicago's Jewish quarter.

Dr. Elwood Mead, head of the United States land reclamation bureau, issues this alluring forecast: "Land reclamation is only in its infancy. Millions of acres of our richest agricultural soils await our treatment. This is true of the swamp and cut-over land of the South and of the arid and semiarid areas of the far West. I foresee for the next generation a million more American farms, organized in thousands of new farm communities. That is why the work of our bureau is important to the nation as a whole."

The American Bible Society announces that its total issues of the Scriptures for 1925 amount to 9,069,120 volumes in more than 150 languages and dialects. These figures represent a gain of 2,416,821 volumes over those for 1924 and constitute the largest Bible circulation for any of the 110 years of the society's existence. Despite the unsettled conditions in China, the people of this unhappy land took 4,075,853 volumes of these Scriptures. This represents a gain for China of 1,222,315 volumes over last year. The Japanese agency more than doubled its 1924 issue. The circulation for the home land amounts to 2,907,693 volumes.

"Will the church lead or follow?" inquires the Northwestern Christian Advocate. It quotes from the proceedings of the Stockholm conference some proposals which it thinks "come pretty near being as radical as the New Testament." They follow: "Any social system which produces material gain at the cost of spiritual values and values money more than life is anti-Christian. Any social system which uses persons as mere instruments of production, instead of regarding them as cooperative agents of the commonwealth, is anti-Christian. The wages system by which labor force is purchased as a commodity, and by which a cash-nexus is substituted for human relationship, is not fitted to express the relationship of the sons of God to one another. The command of God that we shall love our neighbor as ourselves makes it obligatory on the Christian employer sincerely to endeavor to provide for those in his employment such an environment at work as he would wish for himself, and such conditions of home life as he would desire for his own children. That, since national and international credit is a communal product, justice requires that it shall be communally controlled, and not manipulated for the private profit of individuals. It is the duty of the church to cultivate revolt against any industrial conditions which degrade man." It would be many respects a calamity, thinks the Advocate, if on such great issues as these the church finds itself forced to follow when it might have been chosen to lead.

Where Is Solid Ground for Faith?

A MOTHER stood at the door looking after her son as he left home for college. Just before he passed out of sight he turned and waved his hand to her, and he called after him this farewell: "Dan, don't give up your religion, and be a good boy." Then he was gone. She closed the door, went to his bedroom, kneeled beside his bed in tears, and prayed, "O God, keep my boy clean and true."

Her fear is the fear of many a mother who watches until a boy or girl passes out of sight on the way to school or to the city or to some other adventure in the real world. For these young people are going where new tests are to be applied to their faith and morals, where new temptations will assail them, where new questions will pry at the foundations of their religion and where the old home and the old church can no longer shelter them.

The danger is increased by a clatter of confused and contradictory religious teaching which is likely to surround them wherever they go. Fundamentalists warn them against tolerating any departure from the old formulas and infallibilities handed down to us by the fathers. Modernists shout to them an invitation to shake off the bondage of tradition; to launch out upon the wide sea of scientific inquiry and to explore life, God and the universe for themselves. Queer sects pick at their sleeves. Unbelieving pretenders to superior wisdom laugh in their faces in scorn of any religious faith or ideals. Sin surrounds them with the glamour of immediate enjoyment. They cannot understand this babel all at once. They find themselves puzzled to realize that their fathers and mothers, and even their old pastors, seemed not to understand it. They discover flaws in their own religious ideas. They do not know where to find a solid footing. They lose their bearings. They may go down.

Now the problem is to settle upon some certainty which they may tie up their lives with a final and confident, with no danger that later they will find their faith misplaced or disappointed, and with unimpeded freedom of mind and life. That certainty is found in a personal acquaintance with Jesus. Such acquaintance does not depend upon what anybody says or thinks about the Bible, or creation, or evolution, or inspiration, or miracles, or the church, or baptism, or the doctrinal scheme of salvation. The fact is that one who is not acquainted with Jesus is not prepared to understand clearly and fully any of those things. One of the reasons for the upsetting of the religion of young people is often that they have a lot of ideas about Christian doctrine instead of having the mind and spirit of Jesus. Until you get more light from him let all the rest go. If somebody says that the Bible is full of mistakes, let him get out of his discovery all the satisfaction he can. Whether he is right or wrong he has not touched the foundation of true religion. Whatever the Bible may be, the Saviour who stands out in it is no mistake. As you find him out follow him up, and you will soon find out for yourself whether it is safe or not to tie up to him. He will grip the best that is in your mind and heart. You will want to be like him forever. You will find yourself becoming like him. You will love him. You will trust him. The more you become experienced in the world and the farther you go in any and all kinds of learning, the more he will be worth to you and the more certain will be your assurance of safety, happiness, richness of life and immortality in him.

That is what Jesus does for anybody who becomes acquainted with him. Any boy or girl who leaves home so acquainted with Jesus as really to have his mind and spirit is safe. Such a young person can bravely face the world with all of its allurements and its problems of science, religion and life, and can make his way through without danger to his religion and morals.

If this be true, then it is the first fundamental, perhaps the only real fundamental in religion. It is so fundamental that it makes the questions in dispute between fundamentalists and modernists seem comparatively trifling. However interesting they may be as subjects of inquiry, nobody's life depends upon them and nobody's faith ought to depend upon them. Christ as he reveals himself to the believer is our life.

If this be true, it ought to make a great change in the way in which we go to work in our homes and our churches to educate our children religiously. If they go out into the world believing themselves bound to think certain things about religion instead of experiencing within themselves this life and liberty that are in Christ the responsibility rests in large measure on the kind of teaching they have received in the home, in the Sunday school and from the pulpit, and it is time that we were giving serious thought to this aspect of the case. We owe to our children at least a right religious foundation. We owe them Christ—instead of opinions about religious mechanics.

For the purpose of making clear that Christ is the center of our faith and the one finality in religion, it ought to be made clear in practice that he is the center of our fellowship. For our unities and our schisms have themselves a tremendous teaching power. How far have our young people been thrown off their true center in religion by the efforts of their churches to build fellowship upon Christ—plus, rather than Christ alone? How far have we misled them by making it manifest that we are afraid to commit ourselves to a purely Christ-centered fellowship?

The faith that is based on Jesus alone, and truly so, is safe. The church that centers its teaching clearly in Jesus and not in a field of tradition or of dispute about him, best fits its young people for life. The denomination that builds its fellowship most nearly upon Jesus as realized in the common experience of its people, is best able to justify its existence in the world.

Twelve Months of March

WHEN this writer was young he made one firm resolution, namely, that some time in his life he would make a new calendar and leave March out altogether. For March is such a disagreeable month. With the wind blowing forty ways and the air at all stages of temperature and saturation, what joy is there in puttering around with preparations for farming and in doing miserable chores in the back lot?

But time brings changes of mind as well as of other things, and at last March has come to be the prime period of the year for big enterprises, especially in church work. In evangelism it has come to be the time of the golden harvest and of singing the song of the reapers. Big programs, big crowds, big decision days, big numbers of decisions, big offerings, big baptismal services, big communion assemblies and other sizable endeavors fill the bulletins of the churches.

Nobody can sum up the statistical totals at this date, but an observant minister said the other day, "There will probably be millions of new members received into the churches on or before Easter." And there will be other products and by-products. Sunday schools and men's and women's Bible classes will have been permanently enlarged. Young people's societies with increased membership and quickened enthusiasm will set higher goals for themselves. Spiritual fellowship has been deepened. More tithers have been registered. Church organizations have been strengthened. The task of raising the local and missionary budgets has received new impetus.

The writer has changed his mind about March. He contemplates the making of a new calendar in which for the purposes herein considered there will be only one month, and that month will be March, with 365 days in the month. Such a calendar ought to become immediately popular and easily to replace the Julian, the Gregorian and other crude calendars built upon the memory of some futile nonentity of the dusty past. Such a calendar, all March, would have significance as an ecclesiastical year, provided it could carry all the way through the year the inspiration, enthusiasm and united effort that are coming to be expected in the churches in March. And this, as every reader of these words will have already divined, is the point at which we are driving. What gain have the churches made in March that they ought not to keep or repeat in April or in dog days? We used to sing, "My summer would last all the year"; and in point of languor it lasted years after year in a good many churches. But we are learning to sing, "Onward Christian soldiers, March-ing." Why not keep the chorus going twelve months in the year?

Let Every Man Stand Fast

THE notorious newspaper referendum on prohibition has now gone far enough to reveal its true character and to make possible its true valuation. It is an attempt to assemble wet sentiment and to give to that sentiment a striking expression for political purposes. Its aim is to do one or both of two things, namely to influence the present course of congress and secure during the present session a modification of the Volstead law, and to influence the next election so as to secure a majority in the next congress adverse to prohibition. Why the papers are promoting it is a matter that need not concern us. A newspaper is a business enterprise, run for profit, and the wet referendum is news—if nothing more.

Remember that, generally speaking, the dries do not participate in the voting. There is no way of testing the honesty of the vote. Bundles of ballots lie here and there in cigar stores. Anybody who likes may fill out and deposit a ballot. He may fill out half a dozen for different people if he likes. Who does the voting? Naturally, habitues of such places; and, naturally, persons who are aggressively wet. Voting by coupon in the newspapers naturally attracts those who desire to assemble an impressive number of wet votes. Exceptions are exceptions. At the date of this writing the newspapers report about 2,000,000 ballots cast, ten to one wet. Is that all? We have been regaled with stories of an oppressed and indignant nation of 115,000,000 people, restless under the loss of their precious liberties, harassed by prying officials, disturbed by the impending dissolution of law, order and government, and ready to rise en masse to strike down the oppressors. But here is the result. After every effort to drum up a revolt by straw ballot, one voter in fifteen has been found sufficiently interested to deposit a ballot—at least that number of ballots has been reported. Perhaps the newspapers deserve praise rather than censure. Can it be possible that they have artfully lured the wets into showing how little dissatisfaction with prohibition really exists in the country?

But the straw ballot will influence some voters. In brief, the same old crew, for the same old reasons, with the same disregard for either righteousness or human welfare, will continue to practice the same old tactics of rascality that they have used against the temperance movement in every stage for fifty years. Expect them to do so. Understand them when they do so. Watch the regular elections. Stand on guard.

Dictatorship Is the Same Wherever It Lifts Its Head

Democrats have little reason to become partisans of any preferred type of dictatorship. To some, Italian fascism is sublime and Russian communism base; to others, the reverse is true. The wise reject both. Neither offers hope for democracy. If the ghost of the murdered Matteotti haunts Mussolini, ghosts of the same order haunt the government offices in Moscow, Trotsky is an exile, and men whose only offense is their devotion to democracy are rotting in Russian prisons. Pioneers for freedom have suffered and do sometimes suffer even in America, but here such evils are exceptional and abnormal. Under any dictatorship they are usual and normal. Awkward and inefficient as a parliamentary government may be, it is the best system yet discovered. It does give liberty a chance and it is indefinitely perfectible, but a dictatorship is terrible in proportion as it is perfect.

Maybe Business Will Behave There Is Money in Sight

Judge Gary, as reported in Information Service, comments on the new ethical note in the business world and the new tendency towards cooperation and harmony, and the quotation ends with these words: "But ethical management earns additional profits. Although this motive may be less worthy than those previously discussed, it is not unworthy, and has the advantages of a tactical appeal to those who might not heed any other. sooner or later the adoption of business ethics pays in dollars and cents." It would seem therefore that in spite of the moral revolution that has taken place in certain areas of business management, the field of business is still infested by pirates whom no considerations of justice, honesty or humanity can reach, and that society has no protection from them except to persuade them that the better they behave the more money they will make. Is that the idea?

Come on, Gentlemen; Chicago Is Listening

The Dearborn Independent paints a lurid but popular picture of Chicago. It says: "The confession of Chicago's inability to cope with organized crime is the most shameful acknowledgment in the annals of American cities. With the authorities supine or incapable, with courts failing to function properly, law-abiding citizens are at the mercy of alien gunmen who make terror and murder highly specialized vocations! Chicago's lawlessness casts its somber shadow over the surrounding country for hundreds of miles. Swarthy gangsters swarm forth to rob and kill, and then rush back to the city for shelter and protection." Once the pride of America, Chicago has become the fetid breeding place of crime." Cheer up, neighbor; the prospect is even worse. It seems likely that Chicago will stage a prize fight between Jack Dempsey and his black counterpart, Wills. In that case, with race tension as this, you may have a real story to tell. Meanwhile Chicago is looking into the mirror and is exhibiting signs of an impulse to resort to the bathtub.

Let the Doctor Keep On, He Will Locate the Disease

An impressive array of great names is quoted in the Outlook as authority for the opinion that there will be another great war, perhaps many of them, because, as Winston Churchill says, "The causes of war have in no way been removed." There is nothing new in all this. All thoughtful and informed observers have been fully aware of the peril. Even during the war there were those who ventured to say that it was not a war to end war—and cheerfully went to prison for saying so. The causes of war can be removed. The world has made progress towards their discovery. It no longer points to the kaiser. The following interpretation has now become standard: "The world war, like all modern wars, was due at bottom to the simultaneous expansion of several states—driven by growing populations, by the quest for food, markets, and raw materials—upon a planet whose most valuable territories were too limited to go around." This marks progress but not arrival. There are sufficient valuable lands to go around. Peoples are not fighting one another for food and raw materials. The secret is that modern states are organized and directed on the basis of business for private profit, and they seek to expand in the direction of opportunity for such business. Put your finger there if you want to locate the seat of disease.

What Can the United States Do towards World Peace?

It can drift—into war. It can stand on its superior power and wealth and defy the world—with the certainty of being compelled to make its boast good on the field of battle. It can edge its way into the World Court and the League of Nations, with reservations that rob its entrance of all constructive value. Or it can propose a really American policy, to include the following basic principles: a world union of free peoples; a real government of defined powers; a court of competent jurisdiction to settle all international disputes; the common surrender on the part of the participating states of the right to make war and of dominion over foreign peoples; an adjustment on the basis of general equity and the common good of such questions as public indebtedness, migration, commerce, industry and access to natural resources. The United States has tried most of the features of that system on a continental scale for more than a century and has proved their value. Propose such a program. Adhere to both the court and the league with the avowed purpose of effecting through their agency such a federation. If such a program cannot be achieved through them, propose a new international convention for the purpose, but stick to the program. Let this be America's contribution to the civilization of the twentieth century: a world union of free peoples for peace.

To Arms, to Arms, Ye Brave! Somebody Needs the Money

Cable dispatches tell of huge purchases of military equipment by Balkan states, Russia, Turkey, Persia, China, Finland, Lithuania, Poland and Yugoslavia. The story may or may not mean merely that the ordinary military outfitting and refitting are going on in those nations. It may mean the mustering of nations for the next war. In the case of China the explanation is easy. But in all cases the reason assigned is the necessity for an adequate national defense. And how much equipment is adequate? So much as the armament makers can sell at a profit.

Death and the Life Beyond

VII—The First Thing after Death

BY FRÉDERIC C. SPURR

WE HAVE sought to establish the hypothesis that death does not end all; that indeed it is a natal day, a passing into another sphere of existence, the human personality remaining unchanged during the transit. But where is it that we go; to what do we go; what are the conditions of the life beyond? Is life beyond the veil a simple continuation of the present life, or are its conditions radically different? The answers given in Christendom are bewilderingly numerous. "Catholicism" is inflexible. It speaks of three places beyond: heaven for the good; hell for the wicked and a middle place, purgatory, for those who die in a "state of grace" but who have a certain "temporal debt" due to sin to discharge before heaven can be attained. The Reformed churches, for many years, shared the Catholic belief as to heaven and hell, while rejecting in toto the dogma of purgatory. The Westminster catechism had a clean-cut doctrine of the future life. "At death the souls of the righteous are received into the highest heavens, and the souls of the wicked are cast into hell where they remain in torment and darkness." During recent years, however, a great change of view has been slowly taking place in evangelical circles. The popular doctrines of heaven and hell have been seriously challenged, and by not a few entirely abandoned. Even Mr. Spurgeon did not repeat, towards the end of his great life, the thrilling statements he made in his earlier years. There was a marked moderation in his tone, although he never changed the essence of his belief. In Britain, it is safe to say, the average pulpit is entirely silent about heaven or hell, particularly about hell. This is unsatisfactory. The time has more than come when something definitely constructive should be proclaimed; something that is true to a fair interpretation of the New Testament, true to the character of God as it is revealed in Christ, and true also to the nature of things; something demonstrably true, so far as demonstration is possible. Happily we are today in a better position than were our fathers, to appreciate the real meaning of certain passages of the Bible which were formerly used as "proof texts." Christian scholarship, by placing "texts" in their historic setting, by restoring to the word "eternal" its true qualitative meaning, and by disentangling the traditions of men from the authentic "Word of God," has set us on the right way for the understanding of the truth about the future life. We turn to the Bible anew, and sharply distinguish between the twilight of the books of Job and Ecclesiastes, and the bright light of the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ. And if even in the fuller light of Christ we discover little for the imagination to feed upon, and also a great meagerness of details, we still find sufficient light by which to walk and in which to hope.

The "Sleep" of Death

Let us begin then by placing ourselves in thought in the presence of a death-bed. It is some old person whose term of life is complete; or some young man, full of life, who suddenly falls upon the field of battle; or some young child full of fun and laughter, who in one moment is by accident taken away. Never again on this earth will their lips be opened; never again will their eyes light up with the love flame. In the sight of men all is over. Now what has really happened? According to Christian teaching the spirit of that person—old or young—is suddenly shut off from the material world with which hitherto it has made contact. The earthly body is discarded forever. The spirit enters a new environment for which a "spiritual body" is fitted. Further we may confidently affirm that death makes no change whatever in our character. There is a widespread belief that it does and that in some magical way the physical act of dying holds within itself a mysterious moral dynamic. What evidence is there of this? Absolutely none! There is nothing in the New Testament or in reason, or in the nature of things to support the theory. On the contrary everything is against it. Our essential self is one and the same wherever we go. Each night in ordinary sleep we rehearse the last sleep we call death. When we wake in the morning do we find that our personality has been transformed during the hours of slumber? Why then should we imagine that the "sleep" of death will prove an exception to the rule? We may take it as settled then, that we begin in the spirit world as we end in the material world, but with a certain difference.

For Every Soul a Judgment

St. Paul speaks of a "manifestation" of ourselves before the judgment seat of Christ "that each one may receive the things done in the body, according to what he hath done, whether it be good or bad" (2 Cor. 5:10). The fairness of this seems apparent. While death makes no difference whatever to the continuance or to the character of our personalities, it closes a certain chapter in our career. It ends one period of our life. And since life is a stewardship, what can be more natural or just than when one phase of it has closed, some verdict should be pronounced upon it and that verdict should determine our situation in the next phase of life? The very idea of a stewardship carries with it the principle of examination or judgment, with either approval and promotion or disapproval and degradation following the verdict. Popular imagination has depicted the judgment after death as a vast assize; a kind of "cosmic central criminal court", the materials for this conception being derived from an Apocalyptic book in which truth is stated invariably in terms of high imagination. The modern revolt against the day of judgment is far more a revolt against a certain form of imagery than against the solemn fact which the imagery seeks to portray. But we must be careful not to surrender or to weaken the radical truth that after death there is for every soul a judgment upon the earth life he or she has lived.

But what do we mean by a judgment? The word is generally regarded as a synonym for a sentence of condemnation. This, however, is quite a one-sided view of the matter. The word includes far more than this. It means to separate, to sift, to select, to decide, to clear up uncertainties, to award decisions. It has a welcome side as well as a side of terror. A diligent student who has attended assiduously to his studies knows that at the end of the term an examination—a judgment—awaits him. He does not dread it. Rather he welcomes it. The award will be in his favor. It is the idle udent, the waster and the slacker who have reason to dread the examination. The judgment will find them out and bring the hidden things to light. Every such examination, at the end of a term, carries a consequence with it. It determines what the next stage shall be. The student may remain in the same form or he may be degraded to a lower one or he may be promoted to a higher one. Whichever of the three it may be will be determined by the character of the work done during the session now passed. And so it must be with life. After these school days of earth, and the stewardship of life, there will follow an examination and the result that will determine what next will be done with us. Men may rebel as much as they please against this notion, and sweep it away as "theological lumber," but must return to the mind and the conscience robed in the garb of the nature of things. No greater error has ever been conceived than that of supposing that the notion of a judgment is a simple affair of theology, a dogmatic pronouncement unsupported by any proof. If there were no Bible to tell us the truth this would still be true. It is involved in the moral order. The judgment is inevitable because human life is moral. Humanity has always borne witness to its truth. All peoples from the dawn of history hold to the idea, and have expressed it in various forms; on the bright side under the conceptions of the Elysian fields and an eternal summer; on the dark side under the conceptions of myths. Sisyphus, eternally rolling the stone which never returns to him; Tantalus, seeking the water which eludes him; Prometheus devoured, yet always surviving. These forms are grotesque but beneath them lies a great ethical truth, which could never have arisen from man's passions or his interests, but alone from his conscience. The idea of a judgment is also carried over into our lives. However conscience came to be, it is there, and within every man's breast it bears its witness; in approval when the right thing has been done, in reproach and agony when the wrong thing has been done. Why should men who have been guilty of some interior sin turn scarlet and be uneasy in the darkness of their bed chambers, when none is near to hold, if there is no reality in conscience?

The Judgment Will Declare the Truth

A judgment upon human life at its close here below is necessary; necessary for God, and for man. It is necessary for the vindication of Providence. Who is responsible for the crimes, scandals, miseries and injustice of the world? Who has failed—God or man? We cannot tell here upon earth. Men often put the blame upon God. The judgment will declare the truth. It will vindicate God and man or it will do the contrary. But it will manifest the truth. One day all will be known. Thus far on the general question. We must, however, go farther than this. The very fact that each "receives the things done in the body. . . . whether good or bad" carries with it the most obvious conclusion that all cannot possibly fare alike in a static heaven or a static hell. People die at various ages in health and in various spiritual conditions. Some leave the world with infantile souls; interiorly they have never grown up. Others pass over more fully developed. The spirits of some are pure, and of others putrid. Some go hence at one with God, others in a state of disharmony. Some pass with a life filled, others with a life wasted. Many have never had a fair chance of living a true human life. Some have deliberately shut out the light of life, because they loved the darkness of death. Others have been driven away from Christ by a cruel and irrational theology. Some depart in infancy, some in youth, some in mid-life and some at the end of a full term. None who pass over are wholly good, or wholly evil. And none of us knows enough about any one else to judge him. How then is it possible for men and women so diverse to fare alike? A further question now arises. Does death fix the spiritual condition of men and women? Are infant spirits to remain such forever or will they grow? Are those who here below had no knowledge of Christ or a fair opportunity of knowing him, still to have none? Must the undeveloped remain undeveloped? Let us for a moment survey a region more familiar to us. Upon our earth plane we have seen the backward develop, the scoundrel become the saint, and the handicapped set free to run a full course with joy. There is nothing fatally fixed here below; all is fluid and capable of change.

Law and Love in Future Life

Are we then to believe that within the same universe, in which the moral law is one, there will be on the next plane of existence a mysterious reversal of the principles which operate upon the present plane? Upon what ground should we believe any such thing? What spiritual principle, or what specific word in the New Testament warrants it? The word "eternal," as we have seen, does not enter into the question at all, since it is not a word of duration but one of quality. Once it was said dogmatically that man's everlasting fate is fixed at death. The Bible never anywhere says that. Men have inferred it from one or two passages which devout scholarship will no longer permit to be used for this purpose. If the everlasting fate of man is fixed at death then we have to face the fact that the majority of mankind will be lost. Could God the Father and Christ the Saviour be "satisfied" with that? Could you? The thought is intolerable. But if this doctrine of the fixity of our fate at the hour of our death is felt to be untrue, equally untrue is that opposite, easy-going doctrine of pure sentiment which invokes Divine love apart from law, discipline and order and takes heed of no moral quality in God. We can accept neither the falsity which proclaims death as the final hardening of human fate, nor the sloppy sentiment which makes of God nothing more than an easy-going, unethical benevolence. An epoch that has learned to render homage to law in the whole universe cannot tolerate the idea of the negation of law in the making of human character. We have to find room in our conception of the future life for both law and love. And we can best find it in the largely forgotten truth of what is called the "intermediate state"; a truth of which the Roman doctrine of purgatory is the caricature. Into that intermediate state our Lord passed on Good Friday. "Today thou shalt be with me in paradise," he said to the thief by his side. He did not explain what paradise was, since the word, in common Jewish use, conveyed to the dying man all that he needed to be assured of. In our day the term is generally employed in an extremely loose way, largely because Faber's hymn has caught our ears with its jingle and in part has stupefied our intelligence and so hindered clear thinking. Paradise is not heaven. On Easter morning our Lord told Mary Magdalene that he had not yet ascended. Paradise is the Jewish name for that state into which we enter immediately upon leaving this earth sphere. We know little about it and all speculation is quite idle, while dogmatism is impossible.

We have, however, one glint of light which is too precious to lose. It is the mysterious word of St. Peter that the "gospel was preached to the dead" and that Jesus went to preach to the "spirits in prison" (1 Peter 3). Does not this suggest that in the spirit world Jesus continues his mission of preaching the gospel to men who in their lifetime had no chance of hearing it—that the life beyond is as much the theater of Christ's working as is the present life? There every thing is under his direction. He is "the Lord of the dead" as well as of the living, and "all live unto him" (Rom. 14:9). Death which does not change our character has not changed his. He remains the Good Shepherd, the Saviour of man, the Friend of sinners. He makes continual "intercession" for us. Does not this assure us that Christ will not let men easily elude him and slip into the gulf? There will be no lack of endeavor on his part. On the other hand we must stress the law of spiritual progress which operates there as here. Men are not made saints in a flash. Even a St. Paul towards the end of his great life said that he had not "attained"; he was still "following after." But all progress costs. We do not drift into "upwardness." To reach the goal we must "follow after." To gain the power for this we put our wholehearted trust in Christ and submit ourselves to his "yoke." There is no other way. In this or in any other world where humanity dwells, the conditions for spiritual progress are the same; harmony with God through Christ and likeness to Christ. The longer that progress is delayed the more difficult will it be. Hence a note of great urgency is needed in the preaching of the gospel. For this is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation.

The Myth of Majorities

BY DOUGLAS G. HARING

MAJORITY rule is sometimes advisable in politics. History has yet to show that it is the best kind of rule. But spiritual affairs can seldom be decided rightly by majorities. As Christians we ought not to need to be reminded of this fact. Our heritage is one of protest against the stupidity and blindness of majorities. Majorities in fact generally have been wrong when they attempted to decide spiritual affairs. Only the spiritually minded can have insight in such matters—and Jesus himself did not give majorities credit for spiritual-mindedness. "Many are called but few are chosen."

The story of Judaism is one long tale of tragic revolt of prophets and seers and men of God against the unthinking, custom-bound majorities of their day. The majorities won—they stoned the prophets and silenced the men of God. Or is that wrong—did the prophets really win after all? Dead, they yet speak—they won the ear of the future.

Before the days of the prophets there was a king who discovered the majority of his people to be wrong. Akhnaton, the "heretic king" of Egypt, declared for monotheism and rid his court of the priests. After he died the priests came back and buried his memory so deep that only in modern times has it been recovered. The majority was wrong—their gods and ceremonies are long dead. There is something infinitely appealing about the king who was a minority, but right.

Jesus was always a minority. The religious people hated him and believed themselves to be serving God by killing him. They crucified him and scattered his followers. The majority had won. Perhaps they died thinking they had won. But God and time were with that sublime minority, and Jesus lives in millions of hearts.

Has his church ever learned that lesson? Within two hundred years after the death of Jesus spiritual questions were being decided by majorities and the decision forced on the faithful. Within three hundred years a politically "packed" council made final decisions on spiritual questions and excommunicated all who failed to agree. The majority was having its way again, and the prophets were back among the flying stones of prejudice.

Down through the centuries the same sad spectacle has continued. Majorities have decided that the Husses and Galileos and Wyclifs and Luthers were wrong and have condemned them—but time has come to the rescue and their victories served only to win for those majorities the scorn of their descendants. Majorities formerly decided that the earth was flat—that the sun moved round the earth—that disease was a visitation of God—that paltry creeds were established in heaven. But God's world has gone on rotating and revolving around the sun, disease germs have worked their havoc, and creeds have come and gone. God lives!

Hour by Hour

ONE single day
Is not so much to look upon, there is some way
Of passing hours of such a limit. We can face
A single day; but place
Too many days before sad eyes—
Too many days for smothered sighs—
And we lose heart
Just at the start.
Years really are not long, nor lives
The longest which survive—
And yet, to look across
A future we must tread bowed by a sense of loss,
Bearing some burden weighing down so low
That we can scarcely go
One step ahead, this is so hard,
So stern a view to face, unstarred,
Untouched by light, so masked with dread.
If we would take a step ahead,
Be brave and keep
The feet quite steady; feel the breath of life
Sweep ever on our face again,
We must not look across—looking in vain—
But downward to the next close step,
And up. Eyes that have wept
Must look a little way; not far.
God broke the year to hours and days,
That hour by hour
And day by day,
Just going on a little way,
We might be able all along
To keep quite strong.
Should all the weights of life
Be laid across our shoulders, and the future rife
With woe and struggle, meet us face to face
At just one place,
We could not go;
Our feet would stop; and so
God lays a little on us every day,
And now, I believe, on all the way
Will burdens bear so deep,
Our pathways lie so steep,
But we can go, if by God's power
We only bear the burden of the hour.

A Navy Chaplain and the Making of Men

BY LIEUTENANT COMMANDER CLINTON ANDREW NEYMAN

DICK WHITTINGTON, Oliver Twist, Little Lord Fauntleroy, Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry Finn! Here is a gang of youngsters it would be a pleasure to see talking out of a recruiting office on their way to one of Uncle Sam's naval training stations. Dick could not count on the mice-killing exploits of his cat for the foundation of his fortune. Poor little Oliver's pleas for "seconds" would be so generously answered he'd be bursting out at every seam. Little Lord Fauntleroy would lose caste but gain muscle in doing his own laundry. Tom and Huck, the beloved scallions, would get "on the report" a few times, perhaps, before they settled down to orderly and promising obedience to all the calls between "reveille" and "taps."

Give Uncle Sam two solid months with these young hopefuls at any one of his four naval training stations and for the life of you you could not catch them in a false move at a dress parade, nor call one less immaculate than another, nor dare say a single one was unfit to go on to sea to take his place in the nation's first line of defense.

In round numbers 20,000 young Americans are entering the United States navy every year. Inspired or driven by a thousand varying impulses, circumstances, ambitions and dreams they enter into contract with the government for four years of service—either in their own right or by their parents' or guardians' consent. Of those who are joining in these days eighty per cent arrive at their majority while they are wearing the uniform. Far more than half of them are beardless and not past nineteen.

This is man's work, this going down to the sea in ships, this watching of thousands of miles of wave-washed shores, this standing guard at the gates behind which live and work and play the hundred and score millions whose flag is the Stars and Stripes. It is man's work, but in large part these are boys who make up the eighty-odd thousand who do it.

They are adequate to the task because the navy has knowledge of the fact that it is not brawn which counts so much as do brains and heart and soul. There is a word which is much bandied about these days. That word is "morale". It is a word the navy takes seriously. It is not synonymous with "moral" but yet, in the last analysis, there can be no morale without morals.

"As the Strength of Ten"

Back of the four fundamental lessons of a training station (namely: to care for one's person and clothing, to drill under arms, to pull an oar and to swim half a hundred yards), back of the ship-keeping and fleet maneuvering and little drills—back of all these, be assured, there is always in mind the truth of what Tennyson put on the lips of Sir Galahad: "My strength is as the strength of ten, because my heart is pure."

The approximately eight weeks of the present training station course are given over to the learning of fundamentals in military routine and drills. Men are taught something about naval customs and regulations. They learn to care for their persons and uniforms in the prescribed manner. They are taught the rudiments of seamanship, signaling and the manual of arms. They take their turns at standing guard, policing the stations, acting as mess-cooks, a hundred details. The schedule is a full and busy one, and the things which men are taught during this time are essential to success in their work on board ship or elsewhere later in their period of enlistment.

This official routine of naval training and work is, in effect, a rigorous course in proper moral conduct. A young man who enters into his naval service in the right spirit must cultivate the virtues of obedience, precision, promptness, cleanliness, altruism, truthfulness, honesty and politeness. Navy regulations acknowledge the need for religious activities and worship. It is a time-honored custom in the navy to give every officer and man an opportunity to attend divine worship at least once each week.

From inland to seaboard, from home to barracks life, from the family circle to the regimental front, from the too-frequent go-as-you-please to strict military discipline—here is an array of sudden changes which severely test the mettle of these young adventurers. But in the midst of all the newness and strangeness there are the sweet, haunting notes and words of hymns they sang at home, and there is the incense of old, familiar things, tried and true, in the morning prayer which is offered by the chaplain, the navy's "man of God". For the chaplain is always found wherever there is a training station.

More often than not the chaplain is the nearest approach to a connecting link between the old life and the new. He, perhaps, is the first of all the officers, officials and associates in this bewildering maze of navy life whom the recruit is able to recognize and classify. This potential man in the uniform understands "chaplain". That means that the old home church, that mother's prayers, made faint by time and distance and half drowned out in the babel of other sounds, have followed him here into the new life. It means that in all this uncharted sea of new experience there is one certain and reliable landmark. It means a good deal.

Planting the Piers

The chaplain meets these recruits before they have fairly changed from civilian togs to uniforms. He learns their names, records each man's age, his religious leaning or alignment, his education, his trade and practical experience, his avocations, his athletic preferences, his ambitions with reference to his naval career, his next of kin and his home address. The chaplain writes a letter to the home folks, announcing the young man's arrival, giving some facts about the navy and the training station in particular, and offering his services to home folks and recruits alike.

He tells the recruits—as they assemble in companies for lectures—to keep in close touch with their relatives, to preserve the good and abandon the bad of their former years, to save their money, to be diligent and wide-awake in learning and advancing in their training. He encourages them to come to him for advice or information, to confide in him as in a trusted friend.

Very soon the letters begin to arrive from the folks at home. The letters are full of grateful thanks, burdened with anxiety about son's welfare, pleading for watchcare in his behalf, fragrant with the expression of prayers for both son and chaplain. Fortified with these letters the chaplain seeks out the mother's son and talks, heart-to-heart, with him, and then speeds an answer to the home where is the vacant chair. It is just a touch perhaps, but it is worth more than money can buy. It may be superficial at first, but at least it plants the piers across which later is thrown the bridge to the heart of a young man in spiritual doubt and in need of a steadying hand and a helping, prayerful word.

Office hours are full of conferences with men who come to seek information and advice. For one who comes to talk of righteousness and God there may be a hundred who are curious about material things, about rates of pay and trades and chances for advancement and assignment to certain duties—but the little sorties often precede the major offensives. "Great oaks from little acorns grow!" That was in the copy books, but it was true as well.

Then on the Sabbath! What an opportunity! What a responsibility! Out there in front hundreds of young men, in the responsive emotional years of middle adolescence, on the wave-crest of a new enthusiasm, in the doldrums of routine, sometimes beset with homesickness, all with a common task, a common challenge, an equal opportunity, all starting on four years to be packed with temptation, moral challenge and kaleidoscopic experience. On the pulpit the open Bible, and in the chaplain's heart a yearning that these who face him may be equal to their tasks and victors over their temptations and true to their oaths, not alone by the strength of their robust young manhood but more by learning the lessons of prayer and communion with God and by following in the footsteps of the Christ.

If the chaplain studies these young men, as he is almost sure to do, he learns that there is reason for their ready response to religious teachings and their aptness in participation in services of worship. Over five hundred out of every thousand are members of churches. Another four hundred express preference for certain churches. Man, it is said, is incurably religious, and the sailor proves it.

Mentally, these youngsters are worth considering. Report has it that the average American is educated up to about the sixth grade of standard schooling. The modern recruit of the navy is far and away better off than that average American. He is, in fact, a young man who has had between one and two years of high school. He has a mind trained to learn more, to cope with mechanical problems, to understand the things which he is called on to do. From sixteen to twenty per cent are young men who have had more than two years of high-school training. Only a small fraction have had less than seven grades in school. Here are future citizens—the business and professional and tradesmen of tomorrow—who will profit notably by the discipline and training the navy gives them. The chaplain sees in them the leaders of days ahead and he strives, in every way possible, to keep them mindful of the fundamental need for religious devotion and of the close relationship which exists between love of home and country and love of God and righteousness.

There are sad facts here, too. It is not pleasant to contemplate that nearly half of these recruits for the navy have come from broken homes, from homes broken either by death or separation or divorce. At too young an age too many of them have known the bitterness of tears and quarrels, the broken family circle. Thereby comes to the chaplain the challenge to furbish in their minds and hearts the significance of loyalty, love and devotion.

Such, in part, is the work of the chaplain who works at a naval training station. This is his main task, his real and significant share in the training of Uncle Sam's men. Sometimes (perhaps too often) he is by force of circumstance caused to be a Jack-of-All-Trades. Coincident with his work of personal contact and religious leadership are his tasks of assisting in the guidance of the men's recreational activities, of being an athletic director, of managing the station library, of supervising studies.

But more important than everything else is his grand and humbling privilege and responsibility to help these young men who have assumed so great a task and entered upon so great an adventure, to put the red underscore of religious implication beneath every thought and act and duty, to make their service moral and Christian, and to go on to sea able to read a new meaning into those familiar words of the 107th psalm:

"They that go down to the sea in ships,
That do business in great waters;
These see the works of Jehovah,
And his wonders in the deep.
For he commandeth, and raiseth the stormy wind,
Which lifteth up the waves thereof.
They mount up to the heavens, they go down again to the depths;
Their soul melteth away because of trouble.
Then they cry unto Jehovah in their trouble,
And he bringeth them out of their distresses.
He maketh the storm a calm,
So the waves thereof are still.
Then are they glad because they are quiet;
So he bringeth them unto their desired haven."

Diversity of Operations in the Same Spirit

BY CHARLES HATCH SEARS

(Note: This is the third of a series of three articles prepared at the request of "The Baptist" to review the scope of the forthcoming volume of Baptist City Planning.)

BAPTISTS in their city work have learned with Paul that diversity in operations is consistent with unity in aim and spirit.

The complexity and diversity of the city, the wide variety of neighborhoods and community needs have been sketched in the preceding articles. In all this we have been concerned with the field, with the raw material of church city planning and Baptist city planning. What variations have we found? What course of action is suggested?

The right and the obligation to learn from the experience of others; to carry over into our own distinctive field that which has been learned in the fields of municipal city planning, of social welfare, and of Protestant city planning.

We must think in terms of comity and cooperation with other communions, but with fields white already for the harvest, we cannot afford to withhold the laborers, nor is it fitting that a superabundance of workers should rush into a limited field. Within our rapidly growing cities the God of the harvest has spread out fields that are extensive with a harvest that is ample. Let us send out the laborers.

We need have less concern about comity than with the failure to meet our own responsibilities.

Churches in the down-town areas are being flooded out inundated by business, pleasure resorts, foreign-speaking colonies and a floating American population.

One fact stands out. If the down-town church is to survive there must be cultivated by the City Society, or otherwise, a denominational sentiment in its behalf.

Great service to all denominational causes, aye, to a kingdom causes, must be expected from it, and it should be a rallying point for the denomination. This result can be promoted through wise Baptist city planning. It is a denominational concern that the down-town church should be kept at its post; that it should be properly equipped and permanently maintained. In some cities it should be endowed by cash or by a revenue-bearing building. This may not be necessary in smaller cities or cities that are pre-eminently Protestant.

If the church would become a real denominational institution, it must cease to be a religious club of old families or the private enterprise of an ambitious minister. It must conscientiously serve the great aims of the denomination and be a humble servant of Jesus Christ in the redemption of the city at the point of the greatest need and the greatest opportunity. We are not surprised therefore that the Washington Conference passed a resolution "that it should be the general policy of the denomination and where necessary, involving cooperation of the city organization, to maintain strongly at least one down-town church which (1) may minister to the adjacent populations, including transients, (2) may sustain an intimate relation to the moral and civic problems of the city's life, and (3) may furnish a rallying center for the denomination, easily accessible from all parts of the city.

Church in the older residence area.—The solution of the problem in the older residence district is more directly in the keeping of the individual churches now occupying these fields. The churches complain that for the very reason that their problem is not quite so exigent as that of the down-town church, they receive less sympathy and that there is less understanding of their problem. From the churches of this type we are still drawing a very large percentage of our denominational resources. The equipment of these churches represents a large percentage of our denominational investment. The future of many is doubtful. Of say one hundred of the more prominent of these churches in the older residence district of the northern states, it is safe to predict that fifty will lose their contributing power, if not their very existence, within the next twenty-five years, unless they, in common with the denomination, think in terms of adaptation and the conservation of forces and resources. Some may be justified in withdrawing to new fields; others in consolidating. Those that remain require better equipment and many of them a modification of their program of work. They must establish "contacts", cultivate "relationships", possess an outreaching love, and withal preserve their evangelistic zeal.

Church in newer residence area.—It is quite clear that in the newer residence districts in recent years we have had our most conspicuous successes and met with our most conspicuous failures. In these fields live families with children where churches are needed and can become self-supporting. As a denomination we have not mobilized our forces or resources to meet rapidly changing conditions. It is our best recruiting ground for every kingdom enterprise. If we do not grow here we shall die everywhere.

Foreign-speaking fields.—To serve the foreign language and the mixed English and foreign-language fields, we have come to rely upon (a) the foreign-language church, (b) the denominational church center, and (c) the Christian center. All may be much alike in their method.

The sub-committee of the Baptist city planning committee which studied the polyglot and foreign districts finds that the foreign-language church has been a factor in evangelizing groups and has helped greatly to relate New Americans to their new environment and in understanding American ideals. Such churches need ministers who speak English as well as their mother tongue and who know American ideals. The denomination ought to encourage the organization of churches to serve foreign-speaking groups of the newer immigration; wherever separate church organization is not deemed practicable, the largest measure of freedom should be given to the foreign-speaking branch or division of an English-speaking church; and in general the unity of the family, the effectiveness of the church and its final emergence as an English-speaking American church should be promoted by holding the children and young people with the adults in the foreign-speaking church or branch rather than encouraging them to join an American church.

The same committee concludes that Christian centers are peculiarly adapted to foreign-language communities. In some centers regular religious services are held and in some instances organized churches are housed. The establishment of Christian centers generally necessitates a new and specialized equipment. In several of our larger cities the outflow of the American and Protestant population has left valuable church properties transferred to denominational bodies. This is notably true in New York where six of these properties valued at over a million dollars are now held by the City Society and operated as church centers. These church centers have long operated on the threefold program more recently undertaken by Christian centers—evangelistic, educational, social—multiplying points of contact, and at the same time conducting a full church program with primary emphasis upon evangelism and religious education. As other cities grow in size and the down-town populations are changed there will be occasion for the establishment of these church centers under denominational control in many other cities.

In the foregoing we have thought of the city as separated into its component neighborhoods characterized by the greatest diversity. We now think in terms of the city as a whole and of the types of ministry required of a strong denominational body on a city-wide basis. There are large opportunities for a city-wide program of cooperative evangelism, of religious education, of social ministry and in the training of volunteers.

The Washington City Planning Conference urged by resolution that Baptist City unions or the cooperating Baptist churches of a city constitute a committee on religious education; that this committee survey from time to time the religious educational opportunities and work of the Baptist churches of the city; and have general supervision in behalf of the cooperating Baptist churches of a unified program of religious education. It is recognized that to make this plan effective requires the appointment of a religious educational director to serve all of the churches missionary or self-supporting.

In like manner it is urged that in every city having three or more Baptist churches there should be constituted a permanent evangelistic committee composed of ministers and laymen; that wherever there is a Baptist City Union the evangelistic committee should be appointed by it and function through the union; that strong reliance should be placed upon educational evangelism.

In the field of social service there should be a city-wide outlook and plan to look after neglected groups. Social service should not be limited to down-town or congested districts. Every church should enlist its membership in social ministry. One church in New York has a sub-committee of its educational committee on "expressional life," and last year reported 150 people rendering some definite form of service outside of the local church.

If progressively we are to think of the larger opportunity for ministry and in terms of specialized service, tested inevitably by the standards of experts in professional service, it becomes essential that volunteers be trained and that training classes for such Christian service be held. It becomes important then that colleges and seminaries through extension departments and that churches and missionary organizations through training schools and summer assemblies, should enter this new field. It is quite as important that there should be an every-member canvass for consecrated service as well as for financial resources. We need to cultivate a wealth of appreciation and a camaraderie which will offset something of the loneliness and discouragement of individuals who give themselves to unrewarded tasks.

These are some of the diversities of operation required in the redemption of the city. If in all these operations there is a passionate purpose to bring men to Jesus Christ and to help answer his prayer that all may have life and have it abundantly, we need not fear that the church will be secularized by these methods.

The Devotional Life

The Secret of Eternal Life

This is life eternal that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ—John 17:3

BY THOMAS W. DAVIDSON

TO know the true God has been the deep desire of man through the ages. Wearied by the changes of a fleeting world and finding no repose on the best that the finite can give, men of earnest minds have at all times sought to know the eternal, that they might rest in him. One of the old mystics said "God is an unutterable sigh of the human soul," which is true, but it is equally true that the human soul is a never-ending sigh after God. The rose is not more truly a child of the sun than man is a child of God and desires to apprehend him.

The more we consider this desire the more we discover that it is not merely an intellectual apprehension, but a personal relationship with God. The cry of the soul is, "Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us."

The Dream a Reality

This dream haunts humanity, and Jesus declares the dream is a reality, and that the secret of eternal life is an open one: "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

The revelation of Christ to the race surpasses in character and degree all the other speculations of the human intellect, even when we take these speculations at high-water mark.

Jesus is to the race the Incarnation of God; that is, God comes near to us that we might enter into happy relationship with him. As we know Christ, we know God, and as we live the spirit of Christ we live the life of God. The outcome of this is that in God as revealed in Christ we have a perfect environment which meets and matches our life at every point, and subject to no change or decay. As Dr. James H. Snowden so well puts it in his volume entitled "The Christian Belief in Immortality": "Our knowledge of God combined with our faith and fellowship, will never permit the soul to fall out of harmony with him, but will ever fold us closer to his breast, and hide us deeper in his life."

Eternal existence and universal knowledge are thus realized in the soul that is Christ's; so that science reinforces Scripture, or rather unites with Scripture in unfolding to us the secret of that life which contains no seed of death, but which must from its essential nature endure forever.

Think of the deep satisfaction this knowledge of God brings to all who attain unto it.

This is life eternal, with all its wealth of meaning and comfort, "that they might know thee, the only true God." So it has indeed proved to be in every age of the church. Take one illustration out of many. In the tempestuous days of Henry VIII, the good Bishop of Rochester was sent to the scaffold, and as he was led to his execution, when he saw the gibbet he was much perturbed in spirit. Pulling from beneath his robes a little Greek Testament he prayed that God would direct him to some passage which would support him through that dreadful scene. As he opened the book his eye fell on these great words: "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." At once he closed the book and uttered the joyous words: "Praised be the Lord, this knowledge is enough for time and for eternity." It gave him a deep satisfaction in that dread hour as nothing else could have done.

Just as the Twenty-third Psalm has ever been like an angel of God uttering its message of cheer to the lonely and the sorrowful, so this passage from John is a veritable prophet of the Lord, meeting us in the rough and lonely places of life and helping us to endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ.

The Greatest Knowledge

Have you all this knowledge?

It is the greatest knowledge of life, greater than science or philosophy or literature. To forego this knowledge is to suffer life's greatest loss. It was an outstanding scientist of the last century who exclaimed: "Science! Science! I would give all the science I ever knew for the knowledge of God in Christ."

What is life's greatest loss? Surely, it is the loss of the soul.

What is life's greatest gain? Is it not to gain Christ, the Saviour?

What is life's greatest object? To glorify God and enjoy him forever.

What is life's greatest work? It is to win men and women for Christ.

What is life's greatest joy? It is the joy of God's salvation.

What is life's greatest privilege? It is to be called sons and daughters of God.

What is life's greatest peace? It is the peace of God which passeth all understanding.

And what is life's greatest knowledge? "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."
